Guest Meals or What Eats Us

If there is one thing that irritates students around here it's the "little" administrative decisions that are made during the summer which affect student lives and yet are made without student input. Last year it was the decision to have a centralized mailroom. This year it's a change in guest meal policy.

The Thursday night guest meal was originally designed so that students and faculty members could interact in a social situation outside of the classroom. That's not a bad idea. Over the past few years, however, students have tended to use guest meals as an occasion for meeting and socializing with students from other houses rather than an opportunity for getting to know faculty. A Record editorial last semester acknowledged that greater interaction between students and faculty at meals would be highly desirable.

Unfortunately, some college administrators have decided that the way to reverse this guest meal trend is to force all student houses to have guest meals on the same dates, rather than allowing them to choose their own dates as they have in the past. The logic apparently is that fewer students will be able to attend guest meals at other houses and thus everyone will start inviting faculty members instead. Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad noted at the recent housing committee meeting that guest meals were not designed as occasions for socializing between students and that's why the change was made.

While we agree with the administration's goal of increasing student-faculty interaction at meals, we strongly disagree with their method. Attempting to force students to invite faculty to guest meals by limiting alternatives is likely to cause more problems than it solves. One Mission Park house president stated that it would cause overcrowding problems if many faculty members were invited to a guest meal at the Park under the new system. Some row house stewards have complained that the new policy will make it difficult to find waiters because everyone will want to attend their own guest meal. Finally, do we really want to make it more difficult for students to get to know students from other houses?

One source said that if students were too dissatisfied with the new guest meal policy it would be changed back for second semester. May we suggest that the next time you invite your favorite college administrator over for a meal that you let him or her know how you feel.

Letters: parties, grade reform, BSU

Free house parties

To the editor:

Why not make all-College parties free? Having already held one successful party of this type, we as Fitch House officers have become aware of the inherent advantages of this type of party. During the past years, few houses have sponsored free parties. This situation is understandable due to the cost of a single house's sponsoring a large party. We feel that free campus-wide social events sponsored by several houses should be the rule rather than the exception. Moreover, we feel that this goal is easily attainable through a coordinated effort of house social chairmen. The advantages are many:

1. It would allow for a well-coordinated campus social calendar, eliminating the possibility of having five parties on one weekend and none the next.

2. It would yield a more efficient use of the amount of funds currently being spent on parties.

3. Freshmen would no longer be taken advantage of; when houses give parties to which social members are admitted free, they are heavily subsidized by freshmen dollars. As upperclassmen do not go to freshman parties, there is no corresponding transfer of funds to the freshman class.

4. It would make it easier for houses to fund their own, small house activities, while large parties would be available to those who want them.

5. We are not discouraging the competition that makes for better parties. Each group of houses, would still be motivated to give the best party on a particular night. What would be eliminated is the profit motive. As it now stands, a house with a poor location or physical plant cannot hope to make a profit on a party, while others constantly do. We feel that this situation is inequitable.

6. Most important, free parties would provide the greatest happiness for the greatest number. (Apologies to Jeremy Bentham).

We urge people to respond to these ideas.

Sincerely,
Liz Vonnellini, President
Susan Gelb, Vice President
Mitchell Portnoy, Social Chairman

Provost replies

To the editor:

It was not my intention to give your reporter the impression that I believe grade reform to be "inevitable" at Williams. It is well known that nothing other than death and taxes is ever inevitable. The grade inflation may cease, or slow to a very small rate of increase, because of "natural" causes. Even if this does not occur, all conceivable reforms appear to involve some important effects that many faculty and-or students would deem unacceptable. In any case, nothing within my experience at Williams over the past half-decade would indicate that we can expect imminently a grade reform proposal from the CEP or from any other authoritative group in the College.

BSU membership

To the editor:

Back in the 50's segregation was not an uncommon phenomenon. Doorways were labelled as being for either Coloreds or Whites, water fountains were labelled in the same manner, even entire sections of parks were set off for the Blacks so they wouldn't mix with White families. People fought those rules because they felt Blacks and Whites were equal. Civil rights movement strove for harmonious multi-racial communities. Martin Luther King Jr.'s aspirations included a day when little black children could stand hand in hand with little white children. Federal laws were passed prohibiting any type of discrimination due to race.

Why then, in 1977, is there a school funded organization whose membership qualifications rely solely on race? I perceive barring certain people from an organization and its meeting place because of their racial heritage as a blatant form of racism. Because I feel racism is wrong, and want no part in it, I would like to forfeit my membership to the Williams Black Student Union.

What we do we do well. We should handle the level of improvement we have time for before we move on to another facet of our plan."

According to Fox, a volunteer program behind the implementation of the OCEC's plans would be "good publicity." If work-study students handled the project, they would have to be paid. A sufficiently convincing argument explaining the need for a recycling program in the dining halls might persuade the provost to allocate money to hire extra students to wash bottles and flatten cans; otherwise, kitchen workers might take on the additional duties.

Fox supported a volunteer basis because, "the idea of this committee is to educate you for post-Williams life. You will have to be responsible for the environment in your own home." He estimates that the job would require one hour's work each day.

The OCEC's goal of educating the student body is a continuation of one of last year's projects. The committee produced "Many Happy Returns," a booklet containing tips for recycling and energy conservation in the Williamstown area and distributed it to students and other interested people. In spite of this, there was little response.

"Environmental consciousness is very low on campus," VanOot reported. Students only rarely used the recycling sheds available on campus, and freshman member Ted Wolf said that most of the Class of 1981 do not know that the shed even exist. Some years ago, the three major dining halls, Mission Park, Baxter, and Greylock, recycled paper, cans and glass, but the programs were discontinued when funds and interest diminished.

In order to arouse interest, the OCEC will schedule entry meetings in many dorms to both inform and inspire students to practise recycling and conservation methods.

However, as committee members pointed out, awareness is no guarantee that students will participate in any program. According to one member, "We don't need experience; we need enthusiasm."

Roger Daltrey
MCA 2291

by Marcus Smith

Age improves fine wine, but fine rock stars? And speaking of stars, does the road to glamourdom really empty into a cul-de-sac of exhaustion? If you answered a sturdy "Yeah" and desire to confirm your suspicions, then tune in Roger Daltrey's third solo attempt, One Of The Boys.

One Of The Boys is in many ways a disturbing album for those of us (all of us?) who think of Daltrey first and foremost as the gutsy, but often tender lead singer of The Who. As an exquisite mouthpiece for brooding Peter Townsend, Daltrey hardly ever seems to hit a wrong note or echo a false sentiment. Away from Townsend and The Who, and with a wide variety of material (some of which he has co-written), however, Mister Daltrey becomes an inconsistent, contradictory persona. Contradiction can be admirable and intriguing in performers who have from the start based their appeal on elusiveness and self-effacing inconsistencies (e.g. Ray Davies, David Bowie). In Daltrey's case, though, the contradictions are temporal in origin and therefore irreconcilable. Daltrey, in short, wants his cake (the past splendour of The Who) as well as his appetite (a desire to break away from his role in The Who and become a separate, distinct performer). He craves a new future, while at the same time refuses to completely relinquish his past. The net result is a less than convincing, but not without a moment of masterpiece.

This moment is "Avenging Annie", an Andy Pratt song which Daltry has fashioned into a classic in true Who style. Daltrey has seldom sounded better. The song is a showcase of his vocal range, and its crescendoing force is the quintessential Daltery, the singer who sings every note as if it were his last.

Elsewhere such characteristic conviction on the part of Daltrey slips away because of inert, inglorious lyrics. The album's title track, for instance, is so blatantly in the tradition of The Who as the spokesgroup for frustrated, lower-middle class English adolescents that at best it is a poor copy and at its worst a sad parody. Thirteen years after "My Generation" and three years after Quadrophenia, a highly autobiographical two record extravaganza by The Who, lines such as "He speaks with a terrible stammer", "He knows his generation", and "Fff-frustration" certainly come off as being sterile and trite. Besides, in the early seventies the now defunct Mott The Hoople accomplished what a few of the more interesting New Wave bands are accomplishing now; namely, defiance in a refreshing, exciting style. Daltrey, however, has not accomplished this here by any means—"Life on the dole ain't no good for your soul" or "He knows he don't have to be that good - To be a real bad cat" are but two of many examples in "One Of The Boys" in which revolt has been turned into cliche.

Such warmed-over sentiment seems all the more inexcusable in an album which, contrary to its title, proves that Daltrey is in fact no longer "one of the boys". For starters, the supporting cast reads like a Who's Who of British Rock and includes the likes of Eric Clapton, Mick Ronson, Alvin Lee (who plays on "Avenging Annie"), Paul McCartney, ex-Zombies Rod Argent and Colin Blunstone, and fellow Who member John Entwistle. But we can't condemn a man by association, and besides the tone of the songs do that.

"Parade" deals with the standard not-quite a star theme in a routine way ("Ive never made the headlines but I was in that scene"). Are we suppose to feel sorry for poor old Roger because his film career hasn't put him up there with Burt Reynolds or what?

"Satin And Lace" meantime is a revealing picture of "the new Daltrey": self-centered and self-pitying, cynical towards "his generation", distanced from it. A simple piano ballad, "Satin And Lace" is as beautiful as it is disconcerting:

I've made it
I've played it
I've sang my songs to please them
I've seen them falling from the highest highs
They owned me
But they're lonely
They ended up with nothing
I took my chances and I learnt to fly
Fly away

Such self-righteousness, moreover, turns intercomplacency. "Doing It All Again", another simple, quiet song, reveals real mental paralysis, the kind that comes from a preoccupation with success and luxury:

Easy life take it slow
Now I've found the way to go Easy life don't go too fast

It wasn't all the same
But I'll do it again

And then there's "Leon", and again Daltrey is all gushy and tender and sentimental, but still trying to find some lead in his silver-lined career ("Tomorrow I'll be in Amsterdam - Told him the road was still as Tough as it was").

One Of The Boys, in other words, is a record that raises many doubts about Daltrey, the man without Townsend, and yet confirms the clarity and precision of his singing. It's also a subdued work musically, with "Avenging Annie" and "One Of The Boys" being the only fast-moving numbers. An almost adequate album in spite of everything, it gets my vote for Most Misleading Title of the Year. After all, more "boys" are banging away at their guitars in London town than ever.

Oakley proposes new approaches in course divisions

The Oakley proposal suggests another approach to the subject. First, a "great books" approach to allow members of all classes, divisions and departments to read and dicsuss on a range of books and topics, each student bringing his personal area of expertise into class.

The second part of his proposal is a "Men and Morals" course in which Oakley suggests the class take a "biographical approach" to the study of issues. For example, "the struggle from heteronomy to personal autonomy" through the study of such figures as Socrates, Sir Thomas Moore, John Stuart Mill, Soren Kierkegaard and Martin Luther King.

The final approach, "Modes and methods," might look at how history is approached by, for instance geologists, economists, or artists, or how a physicist and a literary critic perceive a given event.

Thompson Series begins with Orford String Quartet

The Orford String Quartet, direct from Canada, will inaugurate the Thompson Concert Series at Williams College on Saturday, October 1, 1977, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Sponsored by the Williams College Music Department, the Quartet will provide music by two Canadian composers, Sir Ernest MacMillan and Harry Freedman, as well as two Beethoven quartets.

The twelve year old Quartet boasts four exceptional young musicians: violinists Andrew Dawes and Kenneth Perkins, violist Terence Helmer, and cellist Marcel St-Cyr. The Quartet, under the tutelage of Prof. Lorand Fenyves, grew out of meetings at Les Jeunesses Musicales' summer camp at Mount Orford, Quebec. Its many tours have spanned three continents, often under the auspices of the Canada Council and the Department of External Affairs.

The Quartet teaches at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Music, where it has been "Quartet-in-Residence" since 1968, and devotes much of its free and summer time to master classes and to working with promising young string players. The Quartet has been the recipient of numerous awards, including the $20,000 Molson Prize, presented by the Canada Council to "recognize and encourage outstanding contributions in the arts, humanities or social sciences."

Although their music is undoubtedly international in appeal, there is a distinctly Canadian flavor to the ensemble. The Two Sketches for Strings, by Sir Ernest MacMillan (1893-1973), is based on French-Canadian airs taken from the collection, Folk Songs of French Canada, edited by Barbeau and Sapir and published by the Yale Press in 1925. MacMillan wrote two versions, for orchestra (which Ozawa has conducted for a Columbia recording) and for string quartet. The first of the two sketches traces the legend of Christ disguised as a beggar; the second depicts the busy life of the Breton port of St. Malo, from where many of Canada's early settlers, including Jacques Cartier in 1534, had come. MacMillan was the first professor of music at the University of Toronto and was for twenty-five years the conductor of the Toronto Symphony. He was probably the most influential and best known Canadian musician of his generation.

Although Harry Freedman was born in Poland, in 1922, Canadians consider him one of their own. His family went first to Alberta when he was three years old, and then to Manitoba, and all of his musical training and background is thoroughly Canadian. For 24 years he was English horn player in the Toronto Symphony; and in 1949 he was awarded a Tanglewood scholarship to study composition with Messiaen and Copland.

Freedman has written in virtually every form, and his music shows the change from his early tonal period to later serial and chance elements of style. Graphic 2, which will be played at Williams, is one of a series of pieces for different performing media, all of them being aleatory. This particular selection, written in 1972, calls for members of the quartet to whisper, hum, and shout, as well as using such instrumental devices as oddly tuned strings, microtones, and harmonic glissandi.

Film Review

Russell in Love

Tonight the Williams Film Society presents the first and only double bill of the season. Women In Love and The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie are set in a world far more alien to us than the imaginative banality of Star Wars—Britain of the exotic, decadent 1930's. Both films are based on books, and the deft screen adaptations point out the dangers of giving flesh to literary characters and situations.

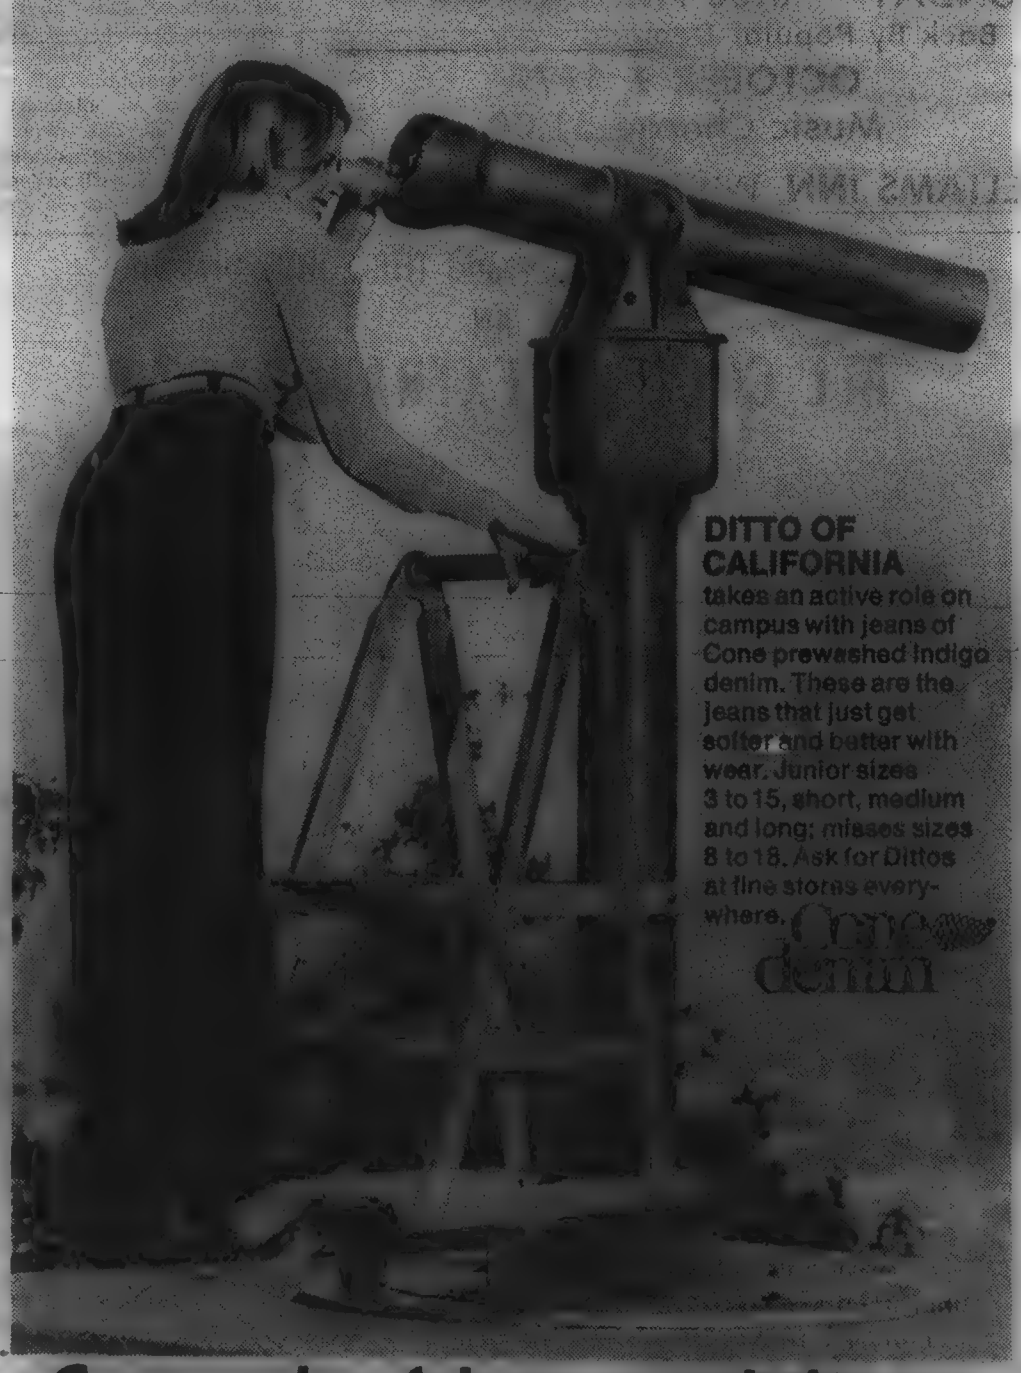
The purely cinematic impact of Ken Russell's Women In Love seems to place that film far beyond its literary reference or even its literary meaning. The D. H. Lawrence novel of two sisters and their lovers probes their psychosexual insides in search of essential selves, but Russell's flamboyant, self-indulgent style makes us suspect that the only self he's concerned with is his own.

His later career justifies our suspicions. He will develop this extravagant, no-holds-barred cinematic techniques beyond all sense in Wagnerian grotesques like Mahler and Savage Messiah. It will then more clearly mirror his conceptions, which all tend to be lush, startling, and impressionistic.

These later films are also totally silly. Their theme is Russell's egomanic infatuation with the passions of the suffering artist as the inspired idiot-savante. But it doesn't take a very keen sense of movie history to peel the swirling excesses of violent effect from Russell's stance to discern the genre he's working in—Hollywood's pablumized 'biographies' of tragic artists like Emile Zola and Sador Duncay: melodramatic schlock.

But Lawrence is perhaps even Russell-proof. In Women In Love, he stripped away realistic conceptions of character and relationship to reveal awesome, inchoate life-forces. The novel is perforce highly unrealistic; Lawrence deploys people against incidents in often stunning symbolism; and his dialogue is rich in poetic resonance.

Whatever his faults, Ken Russell cannot shoot a teacup without transforming it into an emblem. Even this is a fault—but not here. Lawrence wanted to transcend the commonplace by seeing in it a higher order of reality. Russell tends to destroy his movies by treating everyday incidents as Truth Revealed. But the big scenes of Women In Love are supposed to be exactly that. Even normal speech is oddly epigrammatic and insinuating—it sounds like the Jungian subconscious.



It's most fortunate that Russell told this to the cast, but unlikely—they probably ignored his orders and read the book anyway. Otherwise, we'd be hopelessly confused by the spectacle of some of the screen's finest actors not acting, but depicting. They don't develop or respond normally—instead, they give physical expression to Lawrence's messianic discovery of essential selves expressed in a symbiosis of the blood—sex.

Screen versions of classics dramatize decadence of 30's

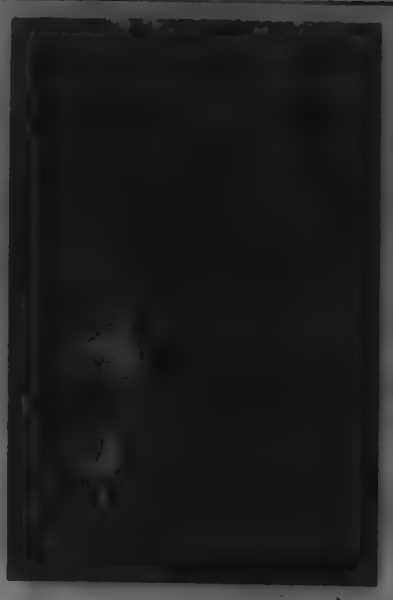
As Birkin, the Lawrence-character, Alan Bates can overcome his detached irony only in lyric highs like the celebrated 'plum' speech. But as Gudrun and Gerald, Glenda Jackson and Oliver Reed take over the picture. Jackson's poised self-control dispels any notion that she is merely a normal twenty-six year old woman—women don't develop that much dignity before forty, if ever. Her sex scenes are not erotic in our sense of the word. Instead, we see Lawrence's sense of the word—terrible and violent encounter; mystical union.

Compared to Russell's brayura, Ronald Neame's direction of The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie seems timid and stultified. Jean Brodie, a thirty year old spinster in chill Presbyterian Edinburgh, is fanatically devoted to inspiring her little girls, if not teaching them. In Muriel Sparks' short novel, Miss Brodie is a wry and witty caricature. But given flesh by Jay Presson Allen's generally competent screenplay, she acquires a real and menacing presence.

But that's precisely what makes this movie stumble over itself. Maggie Smith is too fine an actress to perform this haughty, bizarre eccentric without gaining our sympathy; she's rather like lovable crackpot Auntie Mame with a brogue instead of a drawl. She's the heroine, saying and doing funny endearing things with manic aplomb. There's only one way to approach a role like this: with brisk, highly mannered outrageousness. It's a star turn for the actress, a great show-role.



After rooting for Miss Jean for an hour, we find out that those horrible things people are saying about her are really true; that she's not just a harmless, deluded romantic; but a snobbish and destructive egoist. She says, "A guid begginin' makes a guid endin'." Aye, if only the revairsse didna hoold troo.

The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie avoids the emptiness of a showcase piece. Neame gets excellent and compelling performances from Celia Johnson and a flock of ingenuous bit players. (The titmouse of a secretary brought it all back to me. Ah, school days. . . .) And Robert Stephens' art instructor, with whom Miss Brodie once spent one night and fled, is almost an intimate part of her fantasy-world. Tellingly, he is the only person not dominated by her.

College's philosophy of diversity in housing.

"A coop housing system could run at cross-purposes with the residential housing system," Jankey acknowledged. Some students suggested that coop housing might relieve the growing demand for off-campus housing. Roosenraad said he felt coop housing would fill the demands of other students for independence and experience in cooking their own meals and doing their own maintenance.

Jankey commissioned Paul Sheils '76 to survey coop housing at various northeastern campuses over the summer. He examined such schools as Dartmouth, Trinity, Cornell, Hamilton-Kirkland and Smith and evolved a proposal for coop living at Williams. "I think it's sensible," Jankey said, "but we're not necessarily endorsing it yet."

Sheils' proposal focused on creating coop housing: organization by the Student Housing Committee, meetings of interested students and selection of students and houses.

A housing subcommittee evolved a more detailed plan last spring. It included a pilot program of 35 male and female students remaining associated with residential houses, converting two food satellite houses to coop houses. Selection would be complex in an effort to include a "random and diverse" membership while insuring those selected would form a cooperating group.

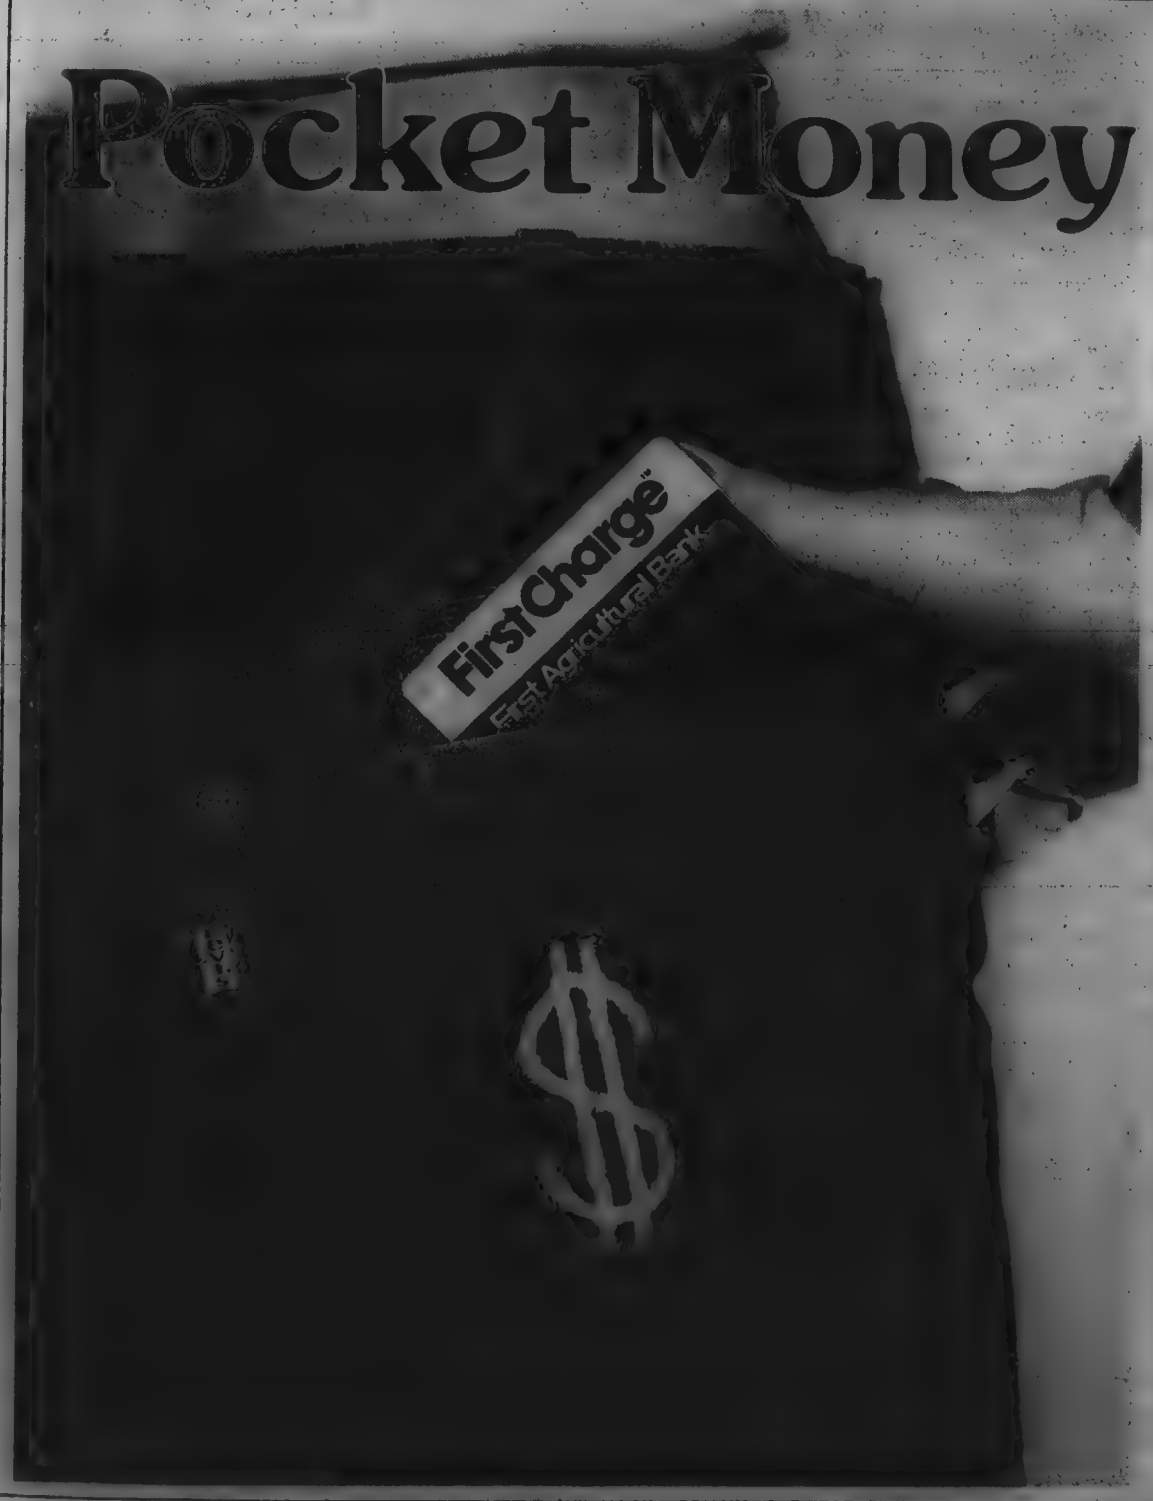
The Housing Committee will spend the next weeks evaluating and modifying these proposals, in conjunction with the CUL's coop housing subcommittee—chaired by Asst. Prof. Frances Kleinman—The CUL will draft the final proposition for the trustees.

"Every Man" confronts social norms

by Todd Tucker

Every Man for Himself and God Against Them All is one of the most powerful films released in recent years. The film boldly confronts and questions the value of the society it portrays. Every Man is, in many ways reminiscent of Truffaut's masterpiece, The Wild Child, in that it examines both the life of an individual and the culture which surrounds him.

Director Werner Herzog, one of the major figures in the German film Renaissance, opens his movie with an extremely lush image. We see a field of grain blowing in the wind and these first few frames constitute one of the few truly beautiful free-standing cinematographic sequences that I have ever seen.



From this starting point, the story moves quickly to its main plot: the life of Kaspar Hauser in the mid-nineteenth century. Kasper Hauser, heir apparent to the German throne, had been imprisoned in a cellar for fourteen years of his life. From the age of three until seventeen, he had not even been able to stand up. He had no contact with other human beings. His meals were brought to him while he slept. In short, Kaspar was unaware of any reality other than his own abject condition.

When he became seventeen, Kaspar was taught to stand and utter a single sentence and then released and left in a village square. The movie marvelously portrays his confrontation with various "civilizing" forces and institutions.

Herzog's view of society is filled with contempt. Taken from 'the screaming that men call silence,' Kaspar travels and learns many things. Yet he feels detached throughout and admits that he is only happy in bed. When on display at an upper class party, he is asked "What was it like inside your cave?" He replies that it is "better than it is out here." The absurdity of society is manifested in the social education that Kaspar receives.

The part of Kaspar is played with understanding and sympathy by Bruno S. This acting role has been the only one for this man whose personal life, in fact bears some resemblance to that of Kaspar Hauser. Bruno was himself abandoned in his childhood and his portrayal of Kaspar through his intellectual and spiritual maturation contains a sense of understanding and sympathy which is rarely communicated so effectively by an actor.

FirstCharge is a full-service credit card. It's good with hundreds of Berkshire merchants . . . the same ones that honor First Aggie Master Charge cards. The only difference is that FirstCharge is not valid outside the County. And remember, you receive 30 days interest free with FirstCharge and up to 90 days interest free on purchases over $100 with participating merchants.

In the event you don't have a full-time job, a co-signer may be required for your FirstCharge card. To get more information and your application for FirstCharge, just return the coupon. Middlebury comes to town

Panthers sport tough stats

by Tim Leyden

The scenario is like something out of a Hollywood western. The sort that you see on the late, late show and can't understand how the good guys ever won, much less always. Black Bart, the fastest gun in New England, is rollin' in on the noon train and he says he myself better "go for his gun".

Saturday afternoon, high noon will come a little late, 2 p.m. to be exact, just late enough to let Friday night's pizzas and grinders give way to lunch's hot dogs. And the bad guys will be wearing white, with shiny silver helmets, and boy are they good!

"On paper they're a superior football team," comments Bob Odell on the 1977 version of the Middlebury Panthers, "they're well-coached, quick, fast; part of a very fine program." The Vermonters cruised to an impressive 7-1 mark last season, losing only to Trinity, and the word is the Panthers are out for the big 8-0 this year.

Middlebury's fastest gunslingers are a pair of made-to-order running backs named Roy Heffernan and Jack Dobek. Heffernan has received reams of press copy in the last two seasons, most of it merited by his overwhelming stats, but Dobek is just as good, simply not as publicized.

Junior quarterback Matt Winslow is a sort of invisible team leader, who "throws well enough," according to Odell, but whose main purpose is to feed the pigskin to Heffernan and Dobek. The Panthers run from a double tight end formation much of the time, all the better to open holes with.

Defensively, the Panther front seven are all quick, talented veterans, with all sorts of talent and experience. Senior Bruce Johnson is the only steadying influence in a young secondary that could be Middlebury's only weakness. Middleguard Terry Quinn is a 6'3" 220-pounder whom chief Williams scout likens to Williams standouts Emmett Creahan and J. C. Chandler.

Middlebury has scored just three points against Williams in the last eight quarters of play, even though the last two contests have been in Middlebury. The Panthers broke loose for 56 easy ones in a rout of helpless Colby last week—so another 3-0 game seems unlikely, barring a monsoon, or tidal wave, or some such natural disaster.

Heffernan has been bruised, beaten, and battered by the Ephs in two games, getting 181 yards on 57 carries. The rugged two-sport star has to be hungry for a piece of Purple scalp for his mantlepiece. Dobek's Williams stats are similarly miniscule. He will undoubtedly be wielding a tomahawk as well.

Okay Ephdom, there you have it. Now all that remains is for the Williams squad to jog down to Weston Field and toss their athletic supporters out to the fifty-yard line and head for cover, right. Sure, Bob Odell, fresh from his 100th win and battling the only team which holds a winning record against him is going to roll over and play dead; a bunch of seniors who have tasted an unbeaten season (1975) are going to settle for an early-season trouncing just because Middlebury is so good; and those banshee, workhorse sophomores, juniors, and even freshman who helped beat Hamilton against all odds are going to give this one away.

Bullfeathers. For lack of a less polite term. If last week's thriller in the rain and mud of Hamilton is any indication of things to come, the 1977 version of the Williams Ephmen is going to be the type of team worth watching, the type of team not to be overlooked.

"We must have a complete defense turnaround," says Odell in preparation for the tussle, "we keyed very poorly last week, and we've worked on it." Linebackers John Thiel and Phil Shuman will start for the Ephs, backed by a secondary of Greg McAleenan (defensive player of the week), Mark Eckert, Mark Gerry, and Long Ellis. With Bill Couch out, Colin Hart moves to tackle, with Ralph Spooner taking over at nose. Pete Tuttle, Russ Gee, and Mike Masi round out the defensive starters, and frosh Brian Benedict expected to see a good deal of time.

Odell "is still undecided as to who he will start at quarterback," but Greg Collins and Bill Whelan have performed well and will both see action. Gus Nuzzolese joins Dave Massucco and Vernon Davis in the backfield as Scott Harrington is out three to four weeks.

Slippery Ken Hollingsworth (defensive player of the week) and Herb McConnack anchor the receiving corps, with Todd Eckerson, Jack Spound, Jay Skerry, Ken Schoetz, Steve Rogers, and Joe Maguire up front.

Odell and Williams were faced with an "impossible task" last year, in powerful Wesleyan. Odell made a few changes and presto, 34-7 Williams. Middlebury is good, that's for certain. But they simply aren't going to roll into Williamstown and pillage Weston Field, taking no prisoners. Whether Odell pulls another rabbit out of his hat and throws the book at Middlebury or the Ephs just get plain fired-up, the fur will fly. If you had only planned to go to the Amherst game this year, rearrange your schedule. Little Three or not, there's going to be some football played Saturday.

Williams Rugby's A-side defeated Albany Law 8-0, B-side lost 0-4, and the women won 12-0 despite the rain and mud last Saturday in Albany. The men play at home tomorrow while the women go to Boston.

Lady pucksters trim Trinity, 7-4

by Nancy Rhein

Linda Wilkins and her winning field hockey team stormed into Connecticut Wednesday gathering not only a 7-4 win, but crucial momentum going into Saturday's Yale match.

The first quarter of the game was dominated by the hosts as the Ephs adjusted to the soggy, slow field. Behind 2-0 after twelve minutes, the Ephs came alive as Monica Grady went in for an unassisted tally. Inner Val Corning responded minutes later scoring on a pass from Sally Kraft. Then it was Grady again, this time from Sue Wright, to close the half 3-2.

Later in the game, the team, which failed to score on numerous corners last week, began to convert its opportunities to goals. Edie Thurber scored on a short corner from Liza Olsen and within a minute Thurber set up another corner goal, put in by Kraft.

Williams stayed in control for the rest of the match, with Thurber connecting for the final tally with 1 second left. The 7-4 victory may be just what the team needs going into Saturday's contest against Yale. The Ephs, winless against the Elis, will take on their toughest competition at 11:30 as Yale makes its first visit to Cole Field.

Purple harriers shutout Middlebury in mud-run

by Frank Carr

As a prelude to tomorrow's Williams-Middlebury football clash, a group of eleven Ephmen pulled into Middlebury, Vt. on Wednesday and proceeded to demolish the opposing Panthers in their own mud. No, coach Bob Odell did not send his hungry d-EPH-ense to draw some pre-game blood, but instead the varsity cross country team decided to give the Northerners a taste of Purple Power before they even get near the Berkshires. The Eph runners accomplished their mission by shutting out the opposition 15-45.

The race turned into a fun run after a mile and one-half as purple harriers Joe Kolb, Frank Carr, Dan Sullivan and Tom Schreck coasted along in the lead with a 60 yard margin over the nearest opponent. Actually there were two runners ahead of the foursome, but they were from Plymouth State whose team showed up much to the surprise of the Ephs as well as the uninformed Middlebury coach. The Williams squad, however, was unconcerned with these men in green because they were officially racing only Middlebury. But, just to show that they play no favorites the Ephmen clobbered the Plymouth visitors as well.

The course, which "is great for cross country skiing when it's covered with a foot of snow", explained Middlebury's Dusty McNichol, slowed the purple foursome to a 28:56 clocking for the "somewhere around" 5 mile mud bath. Garrick Leonard completed the shutout as he splashed and slid into fifth place at 29:03. McNichol followed Leonard and then Mike Behrman entered the finish chute, his mud covered Nikes driving him to a seventh place effort in 29:28.

After a Middlebury trio completed the day's tour, Bud Bell and Larry Wu came home together in 11th, 41 seconds over the half-hour mark. Rusty Anderson added a 14th at an even 31 minutes, Jon Miller finished a minute later in 17th, and another 60 seconds ticked off before Dan Riley rounded out the purple placings in 20th.

Sailors resurface

The Williams Sailing Team astounded the eastern collegiate racing circuit by posting an impressive victory in a regatta held at Tufts last Saturday.

Skippers John Hammel and Jeb Boucher, and Crew Mark Robinson and Lisa Greene upset thirteen other New England schools, including such powerhouses as Yale, MIT, Harvard and Tufts, by amassing the lowest point total for the eight race series, including two firsts and three seconds. Williams' achievement seems even more remarkable since the Team races without the advantage of practice and instruction, which the other schools receive daily. The Sailing Team and Yacht Club was reorganized last year after a six year absence and is presently seeking funds for boats and practice facilities, perhaps located in Pittsfield.

Oarswoman to race on Charles

When Susan Tuttle '78 fastens her oar in an oarlock and goes out to race against 39 other women's crews at the annual Head of the Charles Regatta in Boston on Oct. 23, she will be racing against several members of her most recent team—the U.S. national squad.

Tuttle, who rowed in the U.S. eight in the World Rowing Championships in Amsterdam Aug. 26 through 28, was chosen through a camp selection process, during which coaches took 40 of the country's best female oarswomen and whittled that number down to 10—an eight and two spares.

Susan "Tut" Tuttle '78 sits in her Mission Park room in front of a Dutch rowing calendar which she purchased this summer while in Amsterdam as a member of the U.S. women's crew.

Although her boat finished seven out of seven, Tuttle attributes the poor performance to a lack of experience in the boat, which included only one veteran from the Olympic eight.

"I thought we would have done much better than we did," she said, explaining that the crew consistently rowed better—and faster—in practice than it did when placed in high-pressure racing situations.

For Tuttle, who has been rowing for eight years (four at Middletown, Conn., High School; four at Williams), selection to the national team capped two years of hard work. During her sophomore year, "Tut" (as she is known to teammates) trained twice a day in an almost-successful effort to make the Olympic Squad. Last summer the training paid off.

"It requires about two workouts a day over the winter," she said when asked her formula for success. "I saw the gym so much last year," she added with a grin.

In addition to rowing with the Williams women when Lake Onota was in its liquid state, Tuttle pursued a variety of activities, including, but not limited to, weightlifting, cross-country skiing, rowing on the ergometer, running and swimming. (This year, as in her sophomore and junior years, she was the Williams' women's number one breaststroker.)

Much of this work, of course, was done along with members of the Williams crew as part of that sport's regular training program.

That training program, done religiously, and the technical rowing training available at Williams were sufficient to win her a berth on the U.S. squad, Tuttle claimed.

If there is one difference between rowing at Williams and rowing in the national boat, she said, it is the degree of competitiveness of her fellow oarswomen.

Members of the national team, Tuttle said, would often spend their spare time with teammates from their colleges or universities trying to figure out what combination of athletes would make each college's boat fast enough to win the Eastern Championships in May of 1978.

Will she try out for the 1978 national team? Sue hesitates a moment and answers with a "maybe." The U.S. Women's Olympic Committee is in a sufficient state of disarray that no one yet knows how the '78 boat will be chosen, who will coach it, where it will train or how much financial support will be given to athletes for international travel, she explained.

"I can't afford a summer like this again," she stated. Out of an estimated $700 to $800 in expenses, Tuttle had to pay all but $150 and even that check for $150 has not yet arrived from the Olympic Committee, she said.

But, if she makes the team this year, Tuttle said she'd probably continue training in an effort to make the 1980 Olympic squad.

In addition to being a member of the '77 team, Tuttle was elected as a co-captain of that squad while it was training in Wisconsin.

"My first job was to go get towels. My second was to tell (coach) Jay (Mimier) that we were too tired to row seat races. My third was to ask for another workout off," she recalled.

A biology major, Tuttle plans to pursue some career in that field but has no definite plans for next year. After all, she may be in New Zealand rowing for the United States.

Golf squad swings past Albany, RPI

The Williams College golf juggernaut outclassed squads from Albany St. and R.P.I. Wednesday, as the steady Eph linksters carded a very respectable 395, beating Albany St. by 21 shots and R.P.I. by 36.

Ed "Big" Bousa, Bill Upton, and Dan Katz fired fine 78's in the difficult weather. Bousa has been a steady performer all year, and his score was no surprise. On the other hand, golf team members were ready to purchase tombstones for the collapsing Katz and Upton. However, both employed psychocybernetics to avoid severe mental collapse and come in with their usual showings.

Rounding out the scoring were Marcel Oudin and Doug "King" Chumbley. Oudin shot a steady 80, while Chumbley capped his wildly erratic round with a spectacular birdie on the eighteenth hole thrilling the Williams gallery.

Had it not been for an unfortunate train accident on the eighteenth tee, Bill Sprague would have figured prominently in the scoring. Despite the disaster, young Sprague shot 87, and will be counted on for steady play in the future.

Newly appointed trustee Diana Strickler '73

Trustees add Strickler, work with budget

The Board of Trustees elected Diana Hale Strickler '73 to the position of term trustee at their fall meeting Saturday, filling one of two vacancies created by the board in June.

Strickler, a student at Columbia University Graduate School of Business and an Alumni Administrator of the Tyng Bequest, begins her term immediately and will serve until June 1980.

The trustees also discussed this year's budget and the meeting Thursday between the trustee Committee on Campus Life and the student-faculty Committee on Black Students at Williams. The board also ratified nineteen faculty and administrative appointments and promotions at its Saturday meeting.

According to College President John W. Chandler, the trustees discussed the issues raised by the report to the faculty last June (published in the September 16 Record) on black students at Williams. The "key emphasis" of the discussion was on curricular changes to improve course offerings related to black involvement in history, he added.

Dean of the College Peter Berek described the meeting between the Committee on Black Students at Williams and the Committee on Campus Life on Thursday as "a very good and wide-ranging discussion" of the issues raised by the report, as well as questions to be studied by the committee this year.

No specific solutions were proposed, he said, through many speculative ideas were discussed. The trustees will receive regular progress reports from the committee throughout the year, added Berek.

Both Berek and Chandler commented that the trustees see their role as one of general oversight and encouraging "the faculty and administration to do as good a job as possible," in dealing with the issue, rather than direct action.

The trustees have no specific timetable for selecting a trustee to fill the one remaining vacancy created last June, said Chandler. The board feels it is "better to make a strong appointment than to meet any set deadline," he added

According to Chandler, specific criteria for trustee selection are still under discussion. A search committee composed of trustees Martha Wallace and Robert Geniesse '51 is currently looking for candidates for the last vacant position on the board. The next appointment will probably be a woman, said Chandler.

In selecting a trustee, the board looks for "personal qualities" such as "overall maturity of judgment, a capacity to stand back from issues and look at them objectively, and most importantly, an ability to devote a significant amount of time to the College."

He commented that Williams does not appoint trustees for prestige reasons, expecting instead "a very high priority commitment" from them.

The trustees also studied last week the performance of the budget last year and this year. Financial results for the 1976-77 year are not certain yet, but College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III '41 estimated that the College would "end up within a few thousand dollars of breaking even."

Chandler commented that the Colleges had to make some "small" adjustments in this year's budget due to "minor" changes in the number of students attending the College. Such adjustments are relatively commonplace, he added, and are not a problem.

He did not expect coming demographic shifts reducing the number of college students to affect Williams. "We have such a large safety margin here that it will not hurt us significantly," he said.

The trustees will not discuss the 1978-79 budget until January, said Chandler. He would not rule out the possibility of a tuition increase at that time for the 1978-79 year. "If inflation worsens, a tuition increase at some point will be inevitable," he commented.

The board also ratified a decision of the faculty last month concerning terms of employment of faculty in the physical education department.

Chandler praised a proposed exemption for educational institutions from a bill now in Congress to outlaw mandatory retirement contracts. He commented that unless the College's current mandatory retirement policy is allowed to continue (which the exemption would accomplish), current financial and hiring plans would be severely disrupted.

Non-binding recommendations

Council financiers continue talks

The Finance Committee decided preliminary budget recommendations for student organizations last Sunday.

First on the agenda was the Purple Key Society. The committee tentatively agreed upon a $400 budget. The preliminary budget suggestion for the Adelphic Speaking Union was $235, for speaking contests.

The Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) petitioned the Finance Committee for a total of $420. The ADA figured $350 of that total for the seven guest lecturers they want and the remaining $70 for covering the two films the organization has sought for this year.

Williams Independents wanted $50 to spend on publicity needs. The group has planned three panel discussions involving local individuals who will not charge, so more money was unnecessary. The Finance Committee consented to suggest a $40 budget to the College Council.

Williams Republicans requested $500 for two major speakers, $100 to pay for a retired U.S. representative to lecture and $30 for films. The Finance Committee's preliminary decision was to suggest the full $30 for the films and only half of the remaining requested money. One of the academic departments could cover for the U.S. Representative's fee, according to the Finance Committee. And should the Williams Republicans, or any other group, still feel in need of money to pay for speakers the Finance Committee suggested the Lecture Committee as a source.

Last year, because of ambiguities in the guidelines, political organizations were not clear about what they could do with the CC allocations. This year the terms are more specific. According to item six of the official council guidelines, no money is to be spent for political reasons. Campaigning and leafletting fall under that category, lecturers, do not.

The Finance Committee decided $865 would be adequate to cover expenditures for the magazines Williams Women wants to order for their library and for their proposed speakers.

The Committee recommended an $8000 budget for the Lecture Committee. Five thousand dollars would go towards campus speakers suggested by students or departments and the remaining $3000 would be for unrestricted uses.

The final organization to come before the Finance Committee was the Dance Society. The financiers tentatively allocated $2800 for the society's concert series. In addition, $50 would be spent on stationery.

Finds traces of family life

Gutman defies normal idea of slave society

by Tim Jones

Slave families, contrary to historical belief, were not only stable and long-lived but also governed by a strict code of moral and social order, said Professor Herbert G. Gutman at his lecture, "The Historical Development of the Black Family" last Thursday evening in Jesup Hall Auditorium.

Gutman, Professor of History at City College of New York, is the author of The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom, 1720-1925.

Gutman refuted the idea that study of the slave family was virtually impossible due to a "lamentable dearth of information." Some historians have asserted that they "cannot see clearly that the slave family existed" at all.

Using a plantation birth register found in Good Hope, South Carolina, Gutman cited conclusive evidence of a "developing slave kinship system." From 1720-1860 owners used the register to record the names of all parents and their newborn slave children.

The slave's lifestyle was, in Gutman's words, "neither prudish nor promiscuous." Though premarital sex took place, "all women ultimately settled into permanent homes." Women with children born out of wedlock were socially obliged to find husbands. In this way Gutman proved that "the absence of legal restraints did not mean that a code of moral and social behavior did not exist."

During the period chronicled in the plantation register, an "enlarged and interwoven kinship structure emerged." Marriage and blood ties served to create the underpinning of the slave culture." This culture included attitudes toward work, sex, religion, slave ownership, and marriage that slaves passed from generation to generation.

Marriage between first cousins was taboo at the Good Hope Plantation as it was at many of the slave communities in the South. At the same time, Gutman contended, nearly all of the major slave owning South Carolinian families tended to marry within their own circle of blood.

Herbert G. Gutman dispelled popular myths about slave families in his lecture Thursday evening. (photo by Giedhill)

Adelphic Speaking Union resurfaces

Speakers win at Suffolk University

A three man team representing the dormant interest in public speaking at Williams received an award for overall team performance in the Suffolk University Individual Speaking Events Tourney in Boston last Saturday.

Peter Stark, Bruce Goerlich and Jeff Trout, captain of debate, participated in the first effort of the recently organized Adelphic Speaking Union at Suffolk University. According to Trout, the Union hopes to sponsor a freshman speaking contest and an all-campus event and participate in three or four more debates with other colleges before the end of the semester.

Trout and President of the Society Michael Golden, who was active in the Williams Adelphic Union before it became defunct two years ago, plan to call an organizational meeting to interest freshmen and Adelphic Union veterans in the new speaking group sometime next week. Trout said, "We hope to make the Society an informal but active group. We are looking primarily for those who have had experience in high school or college debate but those who are willing to spend some time with more experienced speakers to learn the technique are welcome."

Speaking events generally engage in two types of exercises: team debate and individual events. A team usually consists of two people who speak to a specific topic, of national or common interest, in a specified amount of time. Individual speakers may make persuasive, informational, extemporaneous, interpretive or after dinner speeches in competition. The Adelphic Speakers will participate in both categories.

Letters: BSU defense and grade inflation expose black pride

To the editor:

As a fledgling member of the Williams College Black Student Union I know very little of its history or accomplishments. Nevertheless, I find myself here, at Williams, for less than a month and I can hardly express the beauty I perceive in the very existence of such an organization. Its beauty is to be found in its provision of consistent intraracial comraderie, something I treasure very much in this isolated, rural setting.

Perhaps one could legitimately call the B.S.U. racist, militant, activist, or separatist if one were dealing in conventional American ideals, but realities are seldom as clear cut and simplistic as the idealistic concepts of "equality" and "justice." One might also remember that we haven't come quite as far as we would like to think we have come since the days of lynchings and cross burnings. The essence of the B.S.U. manifests itself in several forms but it is seldom, if ever, laid out in terms that white people can understand. I believe that just one word is sufficient to spell out the unity in concept that has carried the black man in America through three hundred years of perpetual martyrdom and continues to carry him through the kind of hypocritical liberalism he encounters on hundreds of college campuses just like this one. The word is, of course, pride.

It is difficult to explain to the white liberal the cultural bond created by the color of one's skin. It is difficult for me to explain to my white friends the truth and beauty I find in the "vulgar" humor of Richard Pryor. It is difficult for me to explain how a people can be so oppressed and so wretched and yet be as creative as any Renaissance artist, as proud as any conquering Roman emperor, and as noble as any medieval monarch. As no white scholar would admit, it is difficult to convince people (even black people) that Black African culture is pervasive in every aspect of western civilization. But when I consider the manifold contribution that my people have made to this society the pride just swells up within my breast to a point where I could just burst out and cry to the whole world, "Look at me, I am black, I am beautiful, I am alive, I am important."

But white America does not hear my cries of joy and anguish. It is deeply ingrained in the subconscious that we are still savages, still inferior, still animals to be treated as such. So when I want to express my pride, when I want support, when I need to renew my cultural heritage and find solace in its denial, where do I go? To my white friends? I think not. As altruistic and kind and well meaning as they all are, they don't even recognize the prejudice within themselves. I truly believe that they want to accept me for what I am, but being black is a very vital part of what I am that is not really so easy for them to accept. So how can I share my "blackness" with them and have them understand? I love them all dearly but I would be asking the impossible.

We the black students of Williams College, need each other. We need to remember who we are, what we are, where we came from, and, most of all, what we must strive to be. An important part of the B.S.U. is perceiving the prejudice that exists and denying it the right to exist. But the essential virtue to be found in our unity is the celebration of ourselves, the fact that we are still black, we are still beautiful, and, most of all, we are still here. We must never let this be forgotten.

by David Barnes

Now that the school year is a few weeks old, let us take this opportunity to assess some of the changes which have taken place. We will not be concerned with minor alterations such as the Chapin extension; for this article will concentrate on those elements which will have major effects upon the way of life at Williams. For example, I was slightly disappointed when I returned to Williamstown to learn that Constantine, the infamous playboy pizza magnate, had not bought Diau's Deli or any one of our three record stores. But I have been informed by a certain illegal alien who is close to the 'Big C,' that he plans to open the First National Greek Orthodox Agricultural Bank sometime this fall.

Meanwhile, down at the Log, Claudia Lindsey was heard stating (in between dances with members of the Irish soccer team) that besides the new T.V. screen, she did not intend to disrupt the popular Gene Falk atmosphere. She did, however, deny all reports that she had recently purchased a pair of horn-rimmed glasses and was trying to grow a beard.

What did you think of our new cheerleaders' debut performance at Saturday's fiasco? My sources in the Williams Women's Organization told me that they were very pleased to see that the squad was not comprised of cutesy girls with short skirts and 'big American breasts'. But why stop there? To avoid conflicts with any of the college organizations, I propose that an inter-racial squad of bisexual cheerleaders be formed, to be made up both attractive and ugly people (short skirts optional).

Inflation

To the editor:

After reading the annual "Grade Inflation" article splashed across the front page of the Record for the fifth straight year, I'm beginning to be mildly amused. You see, a quick analysis of the data presented in your article shows that "grade inflation" has been escalating at the phenomenal rate of almost 0.6 per cent per year for the last 24 years (Jimmy Carter should be so lucky!) Why, that's a veritable scandal! Just think, if the proper authorities don't move now to stomp out grade escalation before it's too late, the average grade of a Williams student will be a 12.0 in a mere 33 years! I know the thought of this pressing problem has been keeping my current undergraduate friends away from Sawyer in droves, and they will be relieved to see that this very relevant problem has been exposed in the Record. I hope that the Record staff keeps up the good work by next documenting what a great deal all Williams undergraduates have by living within walking distance of the benevolent "Spring Street Merchants." Until then What's new at the Log or What hath Claudia wrought?

by Ann Morris

Every Williams student knows about the Log. It's the place you head for after spending all night cooped up in a tiny cubicle in the library doing calculus. Or it's the place where your fun-loving roommate drags you when you're ready to hit the sack. Perhaps it's where your dear old dad, who still wears his Class of '50 sweatshirt, socializes when Williams hosts Amherst. Whatever the Log is, one thing's for sure, you'll certainly end up there more than once in the course of the next eight months.

The Log is the scene of many changes this fall. Most dramatic, of course, is the addition of the big screen. Bought on President Chandler's orders, the screen, six feet on the diagonal, was installed in the main room. Although many people feared television would destroy the atmosphere of the pub, manager Claudia Lindsey, '77 said it seems to be working out well.

Lindsey admitted that when the screen is on, it can tend to be "mesmerizing." She is determined to limit the amount of time when the screen can be used to please students who enjoy their beer without television. Typically, the screen is used only for big sporting events. A television is available in the side room for watching other programs, she pointed out.

To accommodate the televised sports schedule, the Log now opens on Sunday afternoons at 1:00 p.m. and on Monday nights for the weekly football game. Lindsey said she hopes that the extended hours will bring more students to the Log more often.

"Hopefully, faculty and staff members will visit more frequently," she added, "as the Log was created to encourage interaction between all members of the College community."

Other changes at the Log are less striking. This year, along with the "specials" nights for certain classes and residential houses, there will also be a faculty-student night, when discounts will be given to both partners if they arrive together. New brands of beer may be added, if students make suggestions. Imported beer is also a possibility, but the lack of adequate refrigeration may keep Williams from going truly international. The Log will also continue, in true Williams tradition, to award a free pitcher of beer to all students on their 18th birthday.

Presently the Log serves only snack foods: pretzels, beer nuts, fritos, etc. Expanding the food service to include sandwiches or other more substantial items, as it did some years ago, would be impractical, Lindsey explained. The kitchen facilities are inadequate, and the venture would probably lose money as before. She does promise to serve some speciality foods, such as soft pretzels or hot dogs, on certain occasions. These nights will be publicized well in advance.

The Log's expenditures and income for 1976-77 came much closer to meeting than in the past, according to Lindsey. She attributed the lower "red" figure to Genie Falk's good management of the past two years.

The Log is waging an all out campaign to diversify its activities, in hopes of involving more students, Lindsey said. Its side TV room, which has always been available for meetings or parties, is now being offered to freshman or upper class houses entries for Sunday night snacks. For more ambitious, or simply hungrier entries, the entire Log facility can be reserved for a pot luck dinner. Lindsey concluded that she is interested in students who could perform for a night, since finding suitable entertainment is always difficult.

Finally, Ross Keller, the head of food services, announced a revolutionary new food plan today. The Keller Plan, as Ross calls it, is very similar to its counterpart in the psychology department. The basic premise of this plan is that now a student does not have to eat a meal until he or she feels ready for it, however, when that decision is made the ENTIRE meal must be eaten. Ten complete meals must be consumed by the end of the semester in order for the student to be admitted to the final guest meal which will be comprised of random samples of previous menus. Since the announcement, various strategies on how to handle the new plan have arisen. My advice is to wait until the end of the semester and then cram the ten meals down in rapid succession, thus insuring that the material will be fresh in your minds (and stomachs) for the final.

Well, that's all for now. Here's hoping that your news is good news, but keeping in mind that no news is good news, so here's hoping that your news is no news.

Williams Waterfights Part I

by Jonn Sonnett

This is the first of two articles concerning the pleasures and pitfalls of Freshman water fighting.

"Water, water, everywhere, Nor any drop to drink."

—Coleridge's Armored Mariner

The casualties: two mild concussions, one possibly broken nose, two pairs of chipped teeth, and two stitches. No, this is not an article about a hockey game.

The styles of dress: "We had on scarves and weird hats . . ." "We all dressed up in gym shorts and striped shirts . . ." "Some of us were in our nightgowns . . ." No, this is not an article about orgies on campus.

The weapons: baby powder, deodorant sprays, shaving cream, perfume, Vaseline, pillows (it's still not an orgy), water, water, and water—water in buckets and garbage cans and water balloons and even tennis ball cans. You guessed it: this is an article about freshman water fights.

The origin of these exchanges of large portions of the Hoosic River is unknown. The relevance of water fighting to a liberal arts education is a question no one even bothers to ask. Why are they there, these wild and watery gatherings of the rowdy?

"It's a helluva lot of fun," said an inhabitant of Lehman.

"They're exciting," said a woman from Williams F.

"There's some excellent ass-kicking," said an unidentified frosh.

The freshman water fights are based upon dormitory alliances. Each dorm does its best to throw terror into the hearts of its opponents and various liquids into their dorms. Devotion to your dorm and dorm-mate is an absolute necessity if you wish to succeed in the world of nocturnal liquification excursions.

The loyalty of those at Williams A and Sage E is typical—but by no means exhaustive—of the emotions of all involved. "Entry A is A-1 in water fights," boasted one occupant. "We're the acknowledged champ," proclaimed an inhabitant of Sage.

While the girls' entries tend to favor raids of the perfume and powder variety, the men tout the virtues of the "universal solvent"—water. Wrestling water-filled garbage cans across the Quad to drench the (hopefully) unsuspecting inhabitants of the enemy dorm seems a vicious undertaking, but these courageous young men are still proponents of chivalry and fair play.

"We don't hit rooms at all—we try not to—unless they leave their windows open," said one modern-day Sir Galahad. Another moralist voiced his objections to internal irrigation in this manner. "We're going to stop the inside-the-room stuff," he said. "It's not in the spirit of good water-fighting."

The limits on HIJ distribution are understandable when one considers that a wet stereo cannot be salvaged with a blow-dryer, but there is another unwritten rule of water fighting. "J.A. rooms are off grounds," said an inhabitant of a freshman dorm who, strangely enough, is not a freshman. The above rule was unintentionally violated during a flour raid on Sage C, but the offenders did penance by spending the next morning cleaning up and apologizing.

The role of the J.A. in the frenzied freshman forays is a unique one. (Note that J.A.'s invariably use the royal "we" when speaking to reporters). "We have a role in both encouragement and moderation," one fence-straddling J.A. solemnly intoned. "Neither of us has been physically involved in any fights," he continued. When asked to elaborate on his actual role, the J.A. replied with all the suavity—but none of the accent—of Henry Kissinger, "I am more or a technical adviser."

Other J.A.'s felt that the interference of those outside the student population was unwarranted. "I think the security guards should stay out of the water fights," insisted one J.A. It is possible that the security guard soaked with a bucket of water during a Quad melee would agree.

Every J.A. is proud of the efforts expended by their tutees. When asked whether the impulse to indulge in water fights was due to J.A.'s explicit recommendations, one J.A. insisted on affirming underclassman initiative. "We were really happy . . . it was spontaneous." Another J.A. was even more lavish in his praise for his proteges: "We think the guys are doing one helluva job."

Dwyer sings tonight

Terry Dwyer, baritone, assisted by Paula Ennis, piano will perform in Thompson Memorial Chapel this evening at 8:30 p.m. The program will consist of three arias from G. F. Handel's Vier Ernste Gesange, Opus No. 121 by Brahms, Trois Cahns Chansons de France by Debussy, Ravel's Don Quichotte a Dulcinee, and an aria by Verdi, Credo in un Dio.

Dwyer, baritone, is a graduate of Indiana University's school of music from which he holds a M.M. in vocal performance. A resident of Albany, N.Y. where he is a member of the Capital Artists Opera Co,, he is a voice instructor at Union College, Schenectady, N.Y., Hartwick College, Oneonta, N.Y., and beginning this fall at Williams College. This past summer he was the bass soloist in Cantata No. 140, Wachet Auf by J. S. Bach at the Aspen Music Festival and has appeared as soloist under the batons of Boris Goldovsky and Robert Shaw. Aside from operatic appearances in Don Pasquale, La Boheme, Carmen and The Telephone among others, he has given several recitals in the upstate New York area. He will also appear as soloist in the March 4th concert of Mozart's Mass In C Minor with the Williams College Choral Society.

Paula Ennis is a faculty member at the State University of New York in Albany, N.Y. where she is an instructor in piano. Likewise a graduate of Indiana University where she is completing her Doctorate in Music in piano, she is a student of Menahem Pressler. A former Fulbright scholar, she has performed extensively in upstate New York and in several western states. Last spring, she appeared with cellist Douglas Moore, Associate Professor of Music at Williams, in a recital at the Clark Art Institute.

The concert this evening is sponsored by the Music Department and there will be no admission fee.

Martin Best, "A Troubador for Today," will perform at the Clark Art Institute Thursday night.

Modern-day troubador sings at Clark Inst.

A modern-day troubador, Martin Best, will present a concert of folk songs, traditional ballads, song cycles, etc. at the Clark Art Institute on Thursday, October 6, at 8:00 p.m.

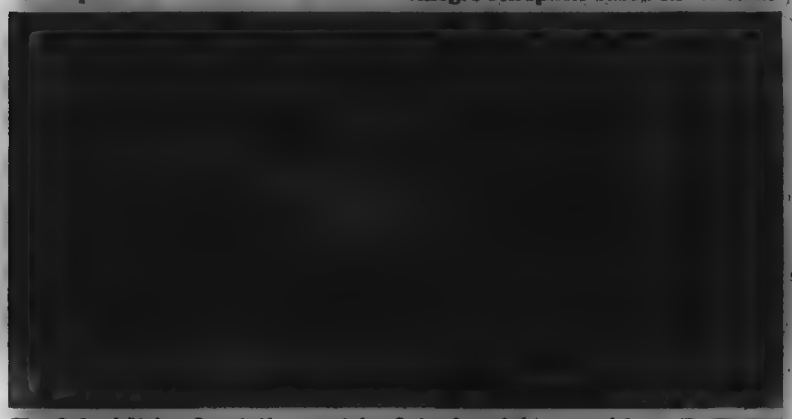
Martin Best's repertoire ranges from the intense cansos of the 12th century troubadors through Renaissance Europe to the world of 17th and 18th century guitar song to present-day folk song; flamenco, and Beatles melodies. His program this Thursday is divided into five parts. The first, entitled, The Seeds of Love: The Troubador in Tradition, includes works from England, Scotland, Ireland, and Kentucky. Ages of Chivalry: The Historical Troubador incorporates representative music from the 12th to 18th centuries. Songs by Joni Mitchell and Lennon-McCartney form part of the section called The Commercial Troubador. The final two sections involve the songs of Carl Mikael Bellman (1740-1795) and poems by Walter de la Mare set to music by Best.

Tickets for the performance cost $1.00 for students, $2.50 for general public, and are on sale at the Clark Art Institute and at Harts' Pharmacy.

Orford quartet plays for sparse Chapin crowd

by Peter Meyers

The Orford String Quartet presented a typically balanced program of 'old standbys' and newer music last Saturday night in Chapin Hall. Sandwiched between two Beethoven quartets (No. 2 and No. 10) were two pieces by two twentieth century Canadian composers, Ernest MacMillan (1893-1973) and Harry Freedman (1922-). This programmatic technique, usually intended to insure an audience for the more 'difficult' music, was wasted in this instance on a poor turnout. An interesting aleatory effect was added to the overall program with the infiltration of sounds from the Star Wars party into all of the available sonic spaces.



The quartet played quite well, particularly after the warm-up Beethoven, although I found them somewhat cold at times. All four players are skillful craftsmen and together may form an homogeneous ensemble; with good group intonation and an appealing approach to the dynamics of voicing. The overall ensemble dynamics felt somewhat contrived to me, a notable exception being the Freedman piece.

Ernest MacMillan's "Two sketches for String Quartet on French Canadian Tunes" (1926) is divided into two movements; the first an Andante tranquillo based on "Notre-Seigneur en pauvre", the second an Allegro con spirito based on "A Saint-Malo". The Andante is essentially a song-theme and elaborations—with long, even phrases which have been carefully measured to maintain the vocal quality of the tune. In a format which is rhythmically and harmonically somewhat static, MacMillan produces a gentle sense of movement through variation of texture.

After opening with a solo vs. accompaniment setting of the tune, the other voices are developed gradually. As the solo part moves from one instrument to another it is woven into an increasingly contrapuntal texture, reaching a climax with the 'cello in the lead. The Allegro has the feel of a quick contradance tune, and the constructive concept is similar to that of the Andante, except the primary emphasis is now the metamorphosis of a series of rhythmic overlays into a more traditional quartet texture at the end. The overall use of musical materials is oriented towards simple polytonality, particularly with respect to harmony; an approach which tends to respect the source of the tune, at the same time utilizing some of the musical language of the time.

Harry Freedman's "Graphic II for String Quartet" (1972) is a through composed piece on one movement. Although rather simplistic in form, the piece is a skillful conglomeration of techniques gleaned from a wide range of sources; most notably, to my ears, Bartok, Crumb and Xennakis. A high degree of craftsmanship and an open attitude to source material is not surprising from a student of Messiaen; nor is a simplistic approach to form surprising from a student of Copland. Freedman studied with both. All things considered, the piece worked quite well; while not spectacular, it formed a comfortable bond between the performers and the audience.

Finally, Beethoven was his old stalwart self, eliciting a chuckle from Dr. Stephen Dankner (Williams' resident disco composer) during the Presto of Quartet No. 10.

The Orford String Quartet's repertoire Saturday night ranged from Beethoven to twentieth century Canadian composers.

some fingers on the shot, but the ball hit one goalpost, ricocheted across to the other one, and finally dribbled into paydirt.

"Up to this point play had been fairly even," Coach Jeff Vennell remarked. "But after that they began to get aggressive and mount more attacks." Forward Friborg's conversion of a Pete Mayo pass made it 3-1 at the 25:13 mark, but with just 22 seconds in the half the Purple's heart was broken when Dutchman Mark Lecker parlayed a Williams defensive lapse into Union's second score.

The Dutchmen came out running in Half II and proceeded to rewrite the book on Winning Through Intimidation. Three late goals and lots of crushing play gave them a 5-3 lead with 15:13 left. Henry Osborne answered for Williams with a header at 5:30, but time ran out on the frustrated Ephs before further amends could be made.

Another defeat came at the grassy hands of the Middlebury Panthers on Saturday. With trailer Osborne sidelined with injuries the Ephs switched to a 3-forward, 3-halfback formation, but midfield play suffered anyway and the good guys were lucky to escape the first half with the score knotted at 0.

Middlebury's gamewinner came 19 seconds into the second half. Chip Doubleday, a high school All-American last fall, lofted a 35-yard cross-pass at the Williams net. Loeffler took a desperate backdive at the ball, but it floated over his head and into the side of the net. Awakened, rather than stunned, by the sudden score, the Eph runners took command and dominated second half action when the inscrutable officials—"poor, poor" in Vennell's judgment—weren't halting it for some reason or other. "We should have scored at least three times," said Vennell. Williams came closest when Nelson's head ball struck the goalpost with eight seconds left.

Women's tennis 2-2

by Ryan Reed

When a team loses as many matches in one week as it lost in the past three years combined, the prophecy of Chicken Little might seem at hand. But you won't find the women's varsity tennis team and coach Curt Tong scurrying for cover despite the two 7-2 blows delivered by Trinity and Yale last week, evening Williams' record at 2-2.

Both Trinity and Yale fielded seasoned teams with several outstanding players. "The only way to get better," said Tong after the Trinity struggle, "is to play these good teams." The Ephwomen did look better later in the week against Yale with a showing Tong termed "the best we've played all year."

Traditionally, the only loss Trinity suffers in its season is to Williams. The Bantoms were able to avenge last year's 5-4 loss on the strength of three returning exchange players and six seniors overall. Although equally skilled, Trinity's experience dominated the match.

Williams dropped all six singles matches, winning only one set. Freshman No. six Laura Goebel captured the first set of her match, only to be outfought in the next two, 1-6, 6-4, 6-4. Ann Morris, the other freshman in the top six at No. four, dropped her match 6-2, 6-4, while No. three Trudie ten Broeke was in her match for a time before she succombed 7-6, 6-0.

Sally Kruse and Amy Sterling remained undefeated at No. one doubles with a 6-4, 7-5 victory. Also scoring a hard earned win was the No. three team of Kristan Dale-Mary Tom Higgs as they hung on for a 2-6, 7-5, 6-2 triumph.

Yale possessed too much strength and firepower for the Ephs to overcome. Captain Laura Carson fell to a top junior player 6-1, 6-1. At No. two, Becky Chase was dropped by a ranked Floridian 6-0, 6-2, while Sherry Willcox played well but was overwhelmed at No. five.

As in the Trinity match, Williams' two wins came in doubles. This time, however, the No. two duo of Amy Demorest-Sherry Edman won while Kruse-Sterling suffered their first defeat. A win at No. 3 left freshmen Dale and Higgs undefeated on the year.

Tigers destroy purple squad

on running plays to the outside was outstanding. Ends Russ Gee and Mike Masi contained well, and Greg McAleenan was all over the field, as usual. Linebackers John Thiel and Brain Benedict read Heffernan and Dobek to perfection, only to be burned by Mr. Turner.

Offensively, it seems Williams was hurt by a number of problems. First, neither Greg Collins nor Bill Whelan, while both working effectively enough to avoid being beaten out, has really been able to win the quarterback job. Second—Odell, already buried under ten seasons worth of injuries in the past two, has lost one key performer after another—the most recent sophomore tackle Jack Spound with a jammed knee. Third—Youth. In a word, the Ephs are inexperienced, causing mental errors and fumbles to come in bunches and at bad times.

Trailing 14-0 in the third period of Saturday's contest, Williams came to life behind Collins and Whelan. The Ephs penetrated into Middlebury territory four straight times in the stanza, only to fall victim to a pumped-up Middlebury front three. Even with relatively untested Vernon David and John Chance at setbacks, the Ephs moved on the ground effectively.

Sophomore fullback Gus Nuzzolese ran straight through a whole bunch of would-be tacklers, for nearly 60 yards in the first period alone. He's a good foundation for the offense, as the fullback in almost any type of set.

The jury is certainly still out on the Williams Ephs of 1977, six games remain, with perhaps one weak opponent (Bowdoin) in the lot. The improving defense will need adjustments, with Mark Eckert, victim of a knee injury, lost for the season. Middlebury, like Hamilton the week before, is history, Odell and his Purple Cows must now look ahead to six weeks of learning and improving. Trinity (2-0, of course) is next.

Middlebury mauls Ephmen

by Tim Lawden

First Middlebury possession of the game: Bruce Jonnson fields a Greg McAleenan punt and races all the way down to the Williams 15. Given such handsome field position, the Panthers smash over just four plays later, as Paul Turner goes in from the two.

Second Middlebury score: Following a Greg Collins fumble on the Williams 22, the visitors take four plays to score on a 17-yard pass from quarterback Matt Winslow to Jay Moore.

Third Middlebury score: The invaders find themselves in business at the Williams 36, following a Long Ellis fumble of a Roy Heffernan punt. Four plays later Heffernan charges home from the eight and the issue is settled.

Given that Middlebury, very possibly on the way to 8-0, led only 7-0 at the half and not close to getting an offense untracked, the final score of 27-0 was not truly indicative of type of game involved.

"They're one of the finest college football teams we've ever played," lamented Bob Odell after the loss "we just made so many errors." Williams fumbled nine times in the contest, losing four, and had two passes intercepted by the hungry and talented visitors.

The 4,000 or so faithful who braved the rain and early autumn winds of Weston Field Saturday came with a curiosity as to how good Middlebury really was, and if maybe Williams was better than anyone thought. Only one of those questions was answered to any extent.

Certainly the Middlebury Panthers rate with the Williams bandwagons of '74, '75, and according to Odell, "it will take a heckuva game by somebody to beat them." Heffernan and Jack Dobek were to be the entire offense—but along comes Paul Turner to ramble for 120 yards, and what about that defense!

Linebackers Duane Ford and Skip D'Aliso must eat raw meat all week, and then starve Friday. The Ephs are still looking to block middleguard Terry Quinn, and the secondary is adequate enough to keep Coach Mickey Heinecken from resorting to grants-in-aid for Otter Valley Union High School hotshots.

So, when all is said and done, and the baseball team has cleaned up the last Tango bottle from under the Weston Field bleachers, the fact remains: Middlebury is a damn good team—but what about Williams. After all, the score was just 7-0 at the half and could well have been 0-0. Big old bad Middlebury was not blowing the Ephs off the field by any means.

"We had a few individual breakdowns near the end of the game," said Odell, "but I thought the defensive coaches did an outstanding job. Middlebury knew they had been in a ballgame." Indeed, following Middlebury's opening opportunistic score, the first half was a constant exchange of punts.

Booters bumped: Twice tried twice denied

by Mark Pogue

Disappointment hung in the air after the debut of Williams' varsity soccer team last week. The Eph-booters opened their season against two teams they felt they could handle, Union and Middlebury, and lost twice. Narrowly.

Thursday's 5-4 loss at Union was an especially bitter pill for the Purple to swallow. Originally scheduled for Wednesday, the game was called off at the last minute when Williams received a phone call from Union with news that the field was unplayable. Many of the players, sensing Union's move to be a retaliatory gesture for Williams' prominent role in exposing Union recruiting violations last year, favored playing the match the next day, although it crowded the schedule. On Thursday, after a team vote, a psyched squad of Ephmen traveled to Union and ran into a juggernaut.

Williams jumped out to a two-goal lead before the game was 10 minutes old. At 42:43 passes from Marcus Smith and John Friborg culminated in a shot and score by wing Perry Nelson. Minutes later Greg Hartman hit a shot that popped off Dutchman keeper Doug Crawford's chest and flew over him into the goal.

At 31:46 Union got on the board when an intentional hand ball by Williams' Bruce Camilleri stopped a sure goal but gave the D-men a penalty kick. Purple minder Jay Loeffler launched himself and got

Golfers hold onto perfect 4-0 record

The overpowering purple golf machine once again displayed its awesome power with an 18 shot drubbing of Middlebury, and a 46 stroke rout over Hamilton. Sporting a perfect 4-0 record, the Eph linksters are hungry for an undefeated season.

Sophomores Ed "Big" Bousa and Marcel Oudin led the scoring parade with outstanding 76's. On the overcast afternoon in the lush Purple Valley, Bousa rifled iron shots at the flag all day long, capping a spectacular middle six holes with a tap-in birdie on the monstrous 11th hole. Not blessed with the overwhelming power of Bousa, Oudin picked apart the Taconic Golf Club with the precision of a cardiovascularthoracic surgeon, parring the course into merciless submission.

Junior Dan Katz added a fine 79 to the Williams effort. Considering that he is playing on the tattered wreckage of once healthy legs, coach Rudy Goff is pleased that Katz has made such a continually solid contribution to the team. Fellow junior Bill Upton spent a wild day fighting the menacing pines of the Berkshire forest. With arms of band steel, Upton cut through numerous obstacles en route to an 81,

Yale's women shoot past field hockey 4-0

by Nancy Rhein

For the first time in two years, there was real hope: a strong team, a home field advantage, and momentum building from the Trinity victory last week. But, in the end it came down to Yale's strength being Williams' weakness as the field hockey team fell to the mighty Elis, 4-0 Saturday.

Yale, a consistantly superior team, headed into Williamstown for the first time ever, hoping to continue its domination of the Eph-Eli series (3-2 in '76, 4-2 in '75). Utilizing a powerful crossing-drive strategy, the talented visitors tallied on two picture perfect crossing passes.

Mimi DuMouchel, in the cage for the Ephs, was tremendous against the threatening foes, turning away 25 shots. DuMouchel and fellow soph Lee Ash were inspirational, especially as the team fell behind 2-0 going into the second half.

Within minutes of the first face-off, Yale's forces were firing away, with Williams half-back Leslie Milne demonstrating a soccer style sliding save to keep Yale scoreless. The opponents then capitalized on a short corner to go ahead by one, crushing the Ephs hopes for an early lead. Although both teams had 10 short corner opportunities, Yale converted on two for goals while the hosts just couldn't put them in.

Lacking variety on free hits and passing, the stampeding Eph offense (13 goals in 3 games) ground to a halt in the shut-out. Monica Grady and Sally Kraft hustled on line, but obstructions and offsides nullified their efforts. Inner Val Corning came close to scoring in the first half, but not close enough as 21 Williams shots were picked off by an excellent Eli goaltender.

The Ephs came on strong in the second half and a physical Yale squad responded, resulting in a five minute suspension of a Yale player. Despite a man-up advantage, Williams was unable to tap in the centering passes from Liza Olsen, Edie Thurber, and Sue Wright. As Grady fought at one end and DuMouchel at the other, Yale fought all over and scored when Williams couldn't, on corners and

The 4-0 final was not representative of the real contest as both teams were evenly matched. But Yale's ability to make it count cost the hosts their first chance for an upset. The Ephs next game should be brighter as Skidmore slips onto Cole Field Wednesday at 4.

Runners wade past Albany

Coach Tony Plansky's varsity runners splashed to their closest victory in four years Saturday, slipping past Albany State 26-29 on the submerged University of Vermont golf course. UVM rounded out the tri-meet but offered little competition, struggling to third place with 56 points. With a mile to go the yellow shirted Albany harriers had first through fifth in the bag but the determined Ephs fought to remain undefeated and muscled past the opponents for a 1-4-6-7-8 winning combination.

Over the first mile the lead pack consisted of 20 yellow and green shirts with Mike Behrman the lone purple representative. The Ephs, however, gradually infiltrated the ranks and put four up front to match the Albany Danes.

The Ephmen got ready to make their move just after the three mile mark but a wrong turn by the leading Albany runner sent the field in two different directions and put the purple harriers 50 yards to the rear of their opponents. While a Dane quintet snuck around the wrong side of the pond, the Ephs took the correct (and longer) route and emerged from the mix-up looking at five pairs of waffle soles fading into the distance.

Not about to concede defeat and jog in the last mile, especially when the clowns up in front had cut the course, Tom Schreck and Joe Kolb led the chase and slowly began to pick off the leaders. The runners popped back through the hole in the bushes and Kolb moved into first place on the loop around the soccer fields. Schreck sprinted his way into fourth and Garrick Leonard was gunning for home in sixth, but the victory was still not assured for the Ephmen.

Kolb retained his lead and crossed the finish line with a time of 26:32. Schreck held on for fourth place just six seconds in back of Kolb and Leonard clocked 26:46 for a sixth place conclusion. Sullivan and Carr completed the foggy five miler in 7th and 8th, recording 26:50 and 26:53 respectively.

Bearman was the sixth Williams athlete through the finish flags, as the Bear stopped the watches at 27:28 for the number 17 spot. Hans Giesecke (29:04), Bud Bell (29:05) and Rusty [illegible] crossed in a line and gave the Ephs 25th through 27th. Jon Miller and Dan Riley both crossed at 30:10, running through the rain to tie for 30th place.

Joe Kolb: athlete of the week

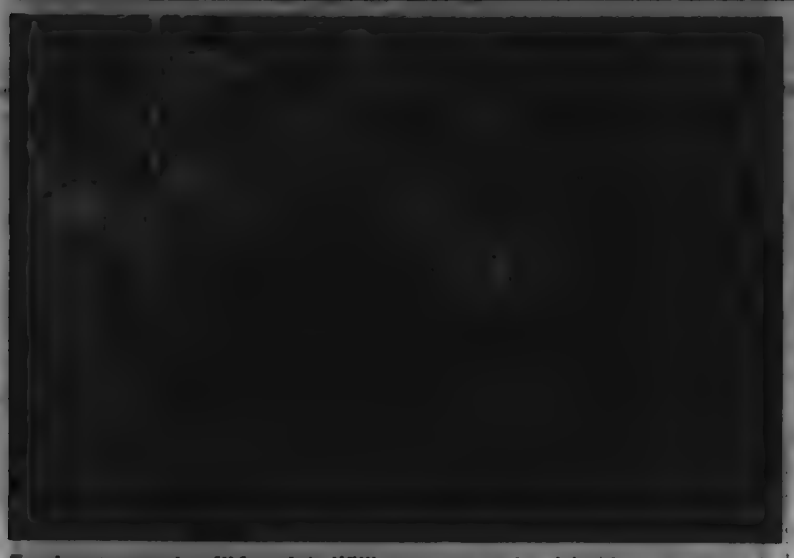
Cross Country runner Joe Kolb has been chosen as the first Record Athlete of the Week for the 1977 fall season following his individual victory in the Albany State-Vermont meet Saturday. The talented senior led the Ephmen to a narrow 26-29 win over Albany and to a shutout of the UVM Catamounts. Kolb pulled out the victory in the last half-mile, marking his fourth first place in as many races.

Honorable Mention—Sophomores Ed Bousa and Marcel Oudin have been awarded an honorable mention this week as they led the golf team to convincing wins over both Middlebury and Hamilton. Bousa and Oudin both fired 76's in the Saturday afternoon match with their one-two punch extending the Eph linksters' record to a perfect 4-0.

Polo pounds Westfield 25-6



Westfield State's water polo team surfaced in Williamstown Friday night to get in a little practice before both teams start league play later this season. However, only the Ephmen and the opposing goalie had a workout as Williams [illegible] Westfield 25-6.

The hosts grabbed control of the game with the opening whistle, scoring 7 goals to Westfield's 2 in each of the first two periods. Ahead 16-4 at the half, the Ephs dominated the third period as goalie Bill Baines, with two weeks experience, allowed only one Westfield goal despite continuous pressure. Strong team play, good passing and even scoring resulted in the easy victory for the squad.

Frosh Gordon Cliff was stupendous for the Ephs, slamming in 8 goals as team's high scorer. Veterans Glenn Shannon, Brian McDermott, John Plamann, and John Dean each tallied three with Guy Hoelzer scoring two. Peter Howd and Keith Berry [illegible] rounded out the scoring with one goal each.

Frosh prepare for Parents

by Christine Ross

Dean of Freshmen Lauren Stevens projected that 700-750 parents, siblings and relatives of freshmen will arrive on campus next weekend (October 14 and 15) for the 25th annual Freshman Parents' Days.

Scheduled activities include a cocktail party in each freshman entry, the Freshman Revue, a discussion of the curriculum, a picnic and numerous athletic contests. The program is designed to show parents what a Williams tuition buys and to introduce them to roommates, friends, faculty advisors and J.A.'s, according to Stephens. Stevens said he hopes that the program, a composite of traditional and new events, will also "give them a good time."

The weekend is strategically scheduled, he said, at a time when "parents are anxious to see their children again, and the kids have begun to feel that they belong here." The weekend also comes just before Freshman Warnings are sent out, he added. Moreover "October is a beautiful time of year to see Williamstown," he pointed out. "We give them the leaves."

The Annual Parents' Day Program on Saturday morning will feature a faculty panel moderated by College President John Chandler. History Professor Russell Bostert, Art Professor Zirka Filipczak and Chemistry Professor James Skinner will discuss the curriculum's history, as well as science and art at the College.

Another highlight of the weekend will be the Freshman Revue, which has been in rehearsal for a month, said Stevens. The production will run both Friday and Saturday nights with curtain time at 8:30 p.m.

Also scheduled for Friday night at 8:30 p.m., the Berkshire Symphony will feature Susan Hohenberg in the Nielsen Clarinet Concerto, and will present Fingal's Cave Overture by Mendelssohn, and a Symphony by Dvorak.

Other aspects of the Parents' Day program are recent innovations. The Parents' Council, a committee with representatives from all four classes, which advises the Dean about the weekend, suggested that the receptions for parents at the Log should be replaced by cocktail parties in each entry. Their reasoning, Stevens explained, is that "parents are more concerned with meeting roommates, J.A.'s, faculty advisors and other students in the entry with whom their child comes in daily contact," rather than moving through a reception line to meet Chandler and administrators.

Starting Parents' Day on Friday rather than Saturday is seen as another positive change, as it enables parents to attend classes Friday afternoon and meet professors.

Parents' Days will "officially end with the Parents' Program and buffet picnic on Saturday afternoon," according to Stevens, although athletic and cultural events of interest to families will continue through Sunday morning.

Co-op proposal seeks a consensus

The Co-op Housing subcommittee of the Student Housing Committee has given itself ten days to devise a proposal for some form of alternative housing, which it will present to students Oct. 17.

The subcommittee plans to hold an open meeting for underclassmen interested in living in cooperative housing a week from this Monday to gather student reaction to a proposal members have been molding the past two weeks.

"We're going to need 30, 40, even 100 faces to get a consensus on this thing," said Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad at a subcommittee meeting earlier this week.

The subcommittee is working on a concrete proposal to give students a base for comment at the upcoming meeting. The group hopes to have a viable proposal to present to the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), a proposal with broad student backing.

The CUL is charged with drawing up the final plan for co-op housing at Williams—sought by College President John Chandler and the trustees—which the trustees will consider at their January meeting.

Much discussion in the subcommittee centers on how to select the students who will live in the alternative housing units, or what the committee refers to as "stocking the houses." Committee chairman Sally Coney '78 and Peter Currie '78, Fort Hoosac House president, developed a proposal last spring, and former Dodd House president Paul Shiels '76 devised another for Buildings and Grounds during the summer.

Glenn Shannon of Spencer Brooks and Al Gentry of Dodd have presented alternate proposals. The proposals range from complete randomness to application by self-selected groups.

A central problem in selection, subcommittee members agree, is balancing diversity and compatibility within houses. Members also agree that selection for co-op housing will have to take place before other spring housing procedures—transfer, off-campus living and freshman inclusion.

The committee also questioned whether it should impose rigid guidelines on the option houses. With well defined rules for structuring and operating the houses, a random selection process would work because all the applicants would know what they were "getting into," Roosenraad explained. Without such guidelines, students entering the houses might have to be self-selected to insure adequate co-operation and compatibility.

The subcommittee's proposal will most likely involve about 30 students in a one-year trial of co-op housing. The committee is presently considering using three houses, each with from 7 to 12 beds. Lambert, Susy Hopkins, Doughty, Sewall, Woodbridge and Goodrich—have been targeted as possible co-op units.

All students in the program will be off board, according to the current committee plans. Co-op house members would cook their own meals—together or separately—and do all minor maintenance chores.

The subcommittee decided to close the program to present freshmen. "I think the College has a right to demand of every student some contact with the residential house system," Roosenraad said.

CC hears reports on major courses, WSP, and Gargoyle

In the CEP report, Larry Mitchell announced that committee's concern with the discovery that the number of students taking courses outside of their major departments has declined in recent years. The CEP has discussed several possible remedies for this situation; including the restructuring of the division requirement plan and the creation of "modes of inquiry courses" within each department with a general appeal to the interests of non-majors. Don Toumey questioned the need for having 101 courses as prerequisites for taking upper level courses in some academic departments, claiming that this requirement often "discourages" non-majors from taking courses in these departments. Associate Dean Eileen Julien suggested the possibility of creating a number of 101 courses in each department, from which the student could choose depending on his particular interest.

In other business, Don Toumey suggested to the council that it look into alternative methods of distributing Lecture Committee funds. Under the present system, each academic department is allowed to request individual funding for its desired speakers. According to Toumey, this process causes the funds to be divided into "$100 to $500 chunks," while not allowing enough money to contract "big-name speakers." Associate Dean Julien proposed a plan under which a certain percentage of Lecture Committee funds would be reserved for departmental requests, while another percentage would be used by the committee to arrange larger-budget lectures featuring well-known speakers. The council agreed to take up the matter in more detail at its next meeting.

Reporting for the Winter Study Committee, Brenda Flock announced that the Winter Study project booklet will be available to students next Wednesday. She commented that the independent "99" projects proposed so far "look excellent." Michael Bell, the council's faculty representative, added that student suggestions to the committee in planning Winter Study courses would be "wildly and enthusiastically received."

Council President Herwitz announced that Mike Crowley, president of the Gargoyle Society, will present Gargoyle's report on its investigation of student roles in academic departments at the Council's next meeting, to be held Wednesday night in Room C of Greylock. Sally Coney will also be present to report on the Housing Committee's further progress with the co-op housing plan.

Ron McLean will be appearing on October 11 at Chapin Hall under the sponsorship of the ACEC. Tickets go on sale October 11 at Baxter Hall.

Financial Aid process could change with new regulation

A new federal regulation requiring that students seek loans from local sources before they are eligible for loans from colleges could effect minor changes in the financial aid procedure, according to Director of Financial Aid Henry Flynt.

The College is also considering a supplementary financial aid program which would grant loans to a student's parents rather than to the student himself.

State and bank loans are the two sources which the applicant must investigate before turning to the College for a loan. These outside loans would then be guaranteed and paid in part under the Guaranteed Student Loan Program offered by the federal government. Outright grants by the College, however, would not be affected.

According to Flynt, the effectiveness of this law, which applied to this year's freshman class, cannot be judged yet. He did reveal, though, that half of the freshmen who sought outside loans did receive them. In the future, however, competition for state loans will increase, very likely sending more students back to the college for loans. Therefore, Flynt thought the overall effect of the legislation would be slight.

The Financial Aid Office has also been studying the supplementary proposal that loans be given to the parents, a system newly instituted at several major colleges, unlike the present system of giving the direct responsibility to the student. Current programs would continue, he added.

The Parent Loan Program would not be based on need, and would provide for a deferred payment system for the parents, creating what Mr. Flynt termed "a banking system here" at Williams. Flynt emphasized though that such a program was entirely "in the thinking stage."

Kleinman urges houses find new uses for cultural funds

Acting as liaison between the Deans' Office and students, English Professor Frances Kleinman urged house cultural representatives Wednesday night to consider alternative uses for the $300 in cultural funds allotted annually to each house.

"We are making no attempt to legislate the use of cultural funds," she said. "However, the college's reaccreditation study committee meeting, headed by Dean Berek, revealed last January that two thirds of those interviewed were dissatisfied with the lack of diversity in traditional 'keg-centered' social events."

Kleinman said that, in the past, cultural funds have been used to defray the cost of social activities which followed the basic "beer and tapes" program. "We are not condemning this practice," she said, "but perhaps this type of party should not be the sole focal point of house social activity."

She urge house cultural chairmen to bring up the ideas of minority interests at their house meetings and to coordinate them with other houses to ensure their success. "Take a chance on them," she said. She also advised houses to exploit faculty, student and alumni sources of talent, which are easily accessible and usually inexpensive.

Interaction among faculty and students might also be fostered through cultural programs which both might attend, Kleinman said. However, she commented, this social interaction might be most easily accomplished through the institution of the guest meal.

"The original purpose of the guest meal was to promote student-faculty relations," she said, "and we hope to emphasize this aspect by scheduling guest meals for all houses simultaneously."

A house receives a $300 allocation each year for cultural purposes, plus a $250 stipend which goes directly to the senior associate affiliated with each house. Kleinman agreed with the cultural chairmen that the sum was not exorbitant. However, a future raise in available funds might be incentive for developing cohesive plans for house cultural events.

Why Print It?

It is a newspaper's right, and indeed responsibility, to print the news as accurately and as responsibly as possible. Unfortunately for editors, however, the distinction between what is news and what is not cannot always be crystal clear. In addition, there are times when the consequences that could result from the publication of a story may be justly said to outweigh the public's right to know and a newspaper's duty to print.

A number of people will no doubt argue that the article concerning a pot club at Tyler House (page 3) represents one or both of the situations mentioned above. Some will regard it as "scandal" rather than news and others will protest that the "costs" involved in the publication of the story—to students of the College and to Williams' image—are greater than any possible societal benefits.

We cannot agree. While it is evident that many, probably most, of the residents of Tyler did not fully understand the possible implications of their actions, others clearly did. While some house members took the entire episode as a joke, for others it symbolized a fundamental moral statement about an unjust law—an act of civil disobedience. We suggest that the "costs" must indeed be high in order for a newspaper in a democratic society to be justified in suppressing a newsworthy event. If it was clear that the Tyler action was nothing more than a prank, then there would be little justification for deeming it newsworthy. The actions of students attempting to express moral outrage at what they consider to be an unjust law, however, is an event that we consider to be more worthy of Record coverage than most of the news reported in this newspaper.

Certainly there are a number of possible undesirable consequences that could result from the publication of this story. It is possible, for instance, that state and local authorities will react vigorously to the story under the assumption that there is a "drug problem" at Williams. In fact, all sources suggest that drug usage at the College has declined significantly over the past decade and that Williams students probably use less drugs than students at many other, more urban, Eastern colleges. Another possible cost is an adverse reaction by alumni and parents affiliated with the College.

We do not perceive these "costs" as overriding and we consider most of the arguments used to extoll them as specious. The logical conclusion to the police harassment argument that people should be able to break laws without even having to consider the implications and possible consequences of their actions. Likewise, the conclusion to the other argument is that Williams parents and alumni aren't bright enough to take things in context and it would be better for everyone if they were kept in the dark. We reject both arguments.

The Record has printed articles in the past which do not reflect well on Williams. Rape, racism, fraternities and financial bungling have been some of the more recent problems. We feel that the publication of such events is important and has often led to a better understanding of the issues involved. In the final analysis, we may be wrong but we can only do what we think is right.

Letters: BSU, frosh stereos

BSU issue view

To the Williams Community:

First and foremost, I want to commend Xanthe Berry for having enough conviction and pride to publicly renounce her membership to the BSU. She has earned my respect and support by putting herself in a position where some blacks will censure and possibly ostracize her.

Avon Williams has expressed the opinion that the BSU is an institution, a place where he can get psychological support and renew his cultural heritage. I agree that the BSU fulfills an important need in this respect and also as a "political" institution—initiating and supporting events which are of significance to the black movement which includes non-blacks. In talking with my black friends, I have come to understand that they appreciate having a place where they don't have to encounter whites after being in a class where they are the only black student. But I question Williams' intimation that non-blacks automatically have subconscious negative rascist attitudes. I think we all are consciously aware of what our racial heritage is—and shouldn't we be? However, we need to not let our background-upbringing lead to rascist attitudes.

The BSU has a place in Williams society—it provides psychological support for black students and promotes critical-analytical inquiry into black issues at Williams and elsewhere. But I don't think the BSU should try to coerce all black students to agree with their viewpoints or else condemn them for expressing viewpoints as an individual, and not primarily as a black person.

All quiet on Quad?

To the editor:

I'm writing to make a slight correction to Peter Meyer's review of the Orford Quartet. It was not the Star Wars party whose noise infiltrated Chapin Hall and ruined an otherwise magnificent performance. Rather it was the work of 2 single rooms in Williams and Sage whose stereo sets were turned up terribly high and whose speakers were set in the open windows facing Chapin. With such an onslaught, chamber music never had a chance.

Freshmen—accept your responsibility! Don't pollute the outdoors. Turn it up, but close the windows.

Campus group addresses gay issues

WGSO (the Williams Gay Support Organization) is a campus-wide group whose dual purpose is to provide mutual support to gay students, faculty, and staff and to serve as a resource for the entire Williams community. Originally formed in the spring of 1976 in response to a lecture presented here by Elaine Noble, Massachusetts State Representative and Lesbian human rights activist, the group is comprised of an equal number of women and men of diverse academic and extracurricular backgrounds.

Homosexuality, both in society at large and at Williams, is according to WGSO, a topic rarely, if ever, openly discussed. General ignorance, fear, and insensitivity have prevented many from realizing that homosexuality is a natural variant of human sexual expression. It is the intention of WGSO to introduce a rational approach to a subject too often considered from a prejudicial perspective.

WGSO, often in collaboration with such other campus organizations as Chapel Board, Williams Women, and the Lecture committee, sponsors a variety of speakers, films, and panel discussions.

This year the organization plans to continue and expand upon its activities of the past years. Information about meetings is available in the Register and from WGSO, P.O. Box 103, Williamstown.

The sessions, which will be conducted tonight and during the day tomorrow, are open to the public. At 7:30 p.m. tonight Dr. Mary Harper, a representative from the Minority Center of the National Institute of Mental Health in Washington, D.C., will discuss minorities and women working in the U.S. Government. The talk will be in the Driscoll Lounge.

Students revive English tutoring

In an effort to revive what former Williams coordinator Ron White termed a "very successful" program, a group of Williams students is presently working to re-institute a language tutoring service in North Adams. The program is designed to provide members of the North Adams Community with instruction in English and basic aspects of the American culture.

Last year, over 40 Williams students participated in the project which was administered on campus through the auspices of the Lehman Service Council. In North Adams, the Northern Berkshire Educational Opportunity Center handled administration and organization of the participants.

After an informational panel night, interested Williams students will be asked to attend two or three workshops in which the fundamentals of teaching English as a second language will be discussed. Students desiring further information on the North Adams tutorial program are urged to call 6591 or 2733.

Perry sponsors lectures on future

A series of lecture-discussions entitled The Problem of the Future, has been announced by the Perry House Cultural chairman, Jeff Crawford. The lecture series is being established with the hope of creating a forum for informal discussion between students, faculty, and Williamstown residents.

The title of the talk will be "Growth and its Implications for the Future." Future speakers will include Robert Schneider, Jay Shelton, Earl McFarland, and Bill Moomaw.

News Analysis/by Peter Rintels

Tyler okays pot club, reneges under pressure

It embodied everything from political protest to moral stand to joke to tense situation. How it will end is still unclear.

It began officially when Tyler House voted on September 22 to establish higher dues for members interested in forming a "pot club." According to the proposal, the house was to use money from the higher dues to provide marijuana at house functions for those paying them. Tyler had thus taken the unprecedented step of publicly going on record as sanctioning an illegal activity.

Last Wednesday, under substantial pressure from Hopkins Hall, including a promise to disband Tyler as a social and political unit unless the house reversed its stand, the house voted to rescind its earlier decision. No house funds were actually spent on marijuana before the house reversed its decision. The days before the second vote saw a flurry of activity in which Deans conferred with proponents of the pot club to discuss the implications of their actions and with Record editors on the possible repercussions of the story being made public.

Berek stated emphatically that unless the house repealed its action, the College would be forced to disband Tyler as a social unit.

According to Bill Smith, a Tyler house member and proponent of the pot club idea, the proposal started out as "kind of a joke" in an informal conversation among some friends. "Once people started talking about it," he said, "it seemed like a good thing."

John Graham, also a Tyler house member and perhaps the most vocal supporter of the club, said he intended the proposal as a political protest. He said he "purposely did tie the proposal to Tyler" and that he foresaw the possibility of its resulting in drug arrests on campus, but added that he thought "the protest against the unjust law is of greater importance."

On Thursday, September 15, Smith first made the proposal at a Tyler house meeting. According to Graham's account, the Tyler house president ignored Smith, so he made the proposal again. The house then decided to vote on the matter at a subsequent meeting the following week.

Between meetings, Graham says he was actively lobbying for the proposal in the halls of Tyler. He concedes, however, that while he recognized that, should the action succeed, "it would be known" and that the College could not ignore it, he did not always point that out to other Tyler house members in discussions with them. He won one vote, he recalled, by suggesting to a house member that she was too conservative and offering her a chance to show her liberalness by voting for his proposal.

Yet while Graham stated tersely that he was aware of the implications of the action, Smith said he had not given it much thought. "I didn't anticipate too much publicity," he said. Asked what he thought might be the College's response to a Record article on the pot club, he replied, "I don't think the College would really come down. They might think they had to ... (but) I don't see any reason for the College to act as long as money from people not smoking is not appropriated."

According to Graham, he knew there were enough votes to make the proposal pass nearly two days before the house vote. Yet many members were surprised by the vote, including the house officers, one of whom described himself as "very surprised." Smith also said that he was "happily surprised." The final vote was 30 to 20 in favor, with approximately 10 abstentions.

The wording of the proposal, as Graham reported it to the Record, was "that Tyler buy and distribute marijuana at house functions (and that) only people who use it would be taxed for it." The proposal meant, in essence, that those members of Tyler house interested in having marijuana at house functions would pay higher dues. The "pot surtax" would become part of Tyler's normal house treasury and expenditures for marijuana would be made from it as for any other item such as alcohol. The amount of money spent on marijuana, however, would never exceed the amount collected through the surtax. Thus, people not paying the surtax would in no way be subsidizing marijuana use on the part of those who were. The legal position of house members opting not to take part nonetheless remains somewhat murky.

Graham also noted that the house as a whole was not blind to the legal implications of what it was doing. He said he offered the following as a preamble to his proposal at the meeting: "Commonwealth law states that you may not buy or hold or use marijuana, and we are asking you to say you disagree with the law."

But while Graham saw the initial vote as a political protest, it is doubtful that many other members who voted for the proposal saw it that way. One person attending the meeting, who asked not to be identified, described the debate as "light hearted." "The house took it pretty casually," he said. His reasons for voting for the proposal were, he said, "to offer a convenience to house members—I didn't think that there was any harm in it."

Both this source and Graham agree that when voting, most house members did not fully consider all the possible repercussions of their action, such as possible involvement of the Dean's office and the local police. Graham said he had also reasoned that the response of the authorities might be muted by the fact that any marijuana purchased would be owned communally, that is by the house, and would thereby cloud the issue of just who possessed it.

"I doubt," he said, "they would arrest 76 students (Tyler house's membership) and take them to the state penitentiary."

Smith said he had also expected the response to be muted, mainly based on the assumption that the College's policy in the past has been one of leniency. (In response to this statement, Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad pointed out that Williams students have been arrested for drug violations "within the last five years." He refused to say how many.)

A source of some confusion after the meeting was whether or not the vote constituted an official house action, mainly because the house president was not present. Last Wednesday's vote, and the threats from the Dean's office on the consequences of not rescinding the vote, clearly suggest that it was.

The Record did not become involved in the issue until a features writer, who had heard of the vote at lunch, asked Record editor Scott Fenn whether it should be pursued as a story. Fenn, a member of Tyler house, gave the go ahead to begin researching it in the middle of last week. He did not act on it immediately he said because, "as a house member I was involved. I didn't feel that I was the one who should report on it."

Before the paper went to press Sunday for its Tuesday edition, Berek was reached at home for comment. His response was to reiterate the official position of the College that "use of marijuana or any illegal drug is prohibited by state law and college regulation. People who violate them do so at their own peril." He also warned, however, of the dangers of such a story being made public, suggesting that the hand of the local police would almost certainly be forced. Berek argued that the Tyler action was probably more along the lines of a prank, and not sufficiently newsworthy, especially when the possible reactions to it were considered. He also stated that he was not aware of the Tyler action before being contacted by the Record.

That Sunday, after conferring with Berek, Fenn decided to withhold the story from Tuesday's edition. Berek, he said, "had warned that there could be immense personal costs to the people involved. At that time, I was not sure that those people were aware of those implications."

Later that evening, Fenn said he conferred with the people who would be most directly affected by the story and found that they were willing to accept any dangers involved with the publication of the story. "At least a few house members construed this as an act of civil disobedience," he stated.

Monday morning, Berek was informed by a Record reporter that the people who he had been most concerned about did not appreciate his efforts to silence the issue and that research on the story was continuing, with the possibility of publication later in the week left open.

Throughout the day, Associate Dean Roosenraad met with Tyler house officers and members, some summoned by the Dean, others at their own instigation, to exchange information. According to Roosenraad, he informed students of legally prescribed penalties for marijuana use at these meetings.

Both Roosenraad and Berek were present at Tyler house dinner on Tuesday night after receiving invitations from house members to attend dinner there and discuss the issues with those involved.

At one table, the discussion ranged from terse statements by Berek on the College's response to the "pot club" to philosophical discussions on the nature of civil disobedience. Berek stated emphatically that unless the house repealed its action, the College would be forced to disband Tyler as a social unit. This would mean that Tyler would lose its College Council representative, would no longer receive funds of any kind from the College, and would be barred from holding any social events. "The College," he said, "just can't tolerate it."

The debate on the issue was much more serious than at the previous house meeting and centered on the moral issues.

Another student argued that if society's unjust laws were never broken, then blacks would still be riding in the back of buses in Alabama. Berek pointed out that there were other ways of registering protests against laws one felt were unjust that did not involve other persons in illegal activities, such as political pressure. None of the pot club advocates speaking with Berek were members of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML).

At another table, Roosenraad discussed with house members the legal intricacies and implications of the Tyler action. Students at this table, while sympathetic to the moral issues at hand, expressed great surprise at the costs involved.

Informed of the administration reaction to the pot club and of the possible involvement of outside authorities, Tyler met again Wednesday night to reconsider its original vote. Dean Roosenraad was present to "act as a resource," and stay informed of the developments.

The debate on the issue was much more serious than at the previous house meeting and centered on the moral issues involved, specifically whether or not the house should take an official stand against marijuana laws that many of the members thought were unjust. The question was then raised as to whether or not a majority of Tyler members would be justified in forcing the minority into taking a stand on marijuana laws that it did not subscribe to, particularly when the minority would have to suffer the same consequences as those who were, in effect, willing to martyr themselves. One member then suggested that with such issues involved, nothing less than unanimity on the part of the house should be allowed. He argued that the house should make unanimous any decision to continue the pot club's existence, or else consider the earlier resolution rescinded. Graham, who had made the original pot club proposal two weeks previously, then formalized the unanimity proposal into a motion, which passed by a substantial margin.

In a surprising move, Graham then declared himself against the pot club and abruptly left the meeting, thus killing the proposal for which he had been campaigning for three weeks. The meeting thus ended without a vote on the proposal ever being taken.

According to Graham, he ended the proposal in this manner in order to prevent an official count from ever being taken. "The house had gone about as far as it was willing to," stated Graham, "and I attempted to protect the interests of those who were unsympathetic to our cause while minimizing our own losses." Discussions with house members after the meeting suggested that while the original proposal still had some support, it would have been defeated by a fair margin if brought to a vote.

Joggers overrun Berkshire roadways

by Stacy Silverstein

Heavy breathing and steady footsteps are beating out a familiar rhythm in Williamstown this fall. The sounds of students jogging have arrived, and are more prevalent than ever before.

Avid joggers are tramping through games of rugby and frisbee, picking up converts everywhere. Williams joggers include the usual jocks—tennis, hockey, soccer and ball players who are getting or keeping in shape—and feverish ski bums praying for an early snowfall.

But jogging is even attracting those who, until now, have kept their leg muscles tightly curled up in the library. An outsider may have questions about this fast-growing, trotting community. Where is everybody running? Why bother running at all? How do I start if I decide to try?

First, then, where are they all running? Any jogger with an explorer's spirit may of course blaze his own trails. There are, however, several established routes in the area where you may meet fellow joggers any time of day or night. One popular run follows Gale Road behind the Taconic Golf Course. This residential road intersects South Street just beyond the Clark Art Museum and Water Street at a point south of Route 2. Experienced joggers estimate the loop to be a little more than three miles in length.

Blair Road cuts off the left of Water Street, about a mile and a half south of Route 2. A run along this unpaved route will lead you back to Route 2 in the area of Grand Union. The final stretch of the loop brings the total distance to a healthy five miles.

A third route begins at the bottom of Stone Hill Road on South Street, about one hundred yards beyond the Clarke. Stone Hill begins as a wooded trail and gradually opens into a farm road scattered with houses. You should be aware that this route will not loop back to campus.

You're convinced you should at least give jogging a try so how do you begin? The only essential equipment consists of loosely fitting clothes and a pair of running shoes. Shoes must be light, comfortable and should fit closely. If you'd rather not subject your new Tretorns to anything more rugged than clay courts, or if you're afraid the mud will discolor your new basketball sneakers, you may still have a future in jogging.

Any sporting goods store carries a line of running shoes. At least one pair should agree with your feet and your budget. Popular brands (Adidas, Puma, Nike) run from $15 to $30. The extra investment for one of these brands will pay off since the $4 canvas pair at the Co-op clearance sale will put you on the road to shin splits and blisters.

After puffing your way through 2 miles of cramps and agonizing leg throbs, maybe you're ready to hang up those shoes. Don't despair. The pain will subside as your muscles attune themselves to the new strain. Soon you won't even think about your running, and while your mind drifts to more important subjects, you'll be toning up muscles and trimming beer bulges. You'll also get to know Williamstown, its peaceful roads and fresh air.

The most common reason for jogging at Williams is that it provides an energy outlet. Unlike most sports, it places the emphasis on free, rhythmic movement rather than precision.

Thunder rumbles, Grail roars

Satayit's Ray DISTANT THUNDER [1973] will be shown on Saturday night at 7:30 and 9:30 in Bronfman. Monty Python and the Holy Grail appears tonight at 7:00 and 9:30 in Bronfman Auditorium. Admission is $1.00.

Distant Thunder is the chilling vision of the perniciousness of war silently exploding through a village ignorant of its existence with as deadly an effect as on the actual battlefield.

The war planes flying over their heads seem like beautiful birds to the village women at the outset of the film, and WWII is only significant as it affects the price of rice. The distant thunder advances rapidly, however, and the man made famine of 1943 shakes the lives of 5 million Bengalese.

The only Brahmin in the village, Ganga, who serves as priest, doctor, and teacher is condescending towards the villagers, using his position for self serving ends. War has no respect for any aspect of civilization. Starvation results from the increasing shortages and prices of rice which eventually disappear from the market. Even the distinction between untouchables and Brahmin is blurred as the society degenerates into chaos and violence from fear and suffering.

Satayit Ray's obvious fascination with the camera and film results in amazingly beautiful scenes which serve the dual purpose of emphasizing the continuity of life the world's [illegible] ignorance of radical changes under gone by some of its members. Vivid pictures of butterflies, lizards, landscapes in sunset are interspersed through the film and a young woman dies beneath a venerable, mammoth tree—the film following her eyes to their last vision of resplendent nature.

Such endurance can be a source of hope. Hunger drives everything else out of the minds of some, as one woman resorts to selling her body for rice. She leaves for the city dissolved into smokey aura of light as Ganga's wife watches, willing to starve rather than betray her moral principles. Ironically, the sufferings imposed by the war bridge some of the gaps between the members of society. Ganga, disregards the law against contact with untouchables to provide for the cremation of the dead woman. Once reluctant to feed a visitor from a neighboring town he now accepts his approaching family and recognizes the evil of his own exploitation of the community. The inspiring silhouettes of hands joining against a lit sky throughout the film climax, as Ganga's wife announces she is pregnant, with an increasing mass of people in silhouette marching into the screen—their future will be made possible by the strength of the newborn and of the newly unified.

Music in the Round

Pops promise adventurous listening

by Vernee Fritch

Music in the Round's Second Annual Pops Concert will take place this evening at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Due to the success of last year's Pops Concert, Program Director Julius Hegyi decided that such an event should take place on an annual basis.

The Program will feature a new jazz-pop-rock composition by the Williams Music Department's Stephen Dankner. Titled Stevie in Wonderland, the ten-to-eleven minute piece is scored for two violins, cello, piano, clarinet in A, trumpet, trombone, electric bass, and trap drums. In preparing to compose the piece, Mr. Dankner wanted "a different form of expression" from that used in his previous work, a "very massive" sonata for Violoncello and piano. Originally, he thought of writing an ensemble arrangement of a Scott Joplin rag similar to Gunther Schuller's Redback Book. However, during the summer, he decided that a composition incorporating the power and drive of such contemporary groups as Earth, Wind and Fire, Tower of Power, Stevie Wonder, and Headhunters was more what he was looking for. The combination of classical winds and strings with 20th Century trap drums and bass guitar should render a performance unlike anything ever heard before in Music in the Round. The single movement of Stevie in Wonderland contains contrasting sections, giving it the equivalent of a one-movement symphonic form.

More traditional instrumentation will prevail in two arrangements for string quartet. One is Bridge's Londonderry Air, an English folk song, and the other is a George Gershwin [illegible].

The guest artist at Friday evening's program will be Baritone Singer Gordon Myers, a professor of music at Trenton State College and a former New York Pro Musica member. He will join with violin, cello and piano in performing three Beethoven songs. Cellist Douglas Moore will also join Myers in presenting a Sweet and Sour Suite for Baritone and Violoncello.

Richard's Til Eulenspiegel and Johann's Wiener Blut mark the Strauss Brothers' contribution to the concert. Til Eulenspiegel is scored for violin—clarinet, horn, bassoon and string bass, while Wiener Blut incorporates a string quartet plus bass.

Finally (though not necessarily there on the program), the Music in the Round members will put on a short skit representing "inside a hotel restaurant," and featuring such popular tunes as Stardust, Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, and Sophisticated Lady.

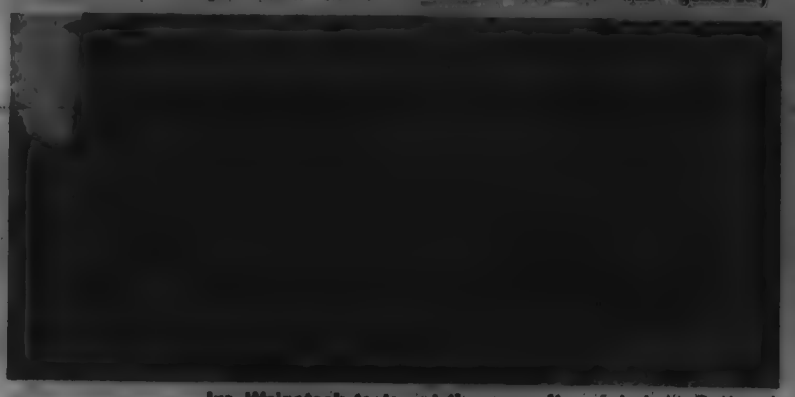
Rising costs cause Phase II plans to become pit



by David Sorkin

Mystery and controversy surround Phase Two of the Chapin Hall renovation. A source within the Building Committee, known only as "Deep Throat," has now revealed that rising costs have forced major architectural changes. These modifications involve a total abandonment of the idea of a building, replacing it instead with a large ditch, in which such ecologically sound materials as mud and straw would supplant the customary cement and glass.

The idea of a ditch is so architecturally revolutionary that the administration has tried to keep matters as quiet as possible. After all, spending 2.1 million dollars for a music pit might be considered excessive by those Philistines who always seem to spring up in these situations. Thus, little fanfare or notice accompanied the ground breaking. Most students mistook the earth moving equipment for several more of the modern works of art which now adorn the campus, and one Art History major was rudely surprised when the bulldozer which he was admiring suddenly began moving straight towards him. Similarly the jackhammers and explosions were confused with new wave or "punk rock" music.

In order to dissuade mounting opposition the administration has taken several steps. First, a large fence was erected to prevent radical opponents of the ditch from tying themselves to Chapin Hall. More important however, international music experts have been brought in to assess the pit's viability. Pablo Casals returned from the dead last week to test the acoustics.

Critical reaction was generally positive, with the performance being favorably compared with the London Symphony's rendition of C. E. Brown's "Yard by Yard" at the Log last January. Casals was not so sanguine, however and, after the concert, this reporter saw him trying to get at Toscanini with his bow. Only several days ago a more ambitious project was attempted when the Berkshire Symphony played Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture. Joe and Frank got a little carried away at the end, as blasting used to simulate a cannon shot leveled most of Chapin and caused many students in Sawyer Library to fear that they had just been transferred to the University of Beirut.

Thus, the building committee is by no means on solid ground either musically or architecturally, and attacks seem to be building daily. Finance Chairman Bert Lance revealed yesterday that money had not yet been raised for a large tarpaulin needed for covering the ditch when it rains, but Lance seemed fairly certain of being able to arrange a loan. More embarrassing still are reports that the Hopkins Hall Chief of Staff, Ephraim Haldeman, ordered the architect's blueprints to be dropped into Muir Pool while no one was looking.

Where the controversy may end is hard to say, but the administration has now gotten itself into a very deep hole and may have to attempt drastic remedies. Some are saying that a total surrender is imminent in which a return to more traditional designs will be effected, but others, Deep Throat included, have reason to believe that Campus Security may kidnap the ditch, take it to Panama, and disguise it as a cross-isthmus canal.

Stickwomen clean-up on dry turf

It was the first big Cole Field victory under the light, sunlight that is, as a drip-dried women's field hockey team easily defeated Skidmore 3-0 Wednesday. The rain stopped just long enough to give the Ephs their first chance this season to perform on a hard, fast surface, a situation of which the speedy squad quickly took advantage.

Although the match was scoreless in the first half, Williams clearly dominated as Sally Kraft and Monica Grady fast breaked but shot wide, keeping the Skid defense on its toes. Even defender Cammie McClellan managed to keep the pressure on, feeding an eager Williams' line. Despite repeated corners and good crossing passes from Liza Olsen and Anne McClelland, the visitors goalie hung tough, grabbing the needed saves. Midway through the period halfback Sue Wright got off a nice driving shot on goal, but inches kept the hosts off the board. With a minute left in the half, fellow midfielder Leslie Milne crossed a beautiful passing drive, an old Yale tactic, but the Ephs' rush was unsuccessful.

The frustrated offense came out fighting in the second round with sophomore Grady opening the scoring following a determined effort. Keeping up the aggressive shooting, center Sally Kraft slammed one in, this time on the inside of the Skidmore goal. Its efforts rewarded, the team remained in control with defenders Lee Ash, McClellan and Mimi Dumouchel seeing little action. McClellan made up for her boredom however, scoring on a nice shot from the circle to give the squad the expected win and another victory going into Tuesday's Middlebury match.

Frustration rules soccer loss to the Big Green

by Mark Pogue

"It was blatant. There was no question. The official just missed it, that's all."

Coach Jeff Vennell's blunt assessment of the controversial play reflected the feelings of most who witnessed it. There are 25 minutes remaining in the game. The Ephs, down 1-0 to Dartmouth, have the ball. They are applying pressure. Suddenly midfielder Greg Hartman has an open shot at the Dartmouth goal from 12 yards out. An opposing fullback lunges and the two go down in a heap. No foul is called. Play continues. Everybody groans.

Variations on this theme of frustration seemed to plague the hometown Ephs in Tuesday's 1-0 loss to the Big Green of Hanover. Dartmouth, unbeaten and fifth-ranked in New England, called on goalie Lyman Missimer to make just four saves in the contest. Williams, still unable or unwilling to work the field laterally, was backed up on defense for most of the first half and half of the second.

The Big Green's winning goal came at 23:25 of the first half when wing Ted Gordon retrieved a mis-kicked Dartmouth ball in the left corner and grounded a centering pass to whom it might concern. Along came sophomore lineman Dave Hansmann, playing his first game for the Dartmouth varsity. Hansmann swept the ball into a corner of the net before goalie Jay Loeffler had time to react.

"We didn't play with any aggression or enthusiasm until after the missed call," lamented Vennell after the game. "And the statistics tell the story: we took 17 shots but only four were saved. We just weren't getting the ball to the goal." Part of the Purple's impotence in the last two games is attributable to the limited playing time of trailer Henry Osborne. Osborne, injured in the Union game, saw some action at wing on Tuesday but, as Vennell says, "he belongs in the middle of the field, where he can have the ball."

The victory improves Dartmouth record to 4-0-1. Williams, now 0 and three, travels to Trinity tomorrow for an 11:30 match.

Despite an inspired effort in the quagmire at Poker Flats last Saturday, the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization lost to Middlebury by a score of 16-10. The game was viewed as a moral victory by the Williams team, recounting from a humiliating defeat at the hands of RPI on the previous weekend.

Middlebury was ready for the game, their first, and a strong team drove and hitch-hiked to Williams in time to wake their opponents, literally, just before noon. The game was underway shortly after one and was played with the intense competitive spirit which makes Ultimate Frisbee an exciting spectator sport. All ten spectators attested to this fact in a post-game group interview.

Ephs contest Trinity Bantams

by Tim Layden

If the Little Three were ever to become the Little Four (or would it be the medium-sized four?) the school to round out the quartet would more than likely be Trinity College. The Hartford, Conn. school plays each of the three teams in the conference, and even closes its season out with a contest against Wesleyan each year.

Now, while this information may not have a heck-uva lot to do with the price of milk, butter, and eggs, it does say a considerable amount about what beating members of the tiny triumverate means to the Trinity Bantams.

It seems relatively safe to guess that anytime Trinity meets Amherst, Wesleyan, or Williams, a little bit extra is on the line. The Trinity teams of the past three seasons have been characterized by good size, cautious but effective offense tactics, and a tough, opportunistic defense.

A week ago, the Williams grid squad faced a Middlebury unit which had mustered just three points against the Ephs in two full games. This weekend, the Purple finds the tables turned, having managed only a lone Kevin Cramer field goal in the season opened two seasons ago, achieving a 3-3 tie for Williams, and ruining an otherwise perfect season.

Junior quarterback Mike Foye has filled the air with footballs in Trinity's first two victories. The 6'3", 185-pounder has thrown 39 times, completing 19 for three touchdowns, despite meeting a pair of Maine teams (Bowdoin and Bates) in the rain. With Williams coverback Mark Eckert out for the season with a knee injury, Foye can be expected to put pressure on the young Eph secondary. Andy Krakaeur will fill in for Eckert.

Paul Votze and converted quarterback Rob Claflin have rushed for a combined total of 122 yards in Trinity's two wins (21-7 over Bowdoin and 14-7 over Bates) to head an anemic running game. The Bantams have scored 28 of their 35 points in the second half, trailing in both games at intermission.

The contest comes for Trinity on homecoming weekend, which should insure a Jesse field packed with thirsty Bantam alums. There is, however, one little intangible. Next week, Trinity faces Middlebury up in the wilds of Vermont. The Bantams topped Middlebury last season, keeping the losers from an unbeaten season. With Trinity hoping to repeat its role against the Panthers, Williams Coach Bob Odell and company could catch the Bantams looking ahead.

On the Eph side of the ledger, the game could best be described as "out of the fire and into the frying pan." In other words, Williams will certainly not see a team with Middlebury's overall talent the rest of the year, but Trinity is close. Ranked number ten in ECAC Division III, Trinity won its first five last year, then fell apart, crumbling completely in a 45-0 loss to Wesleyan.

Dave Massucco's expulsion from the Middlebury contest was just a game misconduct, and the sophomore will be in the backfield Saturday. Vernon Davis and Gus Nuzzolese will join quarterbacks Bill Whelan and Greg Collins for Odell. Ken Hollingsworth and tri-captain Herb McCormick will alternate at split end, with offensive player of the week Todd Eckerson handling the split end duties.

Sophomore Jack Spound's knee injury in the loss to Middlebury was apparently not serious, and he'll go tomorrow, along with Kenny Schoetz, Mike Curran, Jay Skerry, and Steve Rogers on the offensive line.

Greg McAleenan, all over the field against Middlebury, remains at one cornerback, along with Mark Gerry, Long Ellis, and Krakaeur, for the suddenly very thin defensive backing crew. John Thiel (13 tackles and 11 assists against Middlebury) and Brian Benedict will start at linebacker. Russ Gee, Mike Masi, Pete Tuttle, Colin Hart, and Ralph Spooner compose the Ephs' front line.

The words sophomore, inexperienced, young, learning, all seem to be coming up with great regularity when discussing the '77 Eph grid squad. With that in mind, Williams can only get better as the season progresses. Bob Odell is building for the future with some talented underclassmen, spiced with a few veterans. The remaining games show perhaps one breather, and it's going to be a tough class load for the education of the youngsters. Class number two is Saturday in Hartford at 1:30.

Netwomen regain top form as team shuts out Skidmore

Venting their frustrations after last week's two consecutive losses like any good team should, the women's tennis team picked on Skidmore for a 9-0 shutout Wednesday.

Suffering through last week was quite similar to getting your wisdom teeth pulled: it was a pain in the fanny to go through, but you know you'll be much better off for it in the long run. Williams has shown it is much better off for the previous week's excellent competition as the team's level of play has risen considerably since the first time.

Captain Laura Carson and No. three Trudie ten Broeke are good examples of this finer play as each performed at the top of her game in easy wins for both. Becky Chase was overpowering in a 6-0, 6-1 victory, while No. six Laura Goebel also lost only one game, 6-1, 6-0. Playing steadily at No. four, Ann Morris rolled 6-3, 6-1, and Sherry Willcox managed to hold on for a 6-2, 7-6 win at No. five.

Coach Curt Tong, still searching for his team's strongest line-up, experimented at No. one doubles with Sally Kruse and Amy Demorest. In an up and down match they prevailed 6-0, 1-6, 6-3. The other new team of Sherry Edman-Amy Sterling looked strong 6-4, 6-1. Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale won 6-1, 6-1.

Pasachoff hunts eclipse joins Pacific expedition

by Helen Frankel

Prof. Jay M. Pasachoff, Director of Hopkins Observatory, will conduct major experiments on board a ship in the mid-Pacific tomorrow during the total eclipse of the sun. Pasachoff is leading a joint expedition from Williams and The Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory, Los Alamos, New Mexico.

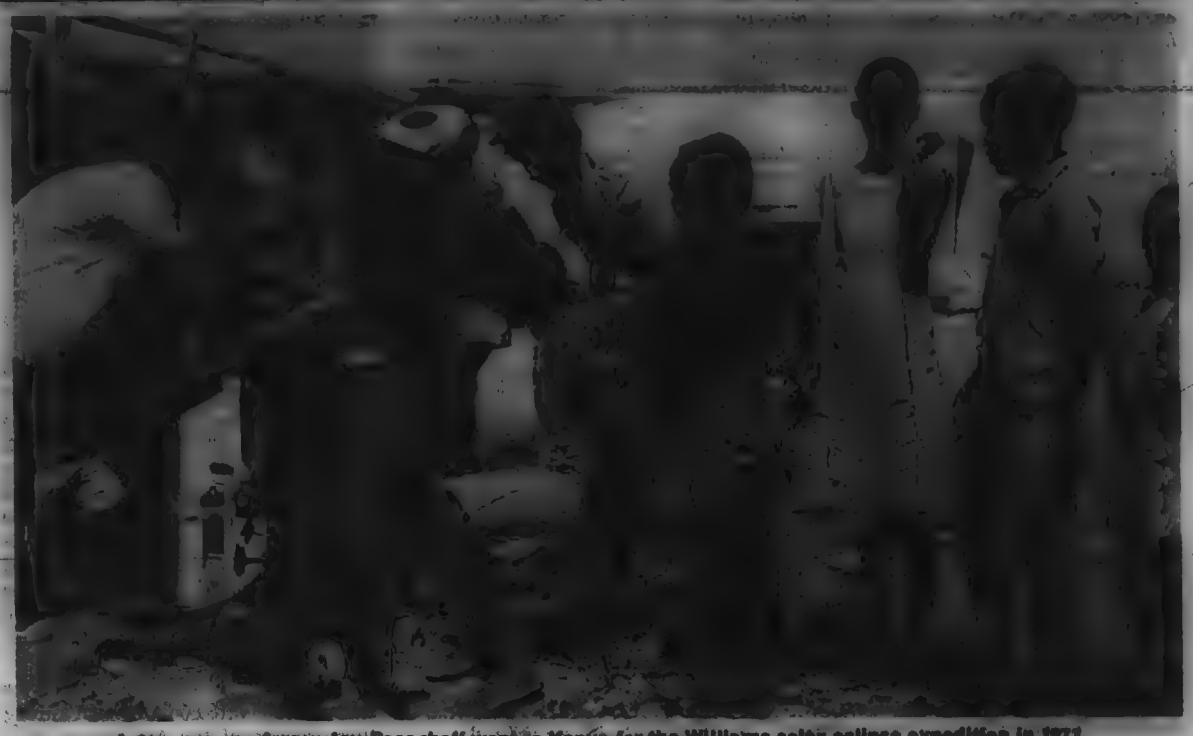
"We had a very interesting time in Kenya during the June, 1973 eclipse and are anticipating another exciting expedition," Pasachoff said. "The conditions will be very different since we'll be at sea instead of solid earth. So keeping our instruments pointed at the sun is a major problem for us."

The Williams group includes three students, seniors Daniel Bruns, Gavin Watson and Stewart Read. J. Phil Schierer, an optical physicist at Textronix, Inc., and Dennis di Cicco, Assistant Editor of the magazine "Sky and Telescope" and former laboratory instructor at Williams, will also join the Williams contingent.

Pasachoff said that the students have been of tremendous assistance to him in preparing for the experiments. "They have really become the experts on how the equipment works. Dan and Gavin will be actually operating the equipment on board the ship and will be using the data for their theses."

They are bringing about two tons of equipment to carry out their observational studies. Two of the experiments will be done on inertial guidance platforms. This will keep the telescopes always pointing toward the same point in the sky, independent of the ship's rocking. "But", Pasachoff remarked, "we have more pieces of equipment than inertial guidance platforms, so we are trying various ways to keep our images steady."

The experiments will be done on board the TSS Fairsea, which will be located about 2000 kilometers south of Los Angeles and 2000 kilometers west of Mexico, the best position to see the solar eclipse. The Fairsea is one of two 900 passenger cruise ships being sent to view the eclipse under the auspices of Adler Planetarium in Chicago. Pasachoff will lecture on solar astronomy to those on board the Fairsea, most of whom will not be professional scientists.



Two of the major experiments to be done by the expedition involve studies of the ion known as Iron XIII which has the strongest radiation known in either the visible or infrared part of the sun's coronal spectrum. This radiation is only visible during a total eclipse and has been studied very little up until now because the Iron XIII ions are in the infrared spectrum where film techniques cannot be used.

The first experiment will scan the spectrum as often as 50 times a second using an electronical device developed by Schierer at Textronix. The information will be recorded digitally on a micropressor developed by Bryce Babcock of Williams. After analysis, the data will be used to map the distribution of electron density in the solar corona.

The second Iron XIII experiment will gather data to yield information about the distribution of the magnetic field in the corona, and the third experiment will photograph the sun's corona in the infrared with a special camera.

The scientists on the ship are veteran eclipse observers. Pasachoff has observed seven solar eclipses, including expeditions in Mexico in 1970 and Africa in 1973. They predict a

CC hears Gargoyle finds

by Stu Massad

The College Council will begin to formulate guidelines governing student input into departmental decisions this week after Michael Crowley '78 presents the findings of a recent Gargoyle investigation.

Crowley heads a five-member subcommittee of Gargoyle which has been examining departmental structures for integrating student input into decisions affecting students.

Each of the subcommittee's five members has investigated some five departments, Crowley said, talking to chairmen and "looking for an organized formal structure for a student advisory committee within the major, rather than on an ad hoc basis."

The members have collected information on how advisory committees are organized in departments, where they exist and how mandated student input is collected in departments without formal advisory committees.

"We do feel that where it's possible it would be preferable to have some structure to these committees rather than having students come in at random, Crowley said. He noted that many of the smaller departments—such as Classics—are able to gather input at informal meetings with all majors.

College Council President Tom Herwitz, elected last spring on the promise of increasing student involvement in decision-making on campus, said he sees Gargoyle's investigation as a positive step, along with such actions as the creation of parallel committees.

Crowley said that while the Gargoyle group has not moved beyond collecting information, it could suggest models for departments that need to create student advisory committees.

Herwitz said the College Council will attempt to compile sets of guidelines for gathering student input and the types of departmental affairs requiring input, picking up on Gargoyle's lead.

"What we're interested in is getting students involved," Herwitz said, with well known routes for students to supply comments. He added that a knowledge of where input comes from is important in evaluating it.

"We're not saying that there should be standardized committees for each department, but there should be some manner of input," Herwitz commented.

"Departments have never been the focus of student input," the College Council president remarked. He said student government needs to expand into departmental areas—hiring, curriculum and policy—"in some sort of organized manner."

The College Council will turn most of the work of drawing up guidelines to the Student Education Committee (SEC), parallel to the Committee on Educational Policy, according to Herwitz. He added that the SEC meetings are open and said the College Council plans to hold an open forum on student power later this semester.

"I'm not sure—because not all the facts have come in—that there need to be changes," Herwitz concluded, "but there is room for suggestions."

Financiers trim budgets

The Finance Committee voted Sunday to recommend a $17,000 allocation to the ACEC in the College Council, a $1,500 compromise between the $15,500 the ACEC received last year and Chairman Steve Case's $18,500 preliminary budget.

"The ACEC may conceivably receive more later on in the year," committee member Marlies Carruth said. "However, at the moment, we are dealing with a very strict budget and we have to cut where we can."

Chairman Harry Kelly, who has acted as the monitor of WCFM finances for the past year, recommended that the radio station receive $7,850, as opposed to its preliminary request for $10,326. According to a committee member, WCFM is asking money for equipment which the council feels the College itself should subsidize.

The Coffee House proposed a budget of $4,650 to cover the decorations and refreshments at 15 concerts throughout the year. The Committee advised petitioners to cut their schedule to 14 events and voted to recommend a $4,100 allocation to the College Council. The Free University requested $160, with which the Committee agreed, along with a $900 budget projected by the Jewish Association.

The preliminary Student Art Gallery budget was cut from $290 to $145, with the added recommendation that each house be asked to contribute $15 from its cultural funds for the gallery's upkeep. Cap and Bells requested $5,000, which included $900 to sponsor a touring company. The Committee implied that, if the organization makes a separate request for the same purpose at a later date, funds may be allocated, but at present, agreed to recommend $3,900 for the year.

Pottery, Ltd. asked for and received endorsement on their projected $850 budget.

Chip Buckner, representing the Tuesday Forum, went before the Finance Committee to request a $0 allocation. Members voted unanimously to recommend this proposal to the College Council.

Next Sunday the Finance Committee will consider the preliminary applications of the Record and the yearbook.

Diaz decries capitalism

The current free-enterprise competitive world market is neither truly free or competitive, Yale Professor Carlos Alejandro-Diaz told a Center for Development Economics audience Thursday.

The world market, is governed by free enterprise methods at present, set up in this manner so that the competition between sellers for control of the market would keep prices steady and at a fair level. However, Diaz pointed out that most products are so specialized that there is no truly "open" market.

Often the companies that are selling the goods are either the same or closely affiliated with the companies that buy the products. This is possible because of the existence of many transnational corporations. Some U.S. based corporations, for example serve two or three countries simultaneously.

The less developed countries (LDC's) that are beginning to emerge into the economic world such as Brazil and Mexico have begun to realize the importance of controlling the companies that deal in resources native to their lands, said Diaz.

An example he cited of the inefficiency of the present market was the sale of copper. There are two copper prices, one for intra-company sales and a much larger one for inter-company sales. The double standard makes joining the world market very difficult for small companies.

At present many LDC's are borrowing much more money than Tax bill may end deductions for bequests to colleges

by Jeff Kovar

Suggested changes in the tax laws affecting deductible gifts to charitable organizations, possibly including colleges have educational institutions such as Williams concerned. Proposals being considered by President Carter as part of his new tax reform package include legislation to wipe out or greatly reduce existing tax deductions for gifts to charity.

According to College Business Manager, Shane Riorden such legislation would be great cause for concern due to the enormous dependence the College has on such gifts. If bequests were not to be classified as tax deductible, he said, "the incentive (for giving) would be greatly reduced."

However, the prospects of such a radical change getting through Congress are quite slim due to the strong lobbying power large charities can bring to bear, Riorden maintained. The changes, when Carter finally unveils them, will probably be more closely related to the idea of a minimum tax.

The minimum taxation scheme would require each eligible person to pay some base tax no matter how much credit in deductions he claims.

The College is also presently engaged in a legal battle over the definition of earned taxable income as opposed to non-taxable benefits. Williams is now disputing the Internal Revenue Service classification of taxable remuneration in three different matters.

The first of these is the IRS insistence that professors who eat free at house guest meals should have

Letters: Tyler issue, lecture funding

Tyler Pot Club

To the editor:

As a concerned member of the student body and a member of Tyler House, I feel that some personal observations on the Tyler Pot Club affair are in order. Peter Rintels' article accurately documents the activities at Tyler over the past few weeks but fails, in my opinion, to accurately reflect the cross-tides of opinion among house members and especially those of the major proponents of the issue.

The initial attitude of many house members is accurately reflected by the article. Many members did treat it as a lark or as yet another convenience to be provided by the house. Furthermore, Graham campaigned for the issue on this basis. The proponents claim of moral motivation was not, in my opinion, apparent to most members. That the implications of the vote later shocked many members should not be overly emphasized. The issue was sold on a superficial basis and was treated so until Monday, Oct. 3 when the Deans came to dinner. It should be added that until this date knowledge of the Administrations' interest in the matter was limited to a small group.

The transition in house members' attitudes clearly occurred at dinner on Oct. 3. Private conversation among those aware of the Administrations' interest showed great concern over the matter and careful analysis of the costs and benefits not only of those directly involved, but also those of the student body and of the College as an institution. The emphasis on morality and recognition of the act as one of civil disobedience was not, as one may infer from the article, a righteous stance suddenly assumed by those directly involved, but one that was, at the very least, consistent with the position of many of those in favor of the proposal. That this aspect was raised at the meeting of Oct. 5 by several members—who were not directly involved, and who had voted in favor of the original proposal on this basis, substantiates this point.

Opinion changes following dinner were not limited to that of the minority standing on a moral platform while the majority was bulldozed into retraction of the vote by the threat of no more parties. The Deans were reasonable and yet while not sympathetic, it was clear their paramount concern was that we understand the implications of our vote. Although rumors may fly concerning what was said over dinner, the resentment generated by some exchanges stemmed from the ambiguity of the position of the Deans at dinner; were they acting in their official capacity, or as interested parties? House members were, in my opinion, well-informed and not unduly pressured by the Administration.

The majority of members were, in my opinion, primarily concerned with their own skin. Although many were as the Record stated, "sympathetic with the moral issue," the likelihood of disbanding Tyler as a social unit and of police rummaging through their drawers was of greater importance to those less-idealistically motivated. Nor should this attitude be condemned. Rather, I would remind members of this college that the Williamstown Police may feel obligated to take action. It is likely, in my opinion, that some searches may take place, that Security will no longer occasionally overlook smoking in public, and that the College will take some form of disciplinary action against those found using pot. These are real costs that all, to some degree, will pay.

Although I do not believe the significance of Graham's actions at the meeting of Oct. 5 are as ambiguous as they seem in the article, I do not feel it would be proper for me to comment further. I do, however, share the opinion with other members that it was a shame that the issue was not brought to a full vote. One of the advantages of the unanimity resolution was, in my opinion, to allow house members to vote on the principle of the matter without regard to possible disciplinary action. Far from being treated flippantly, the reaction of the house to the meeting demonstrated to me the seriousness with which the majority of members treated the issue.

The result of the vote has absolved Tyler from responsibility insofar as the College is concerned. The Record's publication of the article places, at least to a degree, a responsibility on all of us. The question to be answered personally is not whether pot should be legalized, not if it was proper for some students to raise the issue in this manner, and not whether the Record acted properly in publishing this article. The question is; in my opinion: as members of a community, are we going to condemn others for exercising their right of free speech and to political recourse? True, the publication of the article may lead to some inconveniences. True, the issue is, at its worst, asinine. At its heart, however, is the matter of being willing to bear the costs of having those rights. Can we, in this light, honestly call the proponents' actions—however improper in the light of the law, wrong, or the Record's publication of the article ill-considered? I do not believe we may, but it is up to each one of us to decide.

Lecture Committee

To the editor:

In the October 7th issue of the Record, my comments on the Lecture committee's funding procedures, made at the College Council meeting last Wednesday, were reported in a manner which might lead one to misunderstand my point. The present manner of allocating Lecture Committee funds does allow enough to contract "big name" speakers, but it does limit their number, My remarks were an attempt to solicit the opinions of Council members on the question of whether the Lecture committee should continue to devote a large proportion of its funds to supporting the efforts of departments and organizations to bring speakers to Williams, an alternative which divides the funds into small chunks, or whether it should devote itself to bringing more "big names", but fewer speakers, to Williams. I was not suggesting an alternative to the Lecture Committee.

Let me take this opportunity to solicit the opinions of all students on this question, and on the more mundane, but more important issue of just who the Lecture committee should invite and-or fund.

Intricacies hinder ethics petition drive

The main problem involved in a public initiative petition drive for ethics legislation is that "you can't reduce it to a simple slogan," due to the complexity of the issues involved, explained Jay Hedlund of Common Cause.

Hedlund, from the organization's Boston office, and Morgan Downey from the national office spoke on Wednesday in Driscoll Hall about the Common Cause initiative petition drive and the provisions it contains. The major provisions of the petition include formation of an independent state ethics commission and full financial disclosure by all elected state and county officials and top appointed officials.

Hedlund and Downey claimed that, with full financial disclosure, citizens could if they chose vote against part-time legislators with substantial businesses on the side. People would also be more aware of any potential conflict of interest.

The lecture was sponsored by the Williams Americans for Democratic Action, some members of which are planning a campaign to get signatures for the Common Cause petition.

Under the terms of the petition, officials would not have to disclose the exact amount of outside income, just its source and amount within certain

Student debate revived

By Michael Mallett

The Adelphic Speaking Union has resurfaced at Williams with new plans and energies after a year of dormancy. "College debate is dying, especially at Ivy League colleges, because it is closing on its own structure," said Jeff Trout, captain of debate. With this in mind, the revived ASU plans to adopt a more informal approach to debate in which student interest receives priority.

According to Trout, the ASU will emphasize that the forensic art can be pleasurable and can offer much to the individual. Trout notes with disgust that many campuses have turned debate into an expensive, time consuming and competitive sport directed towards college prestige. At Williams, however, the Union will not aim at the national circuit, but rather at the development of local participation.

The Finance Committee has [illegible] recommended a $200 grant to the ASU, Trout said, and the group thus feels ready to set plans in motion. Trout and President of the Union, Michael Golden, will hold an organizational meeting on October 17.

As an immediate goal, the Union intends to reinstate the freshman speaking contest, where each freshman entry selects a representative to speak on a common topic. Although no definite subject has been chosen, one possibility is "Why Amherst is the best college in New England." The event obviously lends toward the facetious drawing more laughter than philosophical reflection. In the past, the audience has often been as witty, or wittier, than the speakers themselves.

Future projects also include an all campus oratorical competition and debates on contemporary issues with three or four other colleges. Realizing the value of healthy rivalry, the Union may arrange debates within the Tri-Co Three. The format would incorporate both team debate and individual events.

A team usually consists of two people who speak to a specific topic, of national or common interest, in a specified amount of time. Persuasive, informational, extemporaneous, interpretive and after dinner speeches characterize individual events. Interpretive speaking involves the recital of a literary passage in which voice intonation and selection of material count the most.

After dinner speaking, also an obscure facet of oral competition, supposedly originated with Mark Twain. In this event, the speaker delivers humorous and sometimes outrageous material in a serious, matter-of-fact manner. Trout recalled a presentation where the speaker proposed that stuttering could be cured by eliminating "s" from the English language. An "s" at the beginning of a word would be pronounced as a "q," and at the end of a word as a "b." In the middle of the word, substitution would be arbitrary. The speaker then proceeded to recite Hamlet's "To be or not to be" speech in thib style.

Steve Jacobson '79 was the last winner of the freshman speaking contest. The newly reorganized Adelphic Speaking Union promises to sponsor several such contests in the coming year.

Another Night Time Flight

MCA Records PIG-2290

"Another Night Time Flight" proves to be just another offering by just another four-man British band. Co-produced by Elton John (whose name curiously appears only on the record label, as if in a futile attempt to escape blame), Blue is Badfinnger at its blandest, 10cc at their most innocuous.

To put it another way, Blue is all surface and no substance. The songs on A.N.T.F. are as pleasant as they are plain, as smooth as they are uninspiring. Blue can carry a fairly good tune, but by failing to inject any semblance of emotion or affect, they, by comparison, make Barry Manilow pine like Bryan Ferry or wail like Robert Plant.

The lyrics, moreover, are so cliche-ridden that I find myself longing for some words of wisdom from Kiss (at least Kiss sings with a conviction that conviction is for saps). Adding insult to injury (chiches best describe cliches), Blue seems to know no bounds when it comes to banality and triteness. Every song on the album is filled with fourth grade rhymes, fifth grade yearning, and sixth grade self-pity. The traditional "love is blue (pun intended), woe is me" syndrome annoyingly persists. "I'm Alone", for instance, provides us with this bit of profundity: "Things never last,— Seems the die's been cast."

The playing too is equally passionless. Steady acoustic guitars and keyboards provide an adequately average background behind Blue's correct, but stale harmonies, and almost every song conjures up the conventional rock and roll pattern of solo singing, followed by an up-tempo drumbeat, leading quickly into a chorus or refrain.

Blue, in other words, is plain, insignificant AM pulp—the kind of music you play to a girl to show her you're a "nice guy" (or is it "good guy"?); the mellow yellow nirvana topic of "laid-back" fireside evenings in which "sweet nothings" are as vacuous as they are mellifluous. "Fantasy", the second cut on side one, informs us: "This story's often told, About a man whose love's gone cold." Just substitute group and music and you get Another Night Time Flight. Or, to quote Blue again (admittedly, unfairly out of context) in the quasi-religious epiphanic schaltz of "I Understand," "I fall asleep." You will too.

many economists feel they can repay. If the capital market eventually decides that LDC debt has been built on poor economic judgment, banks and companies may try to pull out of LDC's suddenly and a catastrophe similar to the Great Crash of 1929 might result, said Diaz.

The debts of private countries have been growing steadily for the past ten years but at a much accelerated rate over the last four or five. Diaz pointed out that the lending of money has become "de-politicized," meaning socialist countries have no difficulty in borrowing from non-socialist nations such as the United States.

The new order proposed by the LDC's might not, in Diaz's opinion bring the world market up to a desirable state of efficiency. Some sort of change is in order, though, and the LDC demands might provide a needed decentralization of economic power.

He also pointed out that the plans would only aid the strongest fifty per cent of the LDC's without helping the poorest developing states. And due to income distribution disparities within LDC's, a new order would probably only aid the wealthier part of each nation's population.

Waterfights: Part II

By Jon Steer

Last week's controversial article looked at some of the complex and diverse reasons behind the freshman water fights. This week's article explores the ramifications of water fights vis a vis modern urbanized man, and describes what happens when theory is put into practice.

Despite the fact that water fights seem a confused melee to observers and participants alike, it takes a lot of planning to successfully execute a raid. Unfortunately, people still run into trees. In any case, one entry has gone so far as to appoint a Director of Subversive Activities. This would-be CIA director outlined his tasks with the confidence of a man who knows his business.

"I have four main duties," he said solemnly. "Conceive, co-ordinate, direct, and execute." He also claimed that at the time of the Morgan raid, he was unaware that there were females living in Morgan Mid-East and Mid-West.

The women who live in Morgan know they live there, though, and they had a good deal to say about the late-night incursions of "those guys" from the Quad.

"The first time I heard about water fights," one woman said, "was when there was water coming under my door." She proceeded to give a vivid account of the pandemonium surrounding a raid.

"A bunch of boys came over . . . carousing . . . I was in the bathroom and all of a sudden the door shook . . . Loud noises . . . running up and down the stairs." Her voice became more resonant as her excitement over the raid grew. "There we were in our nightgowns," she added quickly, putting her hand on my knee, "and in come these boys . . . They had bandana scarves on," she continued, "and they were yelling and screaming and singing 'Happy Birthday.'"

Another woman from Morgan described her initial experience as follows: "I was innocently standing there," she said, "and then I was innocently wet."

A return raid upon the culprits was staged. "We had perfume and powder," said a participant. "We left our scent." This raid too was chaotic. "The image I remember best," recalled one young lady, "was when I turned around and saw twelve screaming girls in a cloud of baby powder."

Those in Williams and Sage consider the raids on Morgan, Fayerweather, and Lehman mere skirmishes, with the main battle raging across the Quad. Williams has four men's entries while Sage has but two. Napoleon, however, claimed that "the moral is to the physical as three is to one." The men at Sage believe in the power of positive thinking.

"We've annihilated them all," one combatant of Sage insisted. "We've vanquished them. Brain is brawn is another area where Sage feels it possesses an advantage. "Win we act in manpower," he continued, "we make up for with brilliant tactical maneuvers." Not wishing to discount the efforts of Sage C, a girl's entry of unusual noteworthiness, the budding Zukovs said that "the Sage girls have been very helpful." The opposing dorm provides a different picture of female participation. "The Williams girls," he said, "just run around like they don't know what's going on."

Non-participation seems closely linked to a lack of awareness about the near-diurnal deluges that take place. "I don't know anything about the water fights," cooed one belle. "Oh, I'm not the one you want to talk to about the water fights," apologized another. "I didn't want to get involved," replied one apathist, "or wet."

Sage C provides an interesting contrast. Proclaimed by one inhabitant to be "the rowdiest girls' entry," Sage C boasts excellent participation and confident leadership. "Im the leader?" squealed their potentate. "I'm the boss?" she gasped, and she fell back into her chair in disbelief.

Those who are to survive in the world of water fights must constantly be on their guard. One night, the occupants of Sage E and F strolled confidently across the Quad to Williams. Pillows in hand, they began to taunt those inside. "No water, just pillows!" they shouted defiantly into the night. Utilizing the interconnecting basement corridors of Williams, the entire dorm's male contingent massed in one entry. In one shrieking banzai charge, they swooped down upon the would-be pillow fighters and thoroughly doused them.

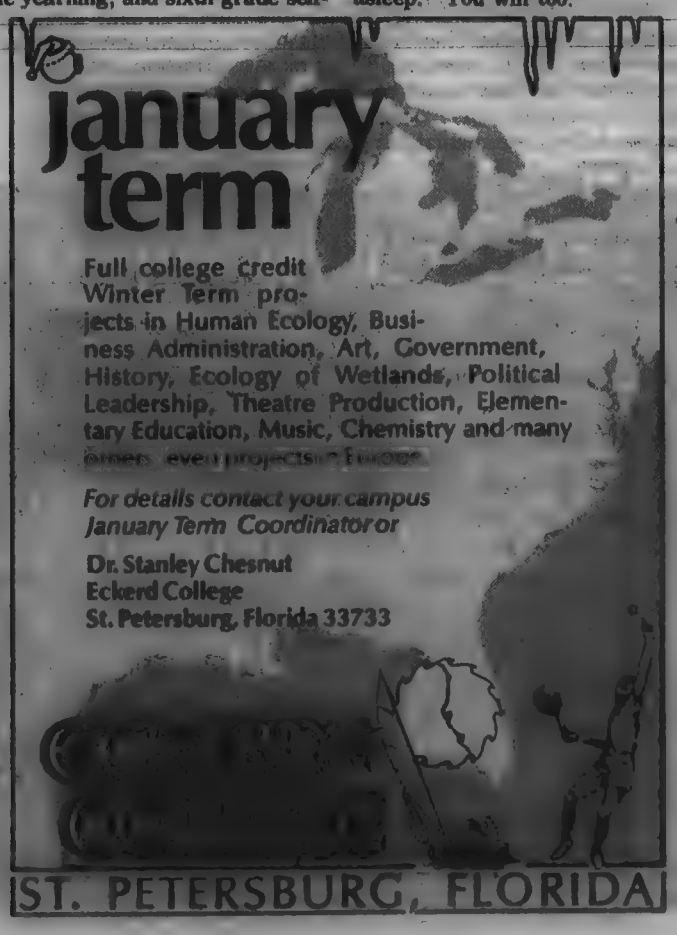
The rough-and-tumble give-and-take of cut-and-thrust water-fighting continues. So does the annoying use of hyphenated words. But the plans of those involved for the future are of interest to all.

"No comment," replied one [illegible].

"No comment," responded another.

"We're waiting for the snowball season," answered a third.

"I'm never going to talk to the press again," said a fourth, "because they write down everything you say."



Overall, one can only say that the situation remains fluid.

75 per cent chance of clear weather for this eclipse. "Still," Pasachoff admitted, "even though the ship can maneuver a bit, we are very dependent on the weather. That's a hazard that eclipse observers have to get used to."

Students, faculty and staff at Williams can observe 11 per cent of the solar eclipse from the observing deck of Thompson Physical Lab. It will be open from 4:45 p.m. to 5:45 p.m., the period of time that the eclipse will be visible in Williams [illegible].

Freshman Revue's three shows deemed less hectic, more polished

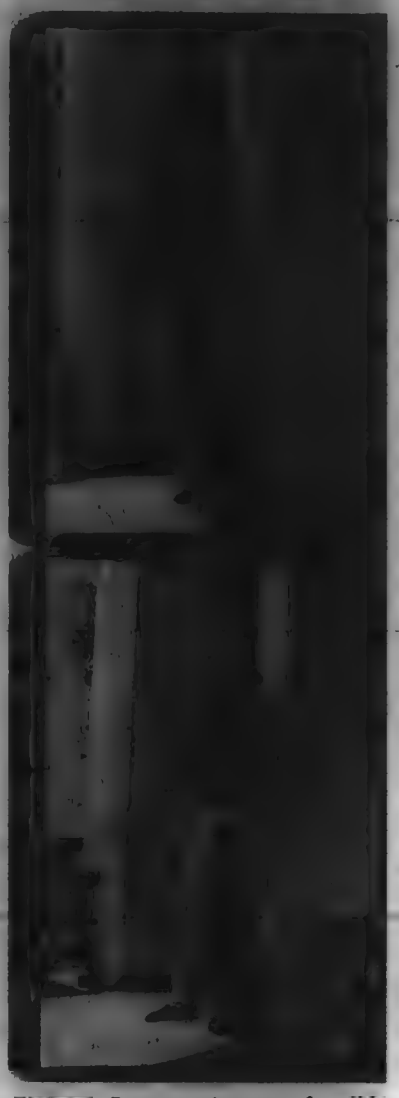
by Sewsy VonMeschzisker

Each year, the Freshman Revue gets a little bit more polished. Its general purpose, according to Artistic Director Kevin O'Rourke, is to introduce the freshmen to theater at Williams. This year's show will be opening Thursday and continuing through Freshman Parents' Weekend. It consists of three individual shows, each with a different director and separate casts. This has allowed for more rehearsal time, says O'Rourke and has made it easier for the performers. O'Rourke's job has been to take what the three directors have done and make it into a viable production that works as a whole.

The technical aspects of the Revue are much more ambitious than they have been in past years. Phil Lippell, the show's stage manager has improved Jesup Auditorium by installing a temporary raised stage, which extends out from the main stage. "We needed a larger stage in order to use a larger cast," explains Lippell, "and a stage which comes out into the Auditorium brings the show closer to the audience. There is seating on all three sides of the platform which allows for an even trade-off between the balcony and the lower level and this creates an interesting perspective for the performers to work with."

The show itself consists of a short one-act comedy called The Still Alarm by George Kaufmann, a serious play by Jerome Lawrence called Live Spelled Backwards, and an original hour-long musical written by Martha Williamson, '77, and Marc Lichtman, '78, called The Regulars.

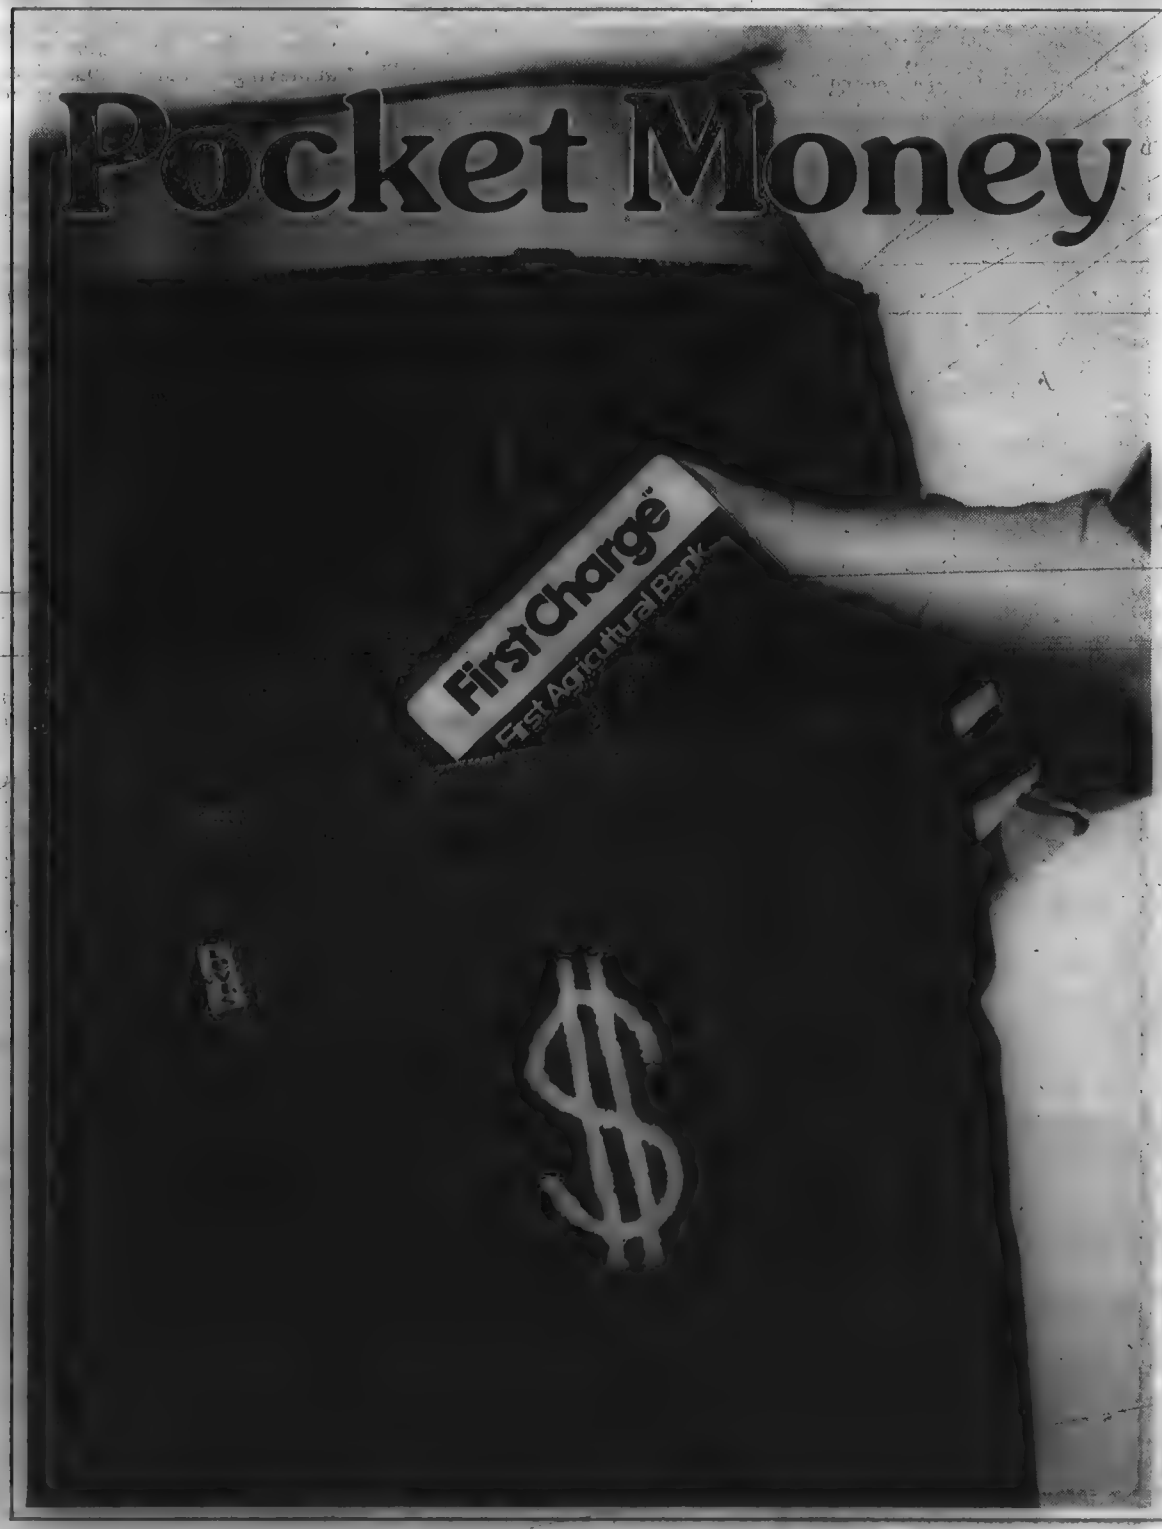
The Still Alarm, as its director Rob Baker puts it, "embodies all of the elements of the neo-Marxist commentary on the empiricist-positivist conflict." It is a play about a burning hotel in which the people seem unaware of the necessity of immediate action although they are fully aware of the raging fire. "The play," says Baker should certainly not be taken too seriously. George Kaufmann, himself, undoubtedly was laughing as he wrote it."



Jon Stolzberg is directing the second play which is called Live Spelled Backwards. He, along with the other directors is "surprised and pleased at the acting potential of this year's freshmen." His actors have "responded with imagination and given the character great depth." Stolzberg remained close-mouthed about the nature of his play because he said that it is best seen with an open mind. The show, he says, is a "good choice for a freshman Revue because it is extremely dramatic and takes a lot out of the performers."

Martha Williamson, who graduated last June, is back to work with Marc Lichtman on her fifth Freshman Revue at Williams. She and Lichtman produced two musicals together last year. Her show, she says, is "unlike other Revues in that it is a challenge for the freshmen."

"We're not writing a show that we consider to be tailored for the Revue. We're writing a show for its own sake rather than expecting first year college students to be incapable of putting out as much as more experienced per-formers and they're giving a lot more than they thought they had to give."



The Regulars is based on a concept of "systematic schizophrenia"—the belief that every human being has different programs in mind on how to act with different people—and this is dramatized by a scene in a singles bar

Reflections:

Carter emphasizes human rights

by Maureen Fouley '81

After thirty-nine weeks under what some might call the decisive others the idealistic, yet nearly all the unusual Presidency of Jimmy Carter, let us take a pause from our mid-summer contemplations to reflect for a moment on what has taken place and where, if anywhere, the new Captain of the Ship of State, to use a trite phrase, is leading us.

To this date, the Carter foreign policy can be summed up in two words—human rights. On this pretext, the President has based nearly all negotiations with foreign powers and, particularly, with the Soviet Union. Human rights is a vague, quixotic term that reminds one of the Declaration of Independence and is one of those stock phrases that is repeated on the Fourth of July amid the boom of resounding fireworks. Of course it does form the basis of our society, and if the Constitution and the Bill of Rights stand for anything, they stand for this affirmation of individual liberty. Yet, George Kennan, our former Ambassador to Russia, is right when he calls any attempt to spread democracy through this world largely futile. Realistically, democracy is a rare breed of government which few nations on this globe could probably tolerate—at least not all at once. Hence the idea of America leading the glorious crusade to promote democracy across this planet is nauseating, since it reminds one not only of the pragmatic impossibility of such a proposal but also of the idealism of Woodrow Wilson in his dreams for a League of Nations.

Of course, the Republican Senators including Henry Cabot Lodge who vigorously opposed Wilson's plan did so on the grounds that it would force us to accept the role of the protector of world peace, the guardian of democracy. America rejected the League, and ushered in the isolationism of the 1920's. But since World War II, America has come to the realization that isolationism at the expense of our international interests is expensive, foolish, and illusionary. America cannot afford to allow any foreign ideology incompatible with our own to spread its influence throughout the rest of the world.

Wars of containment have fallen out of favor, thanks to the Viet Nam War, but American foreign policy from Truman to Nixon was essentially based on the idea of containing communism within its already existing boundaries. In the wake of the Vietnam debacle, this policy was shunned and a new outlook called detente formed from the visions of Dr. Henry Kissinger. For nearly eight years, America relaxed as cold war tensions eased and as friction with the Soviets came to an apparent halt. Nixon promised us peace for "generations to come," as he and Kissinger plotted the detente stratagem. Jimmy Carter came into a White House that had been dominated by this internationalism, and abruptly changed the whole outlook of the foreign policy. His statement about human rights and his accusations aimed, at least indirectly, at Leonid Brezhnev, the party boos of the Kremlin, have put the Russians on the defensive. Perhaps more important in analyzing the Carter foreign policy is a lesson to us of what we have harbored in our minds for the past decade. Only now is the full extent of the illusion under which we were laboring during the Kissinger years becoming blatantly obvious. We adopted phony internationalism, while playing the role of dumb isolationists who not only refused to come to grips with the reality of the international situation, but created for ourselves a dream cloud of glorious crusading for peace. America is in a far worse position today—military and in prestige—than she was in 1969 and for that horrible truth we have only to blame the naive Mr. Nixon and his clever Richelieu.

Across the globe, we are now seeing the repercussions of what the Nixon-Kissinger-Ford foreign policy has wreaked on us. In Africa, in the Middle-East, in Europe, we have allowed the Soviet Union to gain enormous ground. We have also allowed the U.S.S.R. to outstrip us in nearly every military capacity. In short, we have opened ourselves, defenseless to a vast and unsympathetic enemy. We are in no position at present, for instance, to make the firm stand that John Kennedy finally made in regard to the Cuban missile crisis. We have wasted valuable time talking about illusionary dreams of world peace while Russia has armed and spread her influence. As Winston Churchill put it, "For we shall do it in the end. We shall sure do it. But how much harder our toil, for every day's delay."

Therefore, rather than being illusionary and idealistic, Carter's foreign policy is a step in the right direction because it forces the Russians on the defensive and tries to equalize the inbalance that has grown with every passing year and which the Kissinger admirers have dismissed as necessary for world peace. Carter must watch his idealism however. Like a fire it may run rampant to spread conflagration and result in the United States taking on too much and leading a crusade to make the peoples of all nations free and give them happier lives. Although such philosophy is inticing, it makes ungainly foreign policy. As a facade from which to force a retraction of the Soviet gains resulting from "detente" and even as a good and accurate image to convey to the outside world that America is ready and willing to fight for its principals, the human rights ideal is justifiable. But never as a motive for involving American lives in the affairs of other nations except when in our national interest.

those meals taxed as income. The College maintains that guest meals are an essential part of the educational program at Williams and should not be taxed.

If the College loses its fight faculty guest meals will probably not be discontinued, but the bookkeeping procedures, Riorden said, would be quite a burden.

Another dispute concerns the exact dollar value of meals eaten by employees in College dining halls. Riorden said he sees a compromise coming with a very slight increase in the value of the meals. The effect, he said, will only consist of "pennies". The College will increase its Social Security payments and employees will also bear slightly higher Federal Income Tax deductions.

The final concern being argued by the College's lawyers in Boston with the IRS is over College-sponsored second mortgages for faculty. The IRS maintains that the interest rates offered are far too low for what is generally considered a very high risk loan. The College in turn points to the fact that it has not had a foreclosure in the last ten years and offers the mortgages only as a service to the faculty.

A compromise will have to be reached, Riorden admitted, something which will probably force the interest rates above 10 per cent. However, he points out, this will actually increase the amount of deductions affected faculty can claim on their tax returns. Though the IRS will not get a significant increase in taxes, it insists the change is necessary according to its policy of "uniformity of practice".

In recent years as the IRS has narrowed its definition of taxable income there was some concern that the faculty children's scholarship fund would be lost as an untaxed benefit. The fund helps pay the costs of higher education to children of many College employees. However, after intense pressure by many groups affected by similar restrictions, the IRS cancelled some of its boldest reclassifications, the fund being among them.

The existing legal struggle over definitions of taxable income are not a serious issue to Williams, Riorden continued. In fact, it is "more an irritant" than anything else. Since the serious questions such as the faculty children's scholarship fund have been dropped by the IRS, and since the President's proposed tax changes have not yet been precisely formulated, there is little immediate concern.

TM enriches being

by Sally Midgely and [illegible]

"Everyone should transcend if they hope to be normal human beings." This statement, made by Transcendental Meditation (TM) instructor Christopher Curren, typifies the emotion commonly found among meditators, especially those who practice TM.

Various types of meditation have been practiced for thousands of years, but with Maharishi Mahesh Yogi's recent development of "transcending," the popularity of meditation has soared. TM, as opposed to other forms of meditation, involves no concentration. Instead, spontaneous thoughts lead the mind to a higher level of consciousness. Ultimately, a state of total inner alertness, mental integrity, and freedom from stress. At this point, the meditator experiences the deepest possible form of rest, as his metabolic rate decreases approximately 14 per cent.

After two introductory lectures and a personal interview, the student is assigned his "mantra". The mantra is a meaningless sound, taken from the sanskrit language. It is continually repeated during meditation, and takes the mind to a state of pure consciousness. The average meditation period is twenty minutes, during which time experiences vary according to the individual. Afterwards, the meditator feels alert, refreshed, and rested.

Minimizing the agitation of the mind is another benefit of TM. Meditation tends to remove one's "inner dialogue," that voice which verbalizes conscious though in one's mind. The absence of this voice allows one to absorb images without processing them and thus become more tolerant of other people. Another result of meditation is the normalization of the nervous system, relieving stress and tension.

A number of Williams students meditate regularly, and advocate the application of TM to college life. Junior Melinda Ballou claims that meditation has increased her concentration, and improved her ability to study. "TM has made a big difference in my life," Melinda says. "I can't imagine how I got along without it." She points out, however, that meditating yields no immediate revelation. "The improvement in one's life occurs over a period of time."

Many people feel that they cannot afford to set aside two twenty minute periods each day for meditation. Lauren Iosa, another Williams student who practices TM, points out a flaw in this common opinion. She argues that TM, by improving her concentration, has helped her use her time much more effectively. It has also helped her deal with social pressures, she says. However, "TM is not a Band-Aid," she is careful to add. The technique is not intended as an escape route, but rather as a source of confidence in dealing with problems.

TM increases the possibilities of "achieving harmonious and meaningful relationships with people," says freshman Chris Knight. Having practiced meditation for little more than a year, Chris comments he already finds himself more confident, and less apt to "wear masks and play games." His thinking has become increasingly organized and clear, he adds, and he has assumed a much more positive attitude towards life.

Chris has found other diverse pluses in meditation, such as a decreased need for sleep. Forty minutes of TM per day allow him to exist easily on 2-3 hours less sleep at night. Furthermore, meditation has improved his performance in athletics, by both decreasing his reaction time and relieving physical tension. A strong believer in TM, Chris concludes he "would recommend this to anyone who wants to improve the quality of their life."

The International Meditation Society (Pittsfield) plans to offer TM instructional programs periodically at Williams. The program consists of 2 introductory lectures, a personal interview, private instruction, and 3 seminar-discussion meetings. The student fee is $85.

where the characters are "socializing."

Lichtman's music, as always, is exciting and entertaining as he creates a variety of moods. There is a song about a hooker in which the singer bemoans her situation and a humorous number entitled "Lover (in my Love)" which is sung by a frustrated lover. The final number is striking and emotionally involving and it serves as an impressive finale to the Revue.

"We are more serious about the Revue this year," concludes Rourke. "It is a little less hectic and disorganized than in the past and we're using good scripts instead of inside jokes and raunchy humor."

Ephs trample Trinity 28-0

by Tim Cawden

Homecoming weekend on the Trinity College campus, along with the celebration of 100 years of football for the Bantams, with student and alums readying for the post-game hullyboo after their cocky roosters trounced poor old Williams. The biggest party in Hartford Saturday, however, came on Jessee Field, as Bill Whelan and the Williams offense uncorked a 458-yard marathon and routed the highly-touted hosts 28-0.

With many a worthy scribe composing eulogies for the 1977 Ephs, Bob Odell's youthful squad resurrected a passing attack which had supposedly been left in Don Wallace's footlocker, and jumped to a 21-0 first half lead, while pilfering five Trinity tosses on route to the first Williams shutout since a 13-0 blanking of Bowdoin last year.

"They thought they were gonna handle us," said Williams mentor Odell, "it was a heckuva win for us." Odell's pregame strategy of putting Bill Whelan at quarterback "to settle things down, then put Greg (Collins) in when the situation called for him," looked like a stroke of genius as Whelan played the game of his life, throwing for nearly 250 yards and three touchdowns.

Sophomore halfback Dave Massucco hauled in a perfectly thrown Whelan bomb on the second Williams possession of the game, racing in for a 62-yard score. Massucco made the grab at arms length, two steps beyond a Trinity cornerback reportedly recovering in the burn treatment unit of a Hartford hospital.

The completion was the first of fifteen for senior Whelan, while Massucco picked up the first of his two touchdowns. The latter also spearheaded the Williams running game via the overland route with a style which would make Rod Milburn jealous and gives coaches grey hairs.

"We ran the double slot (formation) most of the afternoon," explained Odell, "the openings were there, so we took 'em." Indeed the highly-touted Trinity squad took the field with a group of defensive backs who were rumored to hit like a ton of bricks, and turned out to play pass defense like a ton of bricks, as well.

Soph Backs Key

Williams' fettaccini backfield of Massucco and fellow soph Gus Nuzzolese put together a pair of runs for the second Eph score. Nuzzolese broke a couple tackles at the line of scrimmage and rambled to the Trinity 11 for 38 yards. Massucco slipped off the left side behind Bob VanDore and Kenny Schoeck, un touched for the score. Ken Hollingsworth added the PAT.

Whelan floated a pretty spiral to Hollingsworth in the left corner of the end zone on the very next Eph possession to pad the Williams cushion and send a stunned Trinity team into the locker room at intermission down.

Throughout the DRY afternoon, while Whelan and company were conducting an all-out blitzkrieg on the scoreboard the Williams defense was stifling a Trinity passing attack which more closely resembled a game of ultimate frisbee. Running from Colin Hart and Ralph Spooner occupied much of Trinity signal-caller Mike Foye's time, while throwing to Greg McAleenan consumed most of what was left.

An Alumnus of the Week

McAleenan picked off three of Foye's tosses, including a diving grab in the Williams end zone, directly from the paws of slippery Pat McNamara and preventing a touchdown. It was McAleenan's fifth steal of the young season, and it seems only a matter of time before opposing teams start throwing anywhere but where he is, a la Scott Perry.

Linebackers John Thiel and Phil Shuman each collared a Foye toss, Shuman's off a nice drop into yet another McNamara route. The final Williams linebacker, impressive frosh Brian Benedict found the gaps in the Trinity offensive line to his liking on several occasions for tackles at or behind the line of scrimmage.

Whelan pumped Hollingsworth on a square out and lofted a completion down the sideline which the junior pass catcher tightroped and hung on to for a 48-yard gain leading to the final Eph score. A 26-yard toss to Hollingsworth and a 13-yard scoring toss to Whelan's roommate and fellow senior Bill Miller brought the count to 28-0.

Besides Miller, Massucco and Hollingsworth, Herb McCormick, Todd Eckerson, John Del'Erario, and Nuzzolese all caught passes from Whelan and Collins, presenting an impressive arsenal of receivers for future Eph opponents. "Now," says Odell, "all we have to do is get our running game together."

Williams also got a fine headhunting performance out of sophomore special teams man John McGovern, who made several initial hits on kickoffs, and one teeth-rattling hit on a pass reception in the fourth period.

On the dark side of the ledger, Williams has lost sophomore tackle Jack Spound with a dislocated ankle. He is expected to be out for the season, and will be replaced by VanDore, who played the entire junior varsity game Friday, before working most of the varsity contest. Tri-captain Pete Tuttle sprained his left ankle and will be out at least a week. Mike Sarney filled in more than adequately Saturday.

Williams, now at 2-1 on the current season, returns for a two-week homestand Saturday, the first game a tussle with the Polar Bears from Bowdoin. The Bears broke into the win column Saturday with victory over W.P.I., and have never beaten Williams under Odell.

Trinity hands booters third shut out

by Mark Pogue

Shots on goal: 20 for us, eight for them. Corner kicks: nine here, four there. Goalie saves: three by us, 16 by them. Goals: one for them, and that was all it took for the Trinity Bantams to beat Williams' frustrated Ephmen in soccer action at Hartford last Saturday.

The grim defeat marked the third consecutive 1-0 shutout of the Ephbooters, and lengthened the club's scoreless drought to an incredible four hours and 35 minutes of playing time. What accounts for the Ephs' impotence? "We're getting the ball downfield well," Purple analyst Jeff Vennell believes, "but we're not aggressive enough in the penalty area. It's the little things—dribbling too long, passing off late—that are hurting us."

Williams blasted off to a strong start in the Trinity game and had Bantam netminder Jason Waugh under the gun almost from the outset. Yet time and again Williams crosses labeled "Score Me" passed all the way through the Bantam penalty area without being touched by a second Ephman. "I've never seen so many balls make it through the goal mouth area like that," volunteered referee Cale Antyr at the half. "Wow."

The Ephbooters, quicker and more skilled than Trinity, maintained a general control of the action in the second half, but could not solve Waugh's net. Rockets by Greg Hartman and Henry Osborne, who is back at trailer, were neatly defused by the cool junior. In Williams' defensive quarter, meanwhile, an inspired Bruce Camilleri was wasting Bantam attackers like flies in the course of playing what Vennell termed "the best game at sweeper I've seen at Williams."

Women racqueteers ace Springfield, 9-0

by Evan Bash

The women's tennis team metamorphosed into a merciless group of gangsters Saturday, firing tennis balls around like bullets on a chilly October afternoon to put a sound Springfield team on ice 9-0.

If the Ephwomen's performance was any kind of an indication as to just how much they are improving, only the left side of Williams' 4-2 record seems likely to change as the season moves on. "We've still got our hands full," said coach Curt Tong after the match, in reference to the Eph's remaining matches. He cannot, however, help but be encouraged by a showing that saw very few games dropped to a Springfield group that was stronger than the one that lost to Williams 6-3 last year.

The tone of the match was set at the No. one singles position, where captain Laura Carson played a smart game to best a player that had won at No. one last year, 6-1, 6-2. Becky Chase settled an old score for Carson as she thrashed an opponent who had beaten Laura last year 6-3, 6-0, while No. three Trudie ten Broeke was sharp in a 6-0, 6-2 win. Ann Morris posted a double bagel victory, 6-0, 6-0 and fellow freshman Laura Goebel triumphed 6-2, 6-4. Sherry Willcox scored a moral as well as actual victory when she beat Springfield's No. two player, who arrived late to the match, in three sets.

All the doubles teams continued to look impressive as they now have lost only two matches between them. Sally Kruse and Amy Demorest dominated the net for an easy 6-0, 6-0 shutout. Sherry Edman and Amy Sterling had a little more trouble, but they prevailed for a 6-4, 6-4 win. Remaining as the only undefeated players on the team were Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale in a 6-2, 6-0 rout.

Trudie ten Broeke (No. 3) handily defeated her opponent 6-0, 6-2 as Williams shutout Springfield 9-0.

QB Whelan named athlete of week

Quarterback Bill Whelan of the varsity football team has been selected as the Record Athlete of the Week following his superb aerial performance which led the Ephmen to a 28-0 victory over Trinity. The senior QB launched the pigskin 27 times for 15 completions and three touchdowns. The Bantam secondary was virtually helpless under the barrage of passes as the Whelan airshow flew for 248 yards.

Honorable Mention—Michele Cutsforth, the number one runner on the women's cross country team, receives an honorable mention this week for her first place finish in the University of Vermont-Dartmouth tri-meet Saturday.

Sailors suffer at 420 regatta

The Williams Sailing Team attended the 420 Invitational Regatta this weekend and suffered a loss. With heavy winds increasing to 35 m.p.h., the racing was grueling.

With a fifteenth in A division and a tenth in B division the team finished 13th out of 16 schools. National powerhouse Tufts was first followed by Yale, U.R.I., and Coast Guard.

A division was sailed by freshmen Scott Page and Spiro Rombotis. B division had the second year team of George Wilbanks and Ann Flocken sailing. Strong starts and fast upwind legs early in the day gave this pair two thirds, but inconsistency led to a gloomy day all around. Needless to say, practice facilities could do nothing but help the team.

Williams women's soccer rolled over Mount Holyoke last week 4-1. The Ephwomen dominated offensively shooting on goal 23 times to their opponent's 3. Scoring for the purple were Sara Reynolds, Melissa Mechem, Maggie O'Brien and Elizabeth Reeseel. (photo by Johnson)

Men and Women harriers win tri-meet

Men shut out Trinity

The Williams cross country team remained the only unbeaten fall team and in the process ran its victory string to six last Saturday. Traveling to Hartford the team made short work of both Trinity and Union. Despite the absence of Frank Carr who had to stay in Williamstown to take the LSAT's, the Purple Wave managed to shut out Trinity 15-45 and beat Union 20-39.

In a highly uncharacteristic move Joe Kolb bolted for the lead at the start and by the half mile mark Kolb, Tom Schreck, Dan Sullivan, Garrick Leonard, and Mike Behrman running as a pack, opened a sizable lead on the rest of the field. The group managed to break away from everyone except Union's Kevin Scheuer who caught the Purple Wave about two miles into the race. This pack stayed together until, with less than a half mile to go Scheuer, a fine track runner (4:09 mile) started to break away. Rather than race Scheuer the Eph contingent stayed together for a five way tie for second place and easy wins over both opponents. The group's tie at 25:28 was not far off the course record and was quite respectable considering the team had been training through the meet. The next Eph to finish was Buddy Bell, and although he couldn't match the speed he managed on the way down the Pike, he did run a stray 26:45 for tenth place. Following Buddy were Larry Wu, fourteenth (27:09), Hans Giesecke, seventeenth (27:30), Rusty Anderson, eighteenth (27:37).

The next race for the team is the NESCAC this Saturday at Amherst.

Women avenge UVM loss

Williams runners avenged an early season loss in style as the Women's Cross Country team swept the top three places and coasted to a victory in a triangular meet with the University of Vermont and Dartmouth Saturday.

Michele Cutsforth, consistently the squad's top runner, and junior Trish Beckwith flanked Cyane Gresham who ran an excellent race and finished second. All three rounded the 3.2 miles in under 21 minutes, comfortably near the course record.

Lisa Capaldini placed fifth for Williams, while freshman Lisa Kirschner pulled up eighth. After losing to the same squad in the September Williams Invitational, the team overwhelmed Vermont 19-43 and Dartmouth brought up the rear with a lethargic 27.

With Albany's forfeit last Wednesday, the wins over Vermont and Dartmouth advance the season's record to 13-4. According to coach Robert Fisher, Williams will now ready itself for the Small College Invitational at Amherst next weekend. One week later, the team will return to the New England Championships, where Fisher hopes it can duplicate last year's outstanding third place finish.

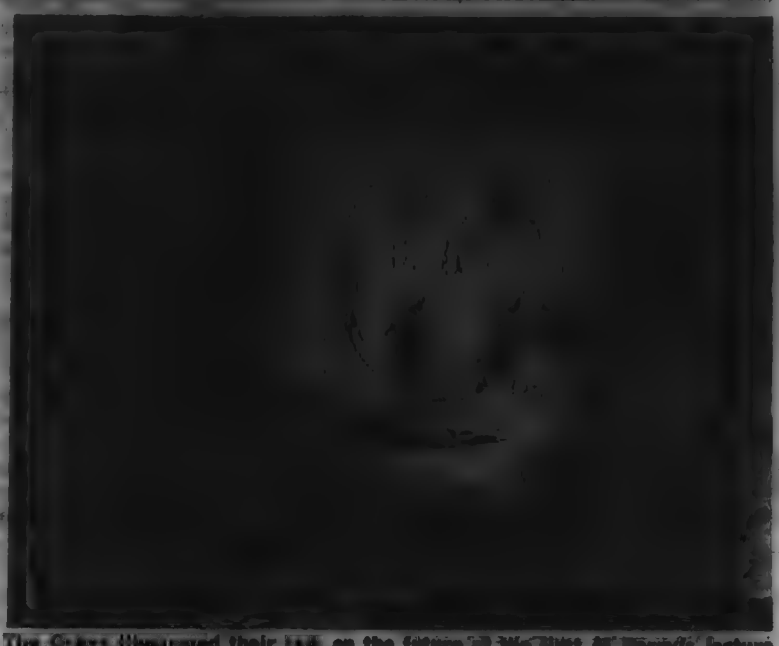
Amherst trustees refuse to divest college of stock in South Africa

The Trustees of Amherst College refused last Friday to 'commit' the college to divesting itself of stocks owned in corporations with holdings in South Africa, thereby rejecting petitions of over half the student body and some Amherst faculty. The decision was the latest development in an issue that has been hotly debated in the five-college area in the past months. Both Hampshire College and the University of Massachusetts have sold their holdings in corporations involved in South Africa.

Petitions circulated at Amherst last spring asked that the college use its proxy votes to pressure corporations into withdrawing their operations from South Africa. If after two years the corporation failed to show progress in that direction, the college was to sell its holdings in it, according to the petitions.

The Amherst Trustees made their decision after meeting last Friday with leaders from the Amherst Action Coalition and the Amherst South African Support group. According to the Amherst Student, one of the arguments raised was that of "encouraging the trend among colleges toward using investment policies to register public protest against investment policy." Between 80 and 100 student supporters of the divestiture petitions picketed outside the meeting for roughly an hour.

The Amherst trustees justified their actions in a statement released after the meeting in which they asserted that it was better for corporations to try and alleviate the effects of apartheid through progressive actions than to "require the immediate and outright withdrawal of capital and employment opportunities which would result in a special hardship to black South Africans."



The trustees did agree, however, to observe certain guidelines for dealings with corporations with holdings in South Africa, including a refusal to hold stock in companies based in, or whose major business is with South Africa and a pledge to oppose shareholder resolutions favoring new loans or renewals of loans to the Vorster regime. They also said they would expect corporations there to eliminate "practices which sustain apartheid" and would sell their stock in companies not complying with these instructions "within a reasonable amount of time."

The Amherst Student responded editorially to the trustee action by calling it "unacceptable." The paper felt that the situation of South African blacks was more likely to be improved corporate withdrawal to destabilize the Vorster regime than by progressive actions by non-South African concerns. "If the Trustees really believe that these (progressive) practices are enough to spell the end of apartheid, they are only kidding themselves," the editorial said. According to David Moore, co-editor in chief of the Student, the trustees have merely agreed to apply a "code of corporate conduct," which was adopted several years ago. "Many students are frustrated that the college won't take an active role," he said.

Both the University of Massachusetts and Hampshire College have divested themselves of financial interests in South Africa in the past year. The Hampshire action followed a student take over of the administration building, in the wake of which the college sold all of its stock holdings.

Treasurer of the College, Francis Dewey III said he did not know how much money Williams had in companies dealing with South Africa. According to Dewey, the College owns no stock in corporations whose main business is there, but it does own stock in some major corporations such as ITT and Exxon with minor operations in the country.

The College, Dewey said, has no written code of corporate conduct similar to Amherst's, but it has just recently, after a lapse of several years resubscribed to an information service which permits social and political activities of corporations. Both the financial officers of the College and the Trustee finance committee are "very conscious" of the College's moral obligations in making investments, he said. He added that Williams has not taken any action on the South African problem to date, but that if it disagreed with a corporation's policies on that issue, Williams might write a letter to the management rather than take action through proxy voting, which he termed "ineffective."

Dodson Grays inaugurate Perry lecture series on future

The Perry House lecture series, paid for by house cultural funds, on "The Problem of the Future" began Tuesday night when Elizabeth and David Dodson Gray, co-directors of the Bolton Institute, spoke on "Growth and Its Implications for the Future."

The first in a series of five lecture-discussions, the talk served as an overview, covering economic growth, energy, population and food, pollution, and resources.

The Grays said they believe that any approach to the problem of growth must include a study of all the above factors which they claimed are inextricably interrelated.

As they described their growth statistics and explanative poster boards, one could not help but feel a sense of impending doom. According to the Grays, if the world, especially the U.S., does not change its lifestyle drastically, our reserves of oil, coal, and other minerals could be nearly exhausted by the year 2000.

The Grays used exponential growth figures to explain how "what seems remote today may be near a crucial stage." Too often, they stated, society does not begin to act until the crucial stage.

If oil consumption continues to increase at the present rate, the Grays stated that by the year 2000, only one-fourth of known reserves will be left. Presently, 295 billion of the 916 billion barrels of known world oil have been used, one-half of this amount since 1965.

The United States, said the Grays, has traditionally viewed the population-food problem as one of too many people in other countries like India and Asia. The populous countries retort that though they have more people, they eat less of foods like beef, which cost more in terms of time and energy.

What can be done? The Grays suggest imitating nature's cyclical energy systems in our industries, making the quantity and quality of energy meet the use, and drastically changing our eating and living habits.

Committee sets co-op forum

In a planning meeting Monday the Student Housing Committee hammered out a proposal for co-op housing to present to students for criticism this Monday. While evading the question of which houses to take for co-op housing, the group agreed on a selection process for assigning students to the houses, fees, affiliation and coeducation.

The committee planned Monday's meeting to help them evaluate student interest in a co-op program and to acquaint students with others interested in the co-op plan who may be their future house-mates.

The proposed selection process, devised by Dodd House president Al Gentry '78, divides the co-op house pool in two: in one house students would apply as a self-selected, capacity group, while in the other spaces would be filled by individuals and small groups.

Applications for co-op housing would be handled in February—before off-campus and transfer decisions. Decisions would be made randomly by computer for both application processes.

Co-op house members would be responsible for damages to the houses and would do minor maintenance and cleaning. Major maintenance and kitchen inspections would be performed by the College. Members will be required to pay full room fee despite the slight reduction in janitorial service.

While retaining affiliation with their present residential houses, eligible to attend guest meals and other functions paid for by student activities taxes, co-op house members would be allowed to request a $10 refund from their houses on forfeit of their eligibility. Residential houses would have the right to refuse the refund, as is now the case with off-campus residents who make the same request.

The committee decided that the randomness of the selection process and the varying compositions of applicant groups would make exact sex ratios in the co-op houses im-

The Student Housing Committee will sponsor an open meeting for all students interested in alternatives to the upperclass residential housing system, Monday, October 17 at 7:30 p.m. in the Makepeace Room. The committee will present its preliminary proposal for co-operative housing and will ask for responses to the proposal and general comments on housing alternatives at Williams.

Irish writer teaches fiction

by Julie Bermant

"Can you love an apple?" An Irish ballad begins with these words which visiting professor Tom MacIntyre envisions as the title of his next play. MacIntyre, who is teaching the fall semester fiction-writing course at Williams, says his play will address itself to the question, "Have you the courage to reach for the apple on the tree when you see the apple ripe and beckoning?" Among his published works are several plays, a novel, short stories, translations of Gaelic poetry and a political documentary.

MacIntyre, who is of Irish birth, has taught English and translation of Irish literature intermittently in the United States and has been writing since 1964. Because Ireland is a poor country and thus, no serious writer can support himself there "from the pen alone," he says it has been a tradition for Irish writers to come and teach in American schools.

Although MacIntyre says he has always felt that he would like to write, he tried to avoid writing at the beginning of his career and experimented with other professions including teaching. Why was he reluctant to develop his inherent desire into a career? He replied, "Because people have a natural inclination to avoid what we conceive as weighty responsibilities."

When asked what subjects he writes about, MacIntyre answered, "whatever it is that I sense is driving me mad," or in other words, whatever becomes an obsession. Although he has not been formally educated in the theater, he has a passionate interest in it and so prefers wirting plays. He says an obsession for the dramatic is characteristic of the Irish people. "They have had theater training from the cradle and must dramatize every second in order to contest with their feeling of living in a lost country."

His aim is to form images and not strong plots when he writes plays and it is the written works themselves not their productions that motivate him to create them. Several of his plays, however, have been produced in Dublin. He has become involved in their rehearsals and has been pleased with the performances. Two of his plays entitled "Jack Be Nimble" and "Eye-Winker Tom-Tinker," were inspired by nursery rhymes which he says are "full of theater."

MacIntyre has taught at the University of Michigan and a Jesuit prep school and will be teaching at Queens College next semester. He will be giving another reading on October 18.

Gargoyle studies student power

Mike Crowley '78 presented the College Council with the results of Gargoyle's probe of student power within academic departments Wednesday night, and representatives discussed at length means of redefining and strengthening the Council's role in the college community.

In the course of its investigation, Gargoyle interviewed department chairmen in order to discover the specific means through which their departments obtain student input. The inquiry covered all but six of the academic departments. Crowley reported that systems vary according to department, depending on the number of majors included and the decision of the department chairman. He claimed that the Student Liaison Committee of the Political Science department appeared "the most successful as far as student input is concerned."

Some Council members expressed concern with the power of department chairmen to determine the role of student input, including Joel Smith '79, who stated, "If a department chairman doesn't want to hear student opinions, then he's not really obliged to provide for a committee." Don Toumey '78 criticized the "balkanization" of departments in their differing means of soliciting student opinions.

Claiming that "College Council meetings are not interesting or effective," Council President Tom Herwitz initiated a discussion of means of improving the methods and functioning of that representative body. "I don't feel that we're getting a sense of how the student body feels in the course of these meetings," Herwitz continued.

Other business Wednesday night included the treasurer's report, in which Harry Kelly announced that the Council's revenues are sufficient to accommodate total SAT allocation requests to date. He specified, however, that the figures do not include several late budget requests, and also a $500 "buffer" that will remain in the treasury.

'Back Talk' strives for political relevance

by Stacy Silverstein

"Back Talk" magazine begins its third year with goals set at broadening the scope of its contributors, its readers, and the base of its articles. Although originally instituted as a medium of Black expression, the magazine now welcomes [illegible] from the entire student body and faculty.

The editorial staff of "Back Talk", headed by Ronald White, is resisting pressure to combine with the larger and better known magazine, "Pique". They feel that the existence of two separate publications allows for more variety and more participation. Rosters of each magazine's contributors contain very few overlapping names.

"Back Talk" differs from "Pique" in that it stresses more economic and political subjects. Whereas community-oriented events would be covered by Pique, Back Talk editors offer the example that "an article on contemporary Marxism would settle in our magazine."

One upcoming "Back Talk" issue will include an essay on "The New Philosophers" movement in France which may soon challenge the impact of existentialism all over the world. The magazine also hopes to feature the work of established poets. The poetry of James Kilgore and Alice Walker will probably appear in the issue to be released in late October. Another possible innovation is the addition of an editorial page designed to create continuous debates between the magazine and its readers.

Back Talk editors are also working on the sponsorship of other events. They plan to repeat their Student Poetry Reading which last year featured eight students and attracted an audience of over one hundred. The formation of a political forum is also being considered.

These innovations should result in the growth of "Back Talk", both as a literary magazine and as a sponsor of related activities, according to its editors. The editors feel that their changes will help to "broaden the scope and relevance of Back Talk at Williams".

The Student Course Guide Committee is currently preparing the Spring Student Course Guide for publication this fall.

The committee met Tuesday night to count the questionnaires that were received at the end of last term. They noted that the response was much smaller than the response for the first Course Guide.

The committee decided to adhere to last year's editorial decision and will maintain its standards of statistical significance. The Course Guide will address only those courses which the committee feels have had an adequate response. Specifically, twenty to twenty-five per cent of a given class must respond in order for the course to be included in the guide.

The committee is considering the possibility of re-issuing Course Guide questionnaires. However, they noted that there are a number of difficulties with that proposal. The past senior class would be unable to participate and more importantly, such a decision might distort the results.

The committee also discussed plans for the future. They discussed at length many possible ways in which they could go about distributing the questionnaires for this term. The committee members noted the need for better collection of the completed questionnaires and discussed possible incentives for individuals who do complete them. They also noted the overall necessity for better organization.

The committee also decided to examine the questions which were asked on last year's questionnaire and to possibly propose changes in that respect.

Party Abuse

To the editor:

I wish to register my objections to the excess of partying going on at this college.

Recently, on one weekend, we had the Star Wars party, featuring unlimited beer, and on the same night, a Fitch House party which advertised "More kegs than have ever been drunk on this campus before." Now we are informed that Tyler House is encouraging the use of marijuana. I question whether this altering of consciousness is conducive to a liberal arts education.

Education being the reason that we are here at Williams, I object to the social pressures being imposed on students to drink and smoke grass. Furthermore, I object to my college fees going to social houses, whose main function seems to be throwing beer blasts. It is the responsibility of the Williams College administration to discourage this behavior and to encourage the development of responsible citizens.

Sincerely,
Thomas A. Kalopos '80

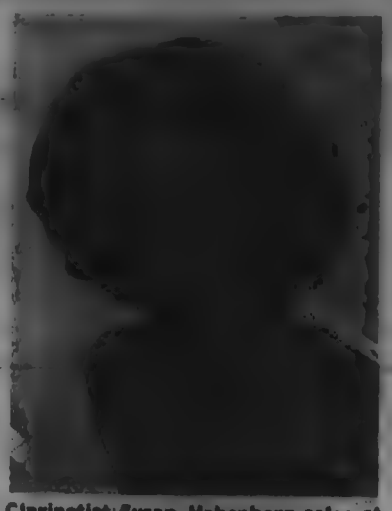
Symphony opens season tonight with a triple billing

by Ed Friedland

The Berkshire Symphony opens its thirty-third season with a concert tonight at 8:30 in Chapin Hall. The orchestra, conducted by musical director Julius Hegyi, will perform three works, Felix Mendelsohn's The Hebrides Overture (Fingal's Cave), Carl Nielsen's Clarinet Concerto with Susan Hohenberg as soloist and Antonin Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G Major, op. 88.



Mendelsohn wrote The Hebrides Overture in 1830 when he was twenty-one. The composer had visited the Hebrides Islands the previous year, and had begun to sketch the work at that time. The Overture is one of the most popular pieces that Mendelsohn ever wrote. Richard Wagner hailed it as "one of the most beautiful works of music we have." The rich and free rhythm of the piece gives it the warm nostalgic feeling of a landscape painting.

Carl Nielsen planned to write a concerto for each of the woodwind instruments, but completed only a flute and clarinet concerto before his death in 1931. The Clarinet Concerto (1928) is something of a rarity among Nielsen's later works, as it begins and ends in the same key. The piece, in one movement, is an aggressive and biting work. It is scored for a string orchestra, two bassoons, two horns and a side drum.

Susan Hohenberg, the soloist, is a member of both the Albany and Berkshire Symphonies and of the Music in the Round series at Williams. She is a graduate of Smith College and earned a Master of Music degree from the Manhattan School of Music. In addition, she has studied at the Paris Conservatory and has studied with and worked for Nadia Boulanger in France.

The full orchestra concludes tonight's program with Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G Major. This piece was written in 1889, four years before the composer wrote his best known work, the Symphony No. 9 "From the New World." The Eighth Symphony is rich in melodic and harmonic material.

Admission is $3.00. Williams students with I.D.'s are admitted free.

Clarinetist Susan Hohenberg solos at tonight's Berkshire Symphony.

Film explores conflict between love, anarchy

LOVE AND ANARCHY, written and directed by Lina Wertmuller will be shown at Bronfman auditorium this Saturday night at 7:30 and 9:30.

In 1930 a man named Tunin arrives at a bordello in Rome. He has come to kill Benito Mussolini. Here is the beginning of the battle between Love—and Anarchy. It's outcome is a foregone conclusion.

The movie begins with Tunin, who incensed by the Fascist murder of a beloved anarchist friend, makes contact with an anti-fascist group. They each him to shoot and then send him to Salome, a sympathizer (and prostitute), who houses him at the Bordello until the day of the scheduled assassination. During his stay with Salomé, Tunin falls in love with another prostitute, Tripolina, who tries to convince him to abandon his plan.

Lina Wertmuller uses a similar approach to Fellini's in her unique, vibrant portrayal of characters on film. The stark framing of the landscape of Fascist Italy intensifies the oppressive situation that is manifested in the film.

There is a relation in Wertmuller's work, between the statements made in Love and Anarchy and her other films. Her philosophy, that "Life is shit," is espoused by characters in all the films. Paul Zimmerman feels that this movie states that "the social passion of revolution is incompatible with the self-consuming passion of romantic love." I think Wertmuller's argument goes deeper than this; she seems to be saying that political and social action is futile and that the only recourse is to love. For Tunin believes that the plan to kill Il Duce will effect his transformation from a nobody into a man. He has had enough—he will stand up to tyranny, yet he fails.

Wertmuller's apparently chauvinistic portrayal of woman's ultimate loyalty to love is her affirmation that it is the only way to fill the void of our ineffectual existence. Love does not obstruct anarchy.

The jarring momentum of this film has resulted in the confusion of some critics as to whether this is a political or romantic film, and they see its ending as unjustified and sensationalist. Yet, I feel the personal narrative style of the film, which is interrupted by the rhythm of the final, brutal scenes it is mandated by Wertmuller's vision. She seems to be saying that the statement inherent in Tunin's political act will be erased in time. In Wertmuller's eyes, Tunin ultimately is nothing and his death for a principle will not elevate him. It will only serve to deny him the one opportunity that he has for fulfillment—the chance to love.

Don McLean shares the 'Pie'

The Williams All-College Entertainment Committee will sponsor "AN EVENING WITH DON McLEAN" at Chapin Hall on Friday, October 21. Tickets for Williams students are $3 in advance [$4 at the door] and are available daily starting Tuesday from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. at Baxter Hall. General admission tickets are $4 in advance; $5 at the door, and are available at The Record Store in Williamstown.

Describing Don McLean's music is like trying to contain an underground stream.

From the beginning, his music has flowed across all the boundaries and wreaked havoc on the neat pigeonholes that make up musical categories. Efforts to typecast McLean are doomed to failure; he is a musician with over 3,000 songs of every type in his performing repertoire.

When "American Pie" came out, he broke the rules spectacularly with a nine-minute folk song that became a rock and roll anthem and the most-played record of 1971. (According to station WABC in New York, it was also No. 2 in 1972). When he proceeded to follow the unfollowable with "Vincent," an even bigger international hit, more people began to discern the reasons for his universal appeal. When both Perry Como and Elvis Presley recorded McLean's "And I Love You So," and both versions were hits, music experts were baffled.

McLean toured America and abroad constantly, and was a major, sell-out attraction wherever he appeared. In England, the New Musical Express wrote: "He's a magnificent performer, and the overwhelming ovation he received was well-deserved." Performing at the Troubador in Los Angeles, he stunned singer Lori Lieberman with his artistry. She rushed back to tell songwriters Norman Gimbel and Charles Fox, and they in turn wrote "Killing Me Softly With His Song." The tribute to McLean was an enormous international hit for Roberta Flack.

Reactions sought to co-op proposal, choices discussed possible to institute. Members agreed that maximum and minimum quotas might be set.

The selection of houses raised greatest debate in last Monday's meeting, as different house presidents cited reasons why their satellite houses should not be converted for use as co-op houses.

"The row houses here are going to have to bear the brunt of this," said Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad. Only the row houses and Dodd contain houses small and yet well enough equipped to sustain a co-op group, the committee agreed.

Committee members requested that Roosenraad speak to College president John Chandler about converting Dewey House to temporary co-op housing. The College now plans to remove Dewey from the student housing-pool when its zoning variance runs out at the end of this year. Members argued that Dewey would provide co-op housing without creating resentment among the row houses by removing satellites from residential houses.

Sally Coney '78, committee co-chairman, advised members that the Committee on Undergraduate Life is waiting for the Housing Committee proposal before moving ahead on an intensive study of co-op housing. "Right now it's pretty much up to us," she said. "In the long run, that may not be the case," she added, referring to the CUL's final authority over proposals on housing.

Maine Bears look tough on paper

by Tim Layden

Last weekend in Hartford, Connecticut, Whelan, Massucco, Hollingsworth, Thiel, McAleenan, and the whole Purple Gang confounded the experts by ripping apart a solid Trinity team, 28-0. This week, the objective is to keep the prognosticators happy as pigs in a poke by beating the Bowdoin Penguins, er, Polar Bears.

"Man for man, they're as good a football team as we are," says Williams Head Coach Bob Odell of the invaders from the northern wilds of Maine. Indeed, Bowdoin has always brought adequate teams to the Berkshires, but despite good size and a controlled attack, winning teams have been a rarity for Bowdoin and Coach Jim Lentz.

"I've always been impressed with their fundamentals," said Odell, "they're not a big play team, but they always come up with something different." For Bowdoin this year's something different is the conspicuous lack of the school's all-time leading rusher, Jim Soule, cut from the Dallas Cowboys in late August.

Soule was Mr. inside, Mr. outside, Mr. pass-catcher, and Mr. equipment manager for the Polar Bears for four seasons, and without him, Bowdoin must rely on senior quarterback Jay Pensavalle to lead their offense.

Rip Kinkel (his name alone makes him worth watching) and tough Dave Seward start at the running backs for Bowdoin, but the main man of the Polar Bears in senior offensive tackle Steve McCabe. McCabe is a pro prospect and one of the top offensive linemen in New England. His mission Saturday is to make Colin Hart, Ralph Spooner, and Mike Bernay give up football and turn to a life of good will and love.

The Bowdoin defense plays in a conventional 5-2 alignment, switching to a 6-1 in running situations and have been unimpressive in the '77 campaign. The northerners yielded 33 points to a very good Amherst team and 21 to Trinity, while surrendering 28 to W.P.I., and still winning.

Injuries are one of the major stories of the week, and for that matter, of the entire season for Odell and Williams. Senior defensive tackle Peter Tittle has been lost for two weeks with a sprained ankle, and will be replaced by Bernay Saturday, and offensive tackel Jack Spound is out for the season with a severe ankle injury. Bob VanDore replaces him, with Mike Curran now at tackle and ready for action.

Offensively, Scott Harrington may be ready for the contest, but, says Odell, "we don't want to use him before he's ready and have him reinjure it." Massucco will certainly man one of the halfback spots, while Bill Whelan and Gus Nuzzolese, off fine Trinity games, get the nod from Odell.

Ken Schoetz, Joe Maguire, Jay Skerry, Steve Rogers and VanDore will be on the offensive line.

In Herb McCormick, Ken Hollingsworth, Bill Miller and Todd Eckerson, Whelan has four solid receivers to look for against the youthful Bowdoin secondary.

Gee and Mike Masi both played strong games against Trinity, and Dan Towle is also ready for duty at either tackle or end Saturday for the rapidly thinning defensive corps. Spooner, Bernay, and Hart will be chasing Pensavalle around the Purple Valley when he throws, as the senior has hit on just 36 passes in the last two years.

John Thiel copped his third defensive player of the week in two seasons for this Trinity performance, sharing the honor with Greg McAleenan, who pilfered three aerials. Brian Benedict shares linebacking duties with Thiel, while Andy Krakauer, Mark Gerry, and Long Ellis round out the defensive unit.

Bowdoin is one of three teams who have never beaten a Bob Odell-coached Williams team, the other two being Wesleyan and Union, yet the Polar Bears are always stubborn enough to make it close, losing 13-0, 22-7 (leading 7-6 at the half), 10-7, and 10-6 in the past four tries. The visitors may not have enough on paper to beat Williams Saturday, but don't look for any routs, it's usually close.

Middlebury edges netwomen

by Evan Bash

You know the old saying, "Close only counts with tiddlywinks and atom bombs." Well, the women's tennis team was unfortunately playing with neither Tuesday as they lost by one point to a strong Middlebury squad 5-4. The heartbreaking defeat was Williams' third against four wins.

The crucial point occurred in the fifth singles match where Sherry Willcox had battled the Panthers' Abbe Semel to a 4-4 tie in the best of nine point tiebreaker that was to decide their three set match. After a good rally, Willcox hit long over the baseline to give Semel the match 2-6, 6-4, 7-6. No. two Becky Chase was also overcome by a 5-4 tiebreaker, this one coming in the middle set of a hard luck 2-6, 7-6, 7-5 defeat.

Willcox's match was not the last one to finish (Chase and the second doubles team came off almost simultaneously), but even if it had been last, Williams could actually point to the top three singles positions as contributing most to the loss. All season the Ephs have faced outstanding competition at those positions. Tuesday saw things unfortunately hold true to form as No. one Laura Carson and No. three Trudie ten Broeke played well but were just overwhelmed.

It was actually a freshman day for Williams as frosh accounted for three wins. Ann Morris won 6-3, 6-2 and Laura Goebel rolled to a 6-0, 6-2 triumph. The capable third doubles duo of Kristan Dale and Mary Tom Higgs remained unbeaten 4-6, 6-0, 6-2, while a fifth freshman, Mary Simpson, performed well in her first match, teaming with Sally Kruse to drop a tight 5-7, 6-1, 6-3 decision at No. one doubles. Sherry Edman and Amy Sterling recorded the Ephs fourth win, 4-6, 6-4, 6-3.

Golfers falter on back nine

The Williams College golf team finally suffered its first loss of the season; a bitter 396-407 loss to a highly touted Springfield squad.

After the first nine holes of play, the Ephs were administering their usual drubbing, descending on the unfamiliar Hampden Country Club like Gengis Khan and his Mongol Hordes. Unfortunately, all except one Eph golfer collapsed on the back nine, handing the match to a thankful Springfield coach.

The lone bright spot for Williams was young Bill Sprague who fired a spectacular, medal-winning 75.

With junior playing partner Dan Katz acting as his exorcist, young Sprague avoided a train accident, staking iron shots on the flag all day with the consistency of a Bulova Accutron. Unfortunately for Katz the price of exorcism was an 85, highlighted by a horrendous, crippling, quadruple bogey 7 on the 198 yard 12th hole.

Playing in the number one spot, Ed "Big" Bousa was cruising along in overdrive as late as the thirteenth hole. In an uncharacteristic manner, Bousa's wheels fell off and he turned a possible 72 into a mind-blowing 80. Senior co-captain Doug Chumbley suffered a similar fate. After a solid 37 on the front nine, Chumbley began blowing the ball off the world en route to a disappointing 83.

Junior co-captain Bill Upton, while playing many stretches of solid, consistent golf, suffered two inexplicable triple bogey disasters on the incoming nine, contributing an 84 to the futile Williams effort. Finally, Marcel Oudin, one of the steadiest performers on the team, hit the ball sideways as he ballooned to an 85.

The Eph linksters will now have to regroup if they are to have any chance for an upset over Yale in the last match of the season. Coach Rudy Goff's squad will take on the Elis at the Taconic Golf Club on October 16.

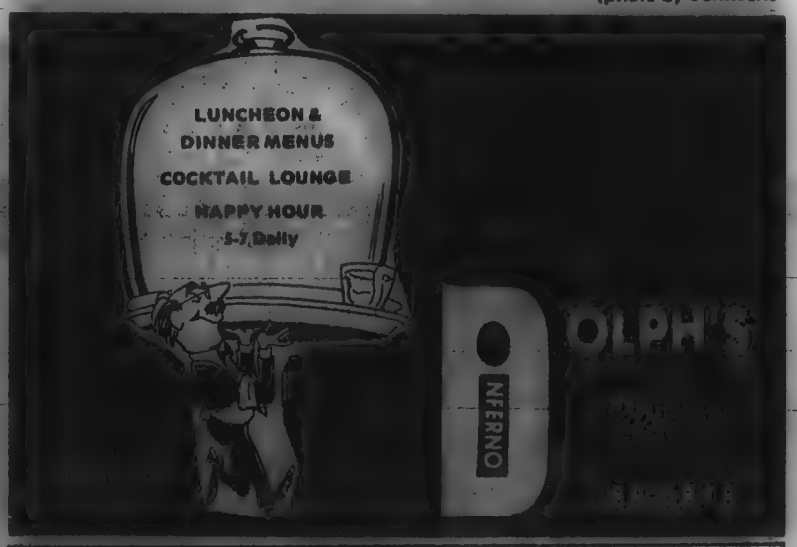
Panthers nip stickers

by Nancy Rhein

Defeat No. 2 came unexpectedly Tuesday for the women's field hockey team. The well-tuned lines were out of step on the sawdust covered field, and with our sluggish defense to spur them on the Middlebury stickers saw their chance and nipped Williams 4-3.

The Ephs, used to a feeding attack (halfbacks and wings feed and forwards stuff it down the opponent's throat), seemed to choke against the speedy Middlebury line, despite taking an early lead. Halfback Sue Wright opened the scoring for Williams on a corner pass from wing Anne McClelland. Within minutes though, the tone of the game changed with Middlebury taking over, giving goalie Mimi Dumouchel a grueling test. Rising to the occasion Dumouchel grabbed fifteen saves for a super effort in the cage. But perseverance paid off for the hosts as the Panthers line broke through to knot the score at one.

The second half saw more spurts of offense for Williams as forwards Sally Kraft and Monica Grady were up to par with a powerful give-and-go attack. A quick Panther shot made it 2-1 before Kraft tied it on a picture perfect goal from Grady. Middlebury again took command for a 3-2 lead and Kraft punched in another, this time from Dawn Bedrosian who was shifted from halfback to inner toward the end of the game. The final minutes saw extreme pressure by the Ephs as Linda Wilkins' squad really turned it on. But from deep within the dust, Middlebury emerged with the ball, breaking downfield to put one past Dumouchel's determined pads. Lacking strong performances all over the field the team was unable to prevent the unexpected defeat, despite outstanding performances by Dumouchel, Grady, and Kraft.



The future looks brighter for the squad as they travel to Amherst Saturday for their first conquest of the Jeff's debuting varsity at 10 a.m.

Siena ruggers drop purple squads, 1-2

The Williams Rugby Club fell to 1-2 this season after a 14 to 7 loss to Siena Saturday. The club won its first game 8-0 over Albany Law but was shut out by Colgate the next week 4-0. In the Albany game, Tom Kondel scored the opening try in the first half with Peter Brooks getting an insurance try midway through the second half.

The Colgate game was marked by fierce hitting and evenly matched play with one lucky break on a long kick making the difference for the Red Raiders. The Siena match was a letdown as the team fought back after falling behind early, but saw the game slip away in the second half. Failure to capitalize on good scoring chances was the deciding factor in the loss for the Ephs. The B-side, after losing its first two games, came up with an impressive 28-12 win against Siena.

Rounding out the club, also with a 1 and 2 record, are the women. After a 12-0 shutout of Albany Law the women ruggers ran into some trouble and dropped two straight. The club was outclassed by a very strong Beantown squad and then fell to Siena 12-0. The team has been hurt by the loss of captain Linda Collins with an injured knee. A decision to cancel a second game against another strong Boston club leaves the women with one game remaining, a November 5 rematch against Siena on Cole Field.

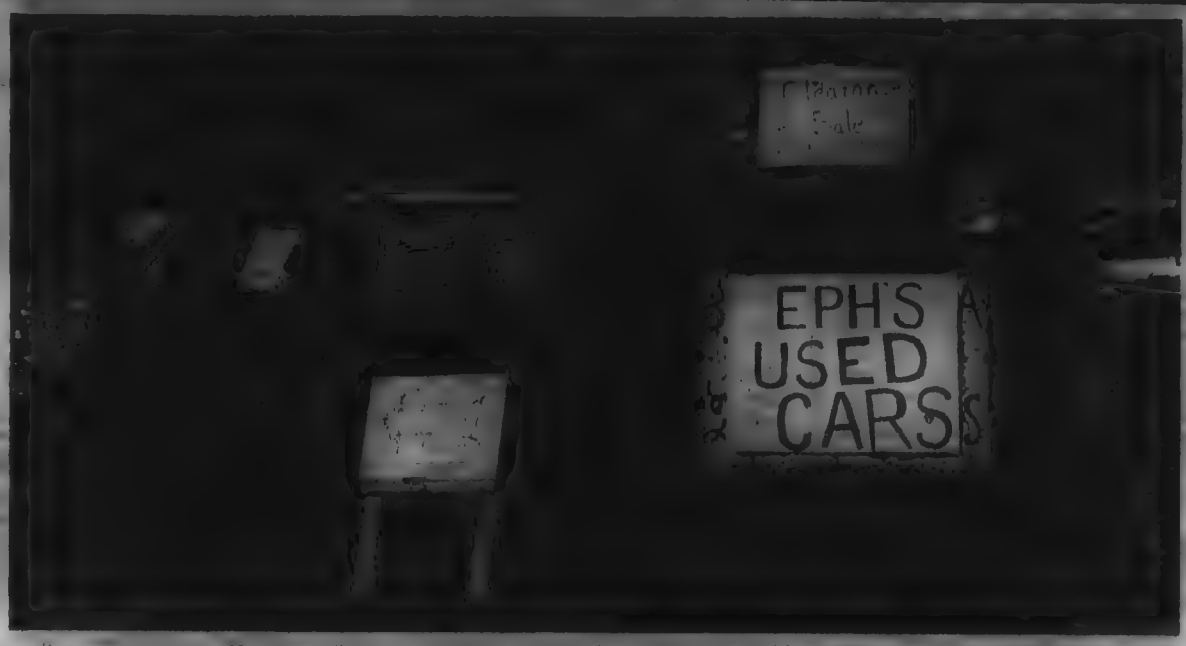
Group sponsors town-gown panels



The Williams Independents will open their three-part town-gown panel series Thursday at 8 p.m. with a discussion of College security and its effects on Williamstown in the Jesup Auditorium.

The series is "the direct product of a brain-storming session at our first meeting," said Williams Independents spokesman Michael Lissack, and will provide a forum for viewpoints from students, administrators and townspeople on town-College interactions.

"We hope to drive the point home that there is a town out there, and that the town is a separate entity from the College," Lissack said. "It's the service project to the Williams community of the Williams Independents," he added.

The second panel, Oct. 27, will focus on the economic impact of the College on the Williamstown area. Speakers will include College Provost Neil Grabois, Professor of Economics Gordon Winston, bookstore owner Ralph Renzi and other townsmen.

The series closes Nov. 8 with a discussion of social life in Williamstown. Titled "Music, Pulltabs and Pizza," the panel will feature pizza czar Constantine Anagnos, Log manager Claudia Lindsey '77, an Images spokesman, Steve Case '80 of the All-College Entertainment Committee, Assoc. Dean Cris Roosenraad and the Rev. Moore of the Williamstown Methodist Church.

Ann Maine '81 offers "special freshman parents' weekend prices" at the freshman quad's Eph's Used Car Lot. The signs, apparently inspired by the influx of visitor's cars, appeared sometime during the Williams-Bowdoin football game Saturday. Ann denied any involvement with the lot's creation. New SEC parallels Committee on Educational Policy

by Ray DeMeo

The newly formed Student Education Committee, composed entirely of students and designed to parallel the activities of the CEP, will begin operation with an investigation of results of the Gargoyle report on student roles in academic departments.

According to Larry Mitchell, College Council representative to the CEP and chairman of the Student Education Committee, the SEC's most important function will be to communicate a "specialized knowledge of the issues" to the student body and the College Council. "It's the best way to keep the council informed and representative," added Mitchell. The committee will be composed of student representatives of all three academic divisions, in addition to the student members of the CEP.

Mitchell cited a "variety of possibilities for action on the Gargoyle report, including attending meetings of student departmental committees and making an historical study of student participation in the academic departments. He added, however, that "the Gargoyle investigation is not really within the committee's jurisdiction." "It's not our responsibility to set up liaison committees," Mitchell stressed. "That responsibility lies with the majors within the department, and the effectiveness of the committees depends on their willingness to push."

Mitchell cited "general education" courses as another "item of immediate attention" for the SEC. General education refers to the creation of courses within each department with "generalized, interdisciplinary appeal" to attract the interest of non-majors. Mitchell suggested a revision of the division requirements system as another method of "inducing students to broaden the scope of their field of study." According to Mitchell, other issues of concern will be a re-evaluation of the Winter Study program and a review of the grading memorandum circulated by the CEP last spring.

Mitchell admitted that he had initially opposed the concept of parallel committees. "Ideally, its a function the council should perform," he said. He pointed out, however, that the SEC serves a valuable purpose in "allowing students to develop their own ideas in an atmosphere in which they can shape their own ideas." "The success or failure is going to boil down to the individual members, and whether or not they can make a sincere effort to get to the student body."

The CES will conduct open forums beginning next semester, "when some of the issues have been solidified," according to Mitchell.

Moneymen continue budget cuts

The Finance Committee continued to mete out preliminary budget recommendations after discussing the fiscal proposals of six campus organizations, including the Record, Sunday.

The possibility that the Record might cut costs considerably by switching printers led Chairman of the Committee Harry Kelly to recommend that business manager Mike Behrman and editor-in-chief Scott Fenn operate within a budget of $12,000. They had requested a $16,268 allocation.

Kelly expressed concern for the "valid" reasons the Record opposed the cut, and recognized the problems that the Finance Committee position might create. According to the committee, however, "they are outweighed by the benefits" of a $4000 savings.

The Finance Committee will decide the final Record budget recommendation at their next meeting Sunday at 12:30 in the Wilson Room at Greylock, and Kelly urged students to attend and offer their opinions.

The Williams Gay Support Organization petitioned for $1200, for speakers, films and a newsletter, $450 more than its budget last year. The Finance Committee voted to recommend a $995 allocation to the College Council. The Williams Action Coalition asked for $1800 to finance speakers and films; the committee endorsed a $725 budget.

The committee agreed to the $2400 request of Backtalk and responded to Pique's petition for $3500 in funds to pay for three 48-page issues by advising the magazine to cut its issues to an average 44-pages in length. The final recommendation will be $2950. The International Club asked for $1500 to pay for speakers and club events; the committee recommended $1100, above last year's $1000 budget.

Consideration of the Gul's preliminary budget and that of the Equestrian Club was deferred until next week. At that time the Lehman Service Council, the Hunger Action Program and the French and German Language Clubs will come before the Finance Committee to present their proposals.

CC Course Guide

The College Council will discuss the student course guide tomorrow night at 9 p.m. in Griffin Hall, according to CC President Tom Herwitz.

Noted poet speaks here

Alice Walker

by Kathy Schwarz

Alice Walker, an aspiring young black woman writer visited Williams last Thursday to speak on the subject of her art. Entitled "Saving the Life that is Your Own; The Importance of Models in the Artist's Life," the lecture entailed aspects of her development as a writer and her views of her development as a writer and her views on black literature in America.

Walker began by emphasizing that the kind of books she writes are the kind which she would like to read, simple, yet sound philosophy for any writer. She feels obligated to present stories of good example; those which can offer to her people a hope for freedom, creativity, and growth.

Yet, as Walker noted, the most important prerequisite for a writer is to fall back on one's personal experiences. We must, she says, write about our inner sense in order to find true meaning. We must avoid the trendiness and flash of what society deems is fashionable. Therefore, as Walker concludes, a writer must use his or her past as a reference. From this realm, should a writer choose her models.

This view is tied in with Walker's view of the split in American literature between black and white. According to Walker, it seems that the pessimistic, existentialist mode of artistic expression for white authors, is a reflection of their cosmic guilt. They've struggled against nothing and therefore enjoy an empty success. A black writer, on the other hand is driven to convey his sense of rage and struggle. Consequently, black literature becomes highly moralistic and idealistic for it is an expression of that plight.

Walker does indeed express a sense of rage and struggle in her writing, as a poetry reading later Thursday night showed. The focus of her stories and poetry are on characters trapped in a web of opposition and apathy. Walker's philosophy about using one's past as a reference also becomes clear. Her stories are centered in the rural south where she grew up and she focuses on characters that she has drawn from friends and family.

Alice Walker is a poet, novelist, short-story writer and essayist. Her books of poetry are Once (1968) and Revolutionary Petunias (1973). Three new poems appeared in the Supplement on Black Poets in The American Poetry Review (January-February 1977). She has published two novels—The Third Life of Grange Copeland (1970) and Meridian (1976)—as well as a collection of short stories—In Love & Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1974). An uncollected short story—"A Sudden Trip Home in the Spring" (1971)—has been anthologized in Black-Eyed Susans: Classic Stories By and About Black Women (1975) edited by Mary Helen Washington.

Alice Walker's numerous essays have appeared most frequently in Ms. magazine, for which she is a consulting editor. She was born (1944) and raised in Eatonton, Georgia where her father was a sharecropper and her mother "labored beside—not behind—my father in the fields." Moving accounts of her respective parents are presented in "In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens" and in "Secrets of the New Cuba." Alice Walker, who taught one of the first courses on black women writers, has also published in Ms. an essay on Zora Neale Hurston—author of Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937)—and is now editing a Zora Neale Hurston reader. The interview of Alice Walker in Interviews with Black Writers (1973) edited by John O'Brien provides a useful context for her work.

Alice Walker is currently teaching a course at Yale and has been awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship for 1978. A display of Alice Walker's writing has been set up in the entrance to Sawyer Library.

Bakke backlash

Over the past few months, civil rights leaders, politicians and educators have framed many arguments against a Supreme Court decision favoring Allen Bakke in the case of The Regents of the University of California v. Allen Bakke. The Record does not consider what the case calls "reverse discrimination" unconstitutional. If the U.S. Supreme Court upholds the judgment of the California Supreme Court, the consequences will be felt even at Williams.

Since 1963, Williams has reserved 10 per cent of its freshman openings for students who, according to former College President John E. Sawyer, "might not ordinarily have been admitted on prevailing formal criteria." (Statistically, students admitted in this program average 75 points below their classmates on the SAT.) The Admissions office uses a series of non-quantitative criteria—such as extracurricular strengths, strong recommendations and special academic flair—to evaluate potential 10 per centers.

The value of this program is unquestionable. In the winter 1976 edition of the Williams Alumni Review, Director of Admissions Philip Smith wrote, "In extracurricular areas, 10 per cent students were most visible in major leadership positions . . . During a decade when college campuses went from 'silent' to turbulent back to quiet again, most 10 per cent students were sensible, participating citizens on the side of evolutionary change, eager to obtain the benefits of an education." Although some Williams students frequently portray their peers as uniformly bland, these complaints would intensify significantly if the College made all admissions decisions based on test scores and high school grades.

Unfortunately, it appears that Williams is just as vulnerable as the University of California if the medical school admissions program is judged unconstitutional. Although 10 per cent students do not comprise identifiable minority groups, they are selected, Smith wrote, "on the basis of criteria different from prevailing quantitative indicies." Several frightening scenarios can be concocted in view of Supreme Court agreement with Bakke. Conceivably, an applicant rejected by Williams could sue on the grounds that reserving a specified number of places for less qualified applicants is unconstitutional. Alternatively, the 10 per cent program could be quietly phased out and admissions based solely on quantitative criteria to circumvent charges by some applicant that he was rejected in favor of a "less qualified" one.

Both the minority admissions program at the University of California Medical School at Davis and the 10 per cent program have important social value. Training minority physicians may be the best solution to the problem of undersupply of doctors serving minority populations. The 10 per cent program epitomizes a positive trend in higher education: the movement away from admissions based on grades and scores alone, which tends to exclude members of minorities and students skilled in areas that are not reflected by these criteria.

The Record believes that the social values of special admissions programs overshadow the "unfairness" Bakke argues they contain. We urge the courts and the society to reject the principles embodied in Bakke's suit based on the tragic implications of a favorable decision as well as the fundamental weakness of the reverse discrimination argument.

Bakke: a test for affirmative action

by Bruce Doblin

The Supreme Court of the United States began diliberations last week on one of the most controversial civil rights case in many years. Many have compared it with the Court's decision in the case of Brown v. The Board of Education in 1954 which forged the way for school desegregation. On October 12, the Supreme Court opened up case No. 76-811, The Regents of the University of California v. Allen Bakke.

Allan Bakke is a 37 year old Californian engineer who was denied admission to the University of California Medical School at Davis. Bakke claims that the acceptance of sixteen minority students, under a special admissions program, prevented his acceptance and that this form of discrimination is in fact just as unfair as the problems it sought to resolve. This case deals with the same issues which were brought up four years ago in the case of Marc P. deFunis Jr. v. The University of Washington Law School. DeFunis was challenging the concept of reverse discrimination in his attempt to gain admittance to the law school. By the time that his case reached the Supreme Court, he had already been admitted into the school of law and the case was declared moot leaving these questions unanswered.

As a result of the extensive publicity in the past few weeks, the basic facts about the case have been well documented. Bakke applied to the Medical School twice, and was rejected both times. He began an application in 1972 but was unable to complete it because of an illness in the family. By the time that he finished the application, most of the class had already been accepted. He received an unusually high rating by the admissions committee who interviewed him, 468 out of 500, and he was encouraged to reapply by an officer who has been fired since then.

Bakke was born in 1940 and received his engineering degree from the University of Minnesota. He then served for four years, 1963-1967, in the Naval Reserves Officer Training Program Corps. After the service he continued his research in space engineering and became interested in the effects of space on the human body. He completed all of the necessary academic work and his grade point average, 3.5, and his score on the medical school admissions test were relatively high. His scores were higher than most of the sixteen students who were admitted under the special admissions program.

Apparently, the University of California Medical School at Davis ran two separate admissions programs. There was a special admission committee comprised of mostly nonwhite officers and grade point averages and test scores were [illegible]. Some opponents of the program feel that the selection is determinant on race and race alone.

Although the case is fairly specific in nature, and most of the details are undisputed, the ramifications of a decision either way could have frightening implications depending on your prospective. Many groups which have been long supporters of affirmative action programs are fearful that a decision in favor of Bakke to uphold the 6 to 1. California State Supreme Court ruling could negate all of the advances achieved in the past twenty years to include more minorities in professional and graduate schools across the nation.

The state court agreed that nonacademic factors were important, but that the consideration of race as a factor was different. Justice Stanley Mosk, who wrote the majority opinion, argued that the purpose of the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment, "to secure equality of treatment to all, is incompatible with the premise that some races may be afforded a higher degree of protection against unequal treatment than others." The court suggested that the school find new ways to attract minorities, by the use of more aggressive recruiting practices, remedial academic programs, and other similar devices.

Others who support Bakke, like Nathan Glazer, a professor of Education and Sociology at Harvard University and author of "Affirmative Action," fear a greater involvement of the government in future admissions procedures. Mr. Glazer's column in the New York Times expressed this idea: "If he loses, we can be sure that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare will fasten a quota for race and minorities on every medical school in the country, and in every institution of higher education that is within its reach, which is almost all of them." Mr. Glazer continues, "A judgment against Mr. Bakke reduces university freedom and leads to state imposition of quotas."

There are several issues which the court may choose to consider. It is possible that the court will decide to vacate the case and instruct the California State Supreme Court to reconsider it in light of a recent amendment in the state which bars state universities from denying admissions to anyone on account of race. Many hope the court will pursue this line of action to prevent the implications of a judgment on the myriad of national programs geared to increasing minority employment and admissions to graduate and professional schools.

There are many factors of this case which complicate the basic issue of reverse discrimination. Bakke's age alone, 35 at the time of his application, could have prevented his admission. We originally intended to sue Davis Medical School because he felt his age had been a factor in his rejection from the school. It is for these reasons that many hope the Supreme Court will wait for a better test case.

Another question the court may deal with is the constitutionality of preferential quotas which are race related or race sensitive. Most people will agree that efforts must be made to correct the past discrimination of minorities, and they would not challenge the validity of considering race as a factor in admissions. Even so, they feel that race should not be the sole factor in evaluating an application. The Davis Medical School did set aside 16 places for its minorities admissions program. There is a very thin line between quotas and goals, which may be an important point considered by the court. Affirmative action programs, in most cases a euphemism for reverse discrimination, have used goals for many years, and this method is favored to increase the enrollment of minorities without directly discriminating against other races. But even this type of special consideration is unacceptable to many like Congressman Philip Crane, who represents the 12th District of Illinois. He said: "The question raised by the Bakke case is not one of 'reverse' discrimination; it is one of discrimination, period. We cannot hope to redress past wrongs in the treatment of minorities by adopting new policies which discriminate against other groups."

The Congressman also raised another important consideration. "A quota system, advocated by opponents of the Bakke argument, is a manifestly unjust one," he said. "In fact, quota systems are effectively making the adjective 'black' synonymous with 'substandard' in the eyes of onlookers, fellow students, workers, or competitors. Blacks, women, and other minorities should be fighting to be recognized as individuals, not singled out for special treatment as a group regardless of personal qualities. I stand firmly behind the merit system under which each competitor is judged as an individual with special skills and qualifications. I simply cannot understand how anyone can rationalize espousing any quota system for any purpose."

It is slightly easier for a student to enter through the minorities program but there is still a great deal of competition. The overall percentage of applicants who were accepted is approximately 30 per cent while about 55 per cent of the minority applicants were admitted. Of the 16 students accepted by Davis the year that Bakke was rejected, 13 have been successful in completing school with no difficulties. This is approximately the same rate of success minorities students have achieved across the country. The general rate for completion is close to 98 per cent.

It is also possible that the Supreme Court could rule in favor of Bakke but in such a way as to limit the application of this ruling only to the UC Davis Medical School Program. Its program was to aid disadvantaged students gain admissions to the medical school, but it never once admitted a white student through this alternate route. This is one of the major reasons the California State Supreme Court ruled this program to be unconstitutional. Bakke claimed that this type of program violated his rights under the 14th amendment which guarantees equal protection under the law.

The Court could also restrict its judgment to institutions which receive federal funds, and this would avoid any broader applications of their decision to affect other recruiting programs and hiring practices outside of these groups.

A fourth option would be to uphold the university and limit approval of only this one program, judging that their admissions policy did not constitute a strict quota. There was a year when the special admissions program did not admit 16 students even though the places were available, and there was no lower limit on the number of students it was to accept. It would claim that whites were not prevented from using this option, even though they were not admitted.

Because of the complexity of this case and the broad ramifications of any Supreme Court decision, most Congressmen, Senators and public officials are shying away from any comments. Those who favor affirmative action, but who may question the legality of quotas, are afraid that a decision against the Davis Medical School program will hinder attempts in all other areas to benefit minorities were there has been past discrimination.

The Supreme Court may hand down their verdict in the next few weeks, or it may take several months before the final vote tally and written decisions are made public. Until then, there will be many people eagerly waiting a decision. The court's decision could certainly effect the Williams 10 per cent plan and similar programs in housing and education throughout the country. As Congressman Abner Mikva of Illinois concluded, "The line between affirmative action and a reprehensible quota system is a thin one, and one can hope that the Supreme Court can shed some light on how to find our way through this thicket."

Bruce Doblin, a senior, is currently working in Washington for his local congressman of Illinois. He was lucky enough to meet a clerk who works in the Marshal's office of the Supreme Court, who got him in to hear the Bakke case argued.

Letter: cartoon in question

To the editor:

Although the content of the Record up to this point has left me unmoved, the cartoon on page 2 of the September 29 issue concerning the decision by Peter Harty, junior adviser for my entry, to leave school is too mindless to let by without comment. As I am sure the editorial staff and cartoonist Jake Prescott must now realize, printing a cartoon on such a topic is beneath the boundaries of a professional journalistic editorial attitude. But more important, however, is the human element involved.

As an individual who has lived across the hall from Mr. Harty for the past 6 weeks and who has talked with him about his decision in the days preceding his departure, I think I can assure the college community that the decision was much more than a case of "getting high and feeling guilty about not bookin'."

But since I also believe that Mr. Harty's rights of privacy and dignity have already been transgressed enough, I won't go into the details of the discussions that he had with me and the other members of the entry concerning the decision. However, I can say that the decision was based on a serious self-evaluation and that the action of leaving was based on his own personal beliefs and values. Therefore, regardless of the intent of the cartoonist, to reduce Mr. Harty's decision to the level portrayed in the cartoon for reading by individuals who may know nothing of the motives and convictions underlying Mr. Harty's decision is grossly unfair and a violation of his individual integrity.

Perhaps it is simply a manifestation of the blandness of our times that such a commentary would appear, yet I cannot reconcile the fact that at a school of Williams' caliber, the cartoonist and editors of the student newspaper have nothing better to do than to single out such an action of individuality for public display and for the sake of what is ostensibly humor.

Bruce Palmer '81

We agree with you that Jake Prescott's cartoon was in poor taste if associated with any specific individual. Unfortunately, we did not know that the cartoon referred to Peter Harty until you told us. RECORD cartoonists are considered columnists and their opinions do not in any way reflect the opinions of the RECORD editorial board or staff. Ed.

Greene guests at Griffin

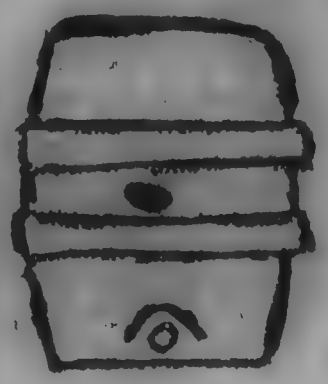
by Kevin Hall

Harpsichordist Victor Hill and guest violinist George Greene, chairman of the music department at Skidmore College, presented the second in this year's series of Griffin Hall concerts over the weekend. The program began with a short set of variations by Marini entitled Romanesca, one of the first works ever published for violin; this piece was followed by sonatas of Leclair, Locatelli, Bach, and Tartini.

The violin was very much to the fore in the Leclair, Locatelli, and Tartini works, which were all influenced by the seventeenth-century Italian school of violin playing and are some of the first virtuoso tour-de-forces written for the instrument. Greene played them with the requisite technical assurance and unflagging rhythmic verve. Especially enjoyable was the Tartini "Devil's Trill" sonata, which was supposedly inspired by a dream of the composer in which Satan appeared as a violinist. Greene used his own arrangement and cadenza, which are more faithful to the composer's original conception than the versions currently in vogue.

Hill had his chance to shine in the Bach E Major Sonata, in which the harpsichord is not subservient to the violin but plays an equal part in weaving the richly polyphonic texture. It was certainly the musical highpoint of the evening, and both performers contributed their most inspired playing.

Hill and Greene concluded with two enthusiastically received encores by the rather eccentric Italian composer Veracini.



Faculty Preview

The faculty will meet tomorrow to discuss a report on general education from the Committee on Educational Policy, according to Steering Committee Chairman Gary Jacobsohn. The committee is currently discussing alternative courses and requirements to increase diversity among course selections by undergraduates.

The CEP will discuss these alternatives with the faculty, but will not propose any specific plans at this time. The faculty will also discuss the College calendar and hear a report on the financial position of the College.

Bowdoin foils late charge 23-21

By Tim Layden

Who ever decided how far apart the uprights of a football goalpost should be, anyway? What possible harm could a few more inches of width have done? Perhaps those were among the questions drifting through the minds of the nine-man Williams football team as Ken Hollingsworth's 29-yard field goal attempt with 1:45 remaining in the game missed by the length of a frog hair and left the Ephs on the short end of a 23-21 upset loss to the Bowdoin Polar Bears.

Hollingsworth and tri-captain Herb McCormick spearheaded a furious fourth-quarter Williams comeback with several super catches of Bill Whelan aerials, including a Hollingsworth fourth-down catch and dive for a first down which may have convinced a bewildered linesman to swear off pre-game tacos for life.

"Very few people would have had the presence of mind to do what he did," said Eph mentor Bob Odell of Hollingsworth's grab, on which the junior stretched nearly headlong to make the catch, reacted instantly and dove ahead of the sticks for the first down, setting up the field goal attempt. A desperation 38-yard attempt by Hollingsworth as time expired was set up by a McCormick over-the-shoulder grab which rivals anything Lou Piniella has done recently, but the kick drifted wide.

The upset was the first-ever win for Bowdoin over Bob Odell, and kept the Ephs winless on Weston Field in 1977. "Bowdoin is a very fine offensive blocking team," said Odell, "and they exploited some of our potential weaknesses very well." Indeed, while Williams had a couple shots at pulling it out of the fire in the closing minutes, the first half, and much of the gloomy afternoon belonged to the hungry invaders.

Polar Bear backs Tom Sciolla (only a frosh with a very bright future) and Rip Kinkel (too bad his last name wasn't "Torn", or "Cord," or even "City") ran behind big Steve McCabe effectively for the first 24 minutes, each scoring once for the smoothly-directed offense of quarterback Jay Pensavalle.

Mike Masi pounced on a Kinkel fumble on the Bear five, with Gus Nuzzolese ("just an outstanding game": Odell) slamming over from the two. Greg Collins debuted auspiciously at tailback with 44 yards rushing several nice blocks and an option pass to Bill Whelan which led to the second Williams score: Dave Massucco's 2-yard scamper just before the half.

The visitors used a personal foul call against Williams on the second half kickoff as a springboard to their final score of the game, after Alfie Himmelrich's seven field goal had sent them into the dressing rooms a 16-14 leader. Pensavalle bootlegged 21 yards to the Eph 42 and then tossed to a wide open Rich Newman in the middle of the end zone, as the Purple secondary seemed to have crossed itself somewhere.

Rich Whelan in the midst of another fine passing performance, (15 for 28, 223 yards) and the Eph defense stiffening behind once-benched Phil Shuman and John Thiel, Williams gave the 2000 or so Purple Cows in the stands a barnburner to keep them warm for the last nine minutes.

A 23-yard completion to McCormick and a big gainer to Collins on a screen were both nullified by penalties to keep Williams from winning the game after the latter had slipped over from the one at 6:56 to close the gap to two points. Bowdoin punter Peter Geanelis set up the Collins score by playing hot potato with a punt snap on his own 13.

"Our guys came within a whisker," said Odell, "I'm really proud of the way they didn't quit." The young and exciting Ephs have already provided their followers with a season's worth of excitement, and with Bill Whelan's rediscovered passing attack, the spectacular play of Hollingsworth and, as of Saturday, Herb McCormick, they're not out of any game. The "D" has shown they can be good or ... well, anyone who was there Saturday knows the rejoinder. This week is Tufts, a 21-7 victor last year, but an inexperienced 1-3 this season. It's the last home game before Amherst. "Nuff said?"

Trio runs to NESCAC top ten

As a warm-up to the October 29 Eastern Cross Country Championships, the Williams harriers competed against nine New England colleges Saturday and placed three runners in the top ten to finish ahead of all but one opponent. Although an official team champion was not announced, the five-man Bates College contingent topped the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) field with 23 points followed by the Ephmen with 56 and Amherst with 97. The individual winner of the NESCAC meet was Greg Peters of Bates, who traversed the muddy 4.8 mile course in 24:13.

As the Ephs had expected, the Bates crew shot out at the start with its number one man Paul Oparowski, last year's NESCAC winner, grabbing the early lead.

Joe Kolb chased Oparowski throughout the early part of the race along with Bowdoin's Bruce Freme and a host of other Bates harriers. The runners scaled a steep hill and passed the two mile mark at just under 10 minutes as Kolb and Frank Carr continued to battle with their opponents in red. Carr passed Kolb just after the three mile mark and took-off in pursuit of Amherst's top man, Greg Merhar.

Carr eventually moved into sixth place and was chased over the last mile of trails by a hungry pair of (you guessed it!) Bates boys. The senior harrier came out of the woods with a comfortable lead over the duo in red but he was still ten yards behind Amherst's number one runner. Carr was able to accelerate past Merhar on the macadam surface and then held his lead across the final stretch of grass to finish 5th in the 69 runner field with a 24:34 clocking. Schreck also broke 25 minutes as he entered the finish chute in ninth place at 24:56. Kolb crossed the line just two seconds in back of Schreck for a tenth place performance.

Leonard and Behrman completed the course on either side of Amherst's Bill Sayres, with the purple pair netting 15th (25:08) and 17th (25:11) respectively. Despite his uncooperative limbs, Sullivan still cracked the top twenty with a nineteenth place effort in 25:18. Sophomore Bud Bell arrived at Amherst just before the start and 27 minutes and 12 seconds after the gun went off he was awarded 56th place in his first NESCAC competition.

Eph booters record impressive double victory

Finding an offense to go along with its already strong defense Williams soccer recorded two big victories against visitors from Maine Friday afternoon. The Ephs pulled out a thrilling overtime victory over Bates, 4-3 and followed it up the next morning with an impressive 2-0 shutout of the Polar Bears from Bowdoin. Williams' record now stands at 2-4 on the season.

In an attempt to generate some scoring punch Coach Jeff Vennell juggled the lineup slightly, a strategy which obviously paid off. Greg Hartman, moved from halfback to striker scored two big goals while John Friborg, switched to wing, responded with one. However it was Perry Nelson who initially broke the scoring drought.

Trailing 1-0 at halftime as a result of Bates super-frosh Bill Bradford, the Ephs seemed destined to lose their fifth straight match. Although they managed to get off numerous good shots, the Bobcat goalie just wouldn't allow the ball in the net. Nelson finally overcame the jinx that had prevented the booters from scoring in over five hours of game time by ramming one home nine minutes into the second half. Their confidence restored, Williams relentlessly pummelled netminder Jim Hill. The final tally showed 33 shots for Williams compared to 7 for Bates. But Bates' conversion factor was somewhat higher. With just 0:52 remaining forward Mike Lugli offset a Friborg goal that had seemingly assured the Ephs a victory in regulation time. Stunned, the Williams players barely stemmed two Bobcat thrusts in the remaining moments as the second half ended in a 2-2 deadlock. The fact that college rules call for two ten minute overtime periods instead of a sudden death was very fortunate as the Bobcats pounced on an early opportunity in the first overtime and converted it into a score. However, from that point on it was all Greg Hartman. Scant seconds into the second period he tied it up again with a slight assist from Nelson, and minutes later rammed one so hard the goalkeeper never had the opportunity to take a step.

Saturday's game proved to be much more of a defensive effort. Carried by the superior play of goalie Doug Orr and fullback Bruce "The Spoiler" Camilleri, all Bowdoin attempts were thwarted. Polar Bear Jim Kennedy also did a fine job manning the nets, but was unable to contain a fired up Eph offense. Perry Nelson tallied late in the first half, and John Friborg greased one by early in the second to account for the Williams scoring.

Netwomen ace Jeffs, UVM

By Evan Bash

The women's tennis teams of both the University of Vermont and Amherst visited Williamstown for the first time ever this weekend, and the best either school could come away with was pleasant memories of the Berkshire foliage as the Ephs scored two good wins, beating Amherst 8-1 on Friday and Vermont 5-2 the next day. With only three matches remaining, Williams upped its record to 6-3.

Entering the Vermont match coach Curt Tong was rightly concerned by the visitors three scholarship players and several comparative scores that forebode trouble. But the Ephs played the kind of tennis they are capable of, especially in the important first few singles positions, to record what was something of an upset.

Captain Laura Carson succumbed to a fine player 7-5, 6-4, but No. four Ann Morris came right back for Williams, playing with a lot of confidence in a 6-1, 6-0 win. Becky Chase could probably be the third ranked player in Minnesota if she wanted, as she routed the third best player in that state, 6-2, 6-0. Also turning in fine performances were Trudie ten Broeke with a hard fought 4-6, 6-2, 6-2 victory and No. five Sherry Willcox who scored the clincher, 4-6, 6-2, 6-3.

In doubles action Sally Kruse and Amy Demorest suffered a close 6-7, 6-2, 6-4 defeat, while Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale still haven't lost this season as they rolled 7-5, 6-4.

Amherst's developing tennis program is not yet strong enough to compete with the Ephs' skill Julia Weyerhauser-Denise Harvey and Jane Goldfarb-Laura Katz played doubles for the first time and won.

Women top NESCAC X-C

Had team scores been recorded, the Williams women's team would have run away with the 9-team New England Small College Cross Country Championships last weekend at Amherst.

Team leader Michele Cutsforth, who has consistently recorded top finishes for the Williams contingent in dual meets, rounded the three mile course in 18:37 to take sixth place. Cyane Gresham, Trish Beckwith and senior Lisa Capaldini, who ran an exceptional race, finished ninth, tenth and eleventh, within nine seconds of each other. Lisa Kruse and Carrie Johnson rounded out the Williams effort in 24th and 29th place, respectively, among the 47 starters.

The six Williams runners took the first quarter out fast in order to avoid puddles along the familiar course. After being caked together for the first two miles of the muddy run, Cutsforth picked up the pace and edged into sixth, where she remained for the duration.

Next Sunday Williams will participate in the New England Championships on well-known UMass turf. Coach Robert Fisher said he believes the meet will be a massive battle between Middlebury and UMass for the championship. Although starter Lisa Capaldini will be missing from the Williams lineup, Fisher believes his squad can hold off UVM for a top-three finish.

UFO flies over New Haven

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization, playing in ankle-deep mud, defeated the University of New Haven 19-12 Saturday. After an initial rush of points by New Haven, the WUFO tightened its defense and quickly overtook its opponents with a steady offense, gaining a 12-4 lead by halftime.

Williams dominated the second half despite an occasional rally by New Haven, and as the clock ran out, the WUFO claimed its first other-than-normal victory, and left the field chomping at the bit for Amherst and Wesleyan.

Field hockey grabs Little 3

by Nancy Rhein

When the women's field hockey team went into its first Little Three championship, it removed any doubt as to who is number one around these parts by shutting out its meager opponents. The finishing touch to September's 4-0 roasting of the Cardinals came Saturday as the Ephs royally dethroned Lord Jeffery's better half, to fly home with the Little Three Crown. Although the ball was deep within the mud of Amherst's field, the Ephs managed to scoop it out for 18 shots and a 2-0 shutout of the debuting Amherst team. Following a half of total domination, the squad saw less action as a geared-up Williams line just got stuck in the mud.

Not a trace of last week's lack of precision and team play remained as the Williams squad took the field. With ten minutes gone, Sally Kraft sent in a corner shot only to have it rebound out to the awaiting stick of Val Corning. Wings Anne McClelland and Liza Olsen were hitting the centering passes as a tough halfback offense of Betsy Lyman, Dawn Bedrosian, and Priscilla Buckley kept the pressure on. As the half wound down, inner Monica Grady caught another rebound to make it 2-0.

The Ephs went on to control the rest of the game but incredible conditions kept the score at an unrepresentative 2-0. Fullbacks Cammie McClellan and Lee Ash hardly touched the ball, while Mimi Dumouchel in the cage had but one save in the contest.

Greg Hartman is Athlete of Week

Greg Hartman, center forward on the varsity soccer team has been chosen as the Record Athlete of the Week after his superb two goal performance against Bates on Friday. Hartman rammed home two scores in the overtime period to give the Ephmen a 4-3 squeaker over the visiting Bobcats.

"I'm very pleased with his play at center forward," commented coach Jeff Vennell, after the mentor shifted Hartman from halfback to the front line position. The pair against Bates makes Hartman the Ephs' leading scorer with 3 goals and one assist.

Honorable Mention—Tennis doubles partners Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale won 7-5, 6-4 over UVM Saturday and sport a perfect 9-0 record on the season.

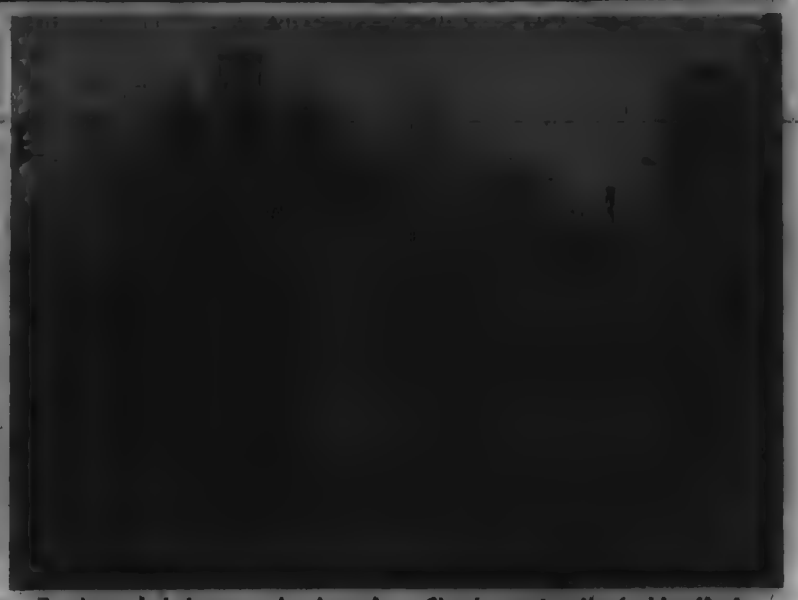
25 per cent return poll

Student Course Guide fails

The Student Course Guide for spring semester 1978 will not be published this year, according to Don Toumey, chairman of the College Council Course Guide Committee.

At the Wednesday night College Council meeting Toumey explained that only 25 per cent of the students polled returned the course guide poll. Because of this small response, statistics could be compiled on only 58 course sections. Toumey felt "the course guide would not be very informative" if based on such a small input of student opinion.



In the future the committee plans to be "more aggressive" in soliciting student opinion for the course guide. Also, rather than distributing the questionnaire through the campus "residential" organization," Faculty Adviser Michael Bell suggested that the committee "use the College academic organization." This would entail making either professors or students in each class responsible for the questionnaires.

Toumey argued that the low response rate to the poll—40 per cent last fall—"does not mean that it is not useful." In fact, the course guide statistics from last fall "coincided very closely with those obtained from the course questionnaires used by the faculty."

The Council members were divided on the issue of keeping student opinions, as expressed in the questionnaire, confidential. Larry Mitchell '78 indicated that "it is important that the course guide have the support of the faculty." Provided that adequate warning was given to students, "it would be a relatively harmless way of gaining faculty support."

As a matter of general principle, Bell stated that "the course guide should ideally get to the substance of courses" and not merely rate the teacher's ability as an entertainer.

Reporting on an ad hoc meeting held Saturday, Bill Richmond '79 suggested several "procedural changes designed to make the College Council a "stronger and more positive influence." He urged that comprehensive committee briefs, fully outlining all aspects of the issues before the Council, be distributed to members before each meeting. In this way the College Council would not have to deal with "picayune committee reports" at its weekly meetings.

WGSO discusses gay rights and Williams

The Williams Gay Support Organization addressed itself to the question of whether the college should add a written statement of non-discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation to its admissions policy at the Organization's first open meeting Tuesday night.

The purpose of the meeting, according to the moderators, was to "raise the consciousness of the Williams community by presenting gay rights in the context of human rights," while still upholding the GSO's responsibility to those members who wished to remain anonymous.

The large number of participants in the open meeting tried to assess the ramifications of such a move on the college's part. "It would, by bringing the matter into the open, make it less of an issue," one said. "It would be to Williams' credit to make such a liberal step."

"The move might alienate alumni and future applicants who would question the proportion of the gay population at Williams," another said.

In answer to a direct question from the floor, members were unable to cite specific examples of discrimination within the college community. A question concerning the need for such a statement was raised.

"It is necessary," a GSO member said. "Like the GSO, it would tend to support the gay population in its own struggle.

"There is a paranoia here, both on the part of the gays and the straights, which is almost impossible to deal with now," he continued. "It's a paradox. Most straights are threatened by those who admit they're gay, and gays are condemned to secrecy because most are not strong enough to overcome their own paranoia about this effect and admit to being gay. That's where the support of such organizations as the GSO and a statement like the one proposed are important. Only openness can raise the level of consciousness in the community."

Open meeting generates ideas on co-op proposal

by Lisa Hartigan

The Student Housing Committee presented a proposal for a one-year experiment in co-operative living to interested students at an open meeting Monday night. Six satellite houses, presently affiliated with row houses, are under consideration for use as option houses next year. About thirty-five students attended the meeting and a majority expressed interest in the proposal, while voicing criticism of its structure.

"We feel that there is a definite desire for alternative housing, but one of our greatest fears is that we will design a proposal in which no one is interested. We therefore need student feedback," said Housing Committee Chairman Sally Coney '78.

Students criticized the adequacy of the kitchen facilities involved, the size of the groups to be assigned to each house, and the equity of the selection process. The most concern, however, was that the loss of the satellite houses would affect the viability of the row houses involved.

The satellites under consideration, Doughty, Goodrich, Lambert, Sewall, Susie Hopkins and Woodbridge, house between seven and thirteen students each. Three of these buildings would become "option houses" next year under the current proposal.

Students would be able to apply for co-op housing either in groups designed to fill an entire house or in smaller groups of one to three. Applicants and applicant groups will be randomly selected by computer.

Some students criticized the proposal for not giving preference to seniors. Others argued class priorities would inhibit the formation of groups composed of members from both the senior and junior classes.

The committee placed no restrictions on coeducation in the houses other than provisions regarding separate bathroom facilities necessary to meet Massachusetts state laws.

Finance Committee hearing schedule

The following is the schedule for the Finance Committee Meeting to be held on SUNDAY, 23 October at 10:00 in the WILSON ROOM at Greylock Dining Hall. This meeting will include the final mark-up of the Budget before its submission to the College Council and all students are invited to attend.

Projects cut from catalogue

The list of 1978 Winter Study projects, released after a delay last Friday, indicates little departure from the types of courses offered in past years, with a few popular courses being repeated. The Record, however, received the following list of WSP's that reportedly were not submitted in time to be included in the catalogue.

PSYCH 15: "The Unconscious State—how to attain it." Defined as "subject does not respond when pinched." Theory and application of board to head, drunken stupors, deep sleeps, and an independent project. Concurrent problem of amnesia discussed, unless forgotten about.

POLI SCI 18: War Games—great battles of all time will be reenacted on campus, using snow as weapons. Tactics and weapons will increase in sophistication until the demolition of Currier Hall in the final week by a giant "A-snowball."

HISTORY OF PERVERSION: Strange sexual phenomena, handled with so much taste, sophistication and clinical style that students will rarely understand what is being discussed. Topics include informal sex (not requiring coat and tie). Guest lecturer from Intercourse, Pennsylvania.

JANITORIAL SPECIAL: Pen Maintenance—how to care for and maintain pens with flair. First week: starting clogged ball-points. Progressing to pig pens, state and federal pens, six pens, pen guins. Guest lecturers from Pen State.

PHILO 11: Basic Philosophical Arguments—questions plaguing mankind since someone was fool enough to worry about them will be decided once and for all through informal field trips. Class will buy a chicken to prove that it predates the egg (or, buy and hatch an egg to prove that it predates chicken). The second trip will be into the woods to listen for falling trees.

ES 12: Hunting—student will become familiar with most familiar types of hunts: Hunt's catsup, Easter egg hunts, wild goose chases, looking for contact lenses, searches and seizures. Guest lecturer from Hunter College and field trip to Huntington, N.Y.

PSYCH 16: Origins of Language—recent linguistic anthropological evidence proves that the first speaking race was a race of insect eaters from North Jersey, the area which is now called Summit. People here invented speech so that they could warn each other about which bugs were poisonous or unpalatable. This explains the confusion, even today, over the words "etymology" and "entomology."

WSP future in danger?

Two student members of the Committee on Educational Policy fear for the future of Winter Study. According to Jeff Delisle '78 and Larry Mitchell '78 and CEP is now investigating the possibilities of reducing faculty time commitments during the January term.

The alternatives include: 1) voluntary WSP for students and faculty; 2) reducing permitted WSP participation, probably to two or three during a four year career; and 3) reducing faculty for WSP causing fewer, but larger, classes.

Mitchell, the College Council representative, observed that students at other institutions "almost invariably" disliked interim terms similar to the proposed changes. Part of the value, he explained, came from having all of your friends back to take some time to relax and enjoy Williams.

Delisle, the Division 3 representative, said that the CEP faculty concurred that they needed a block of time during the year in which to pursue scholarship, that this extra time would develop a better faculty, and would assist in attracting new applicants. He warned, however, that "there is a danger in examining Winter Study from this narrow view. The CEP mustn't begin cutting this program without considering the ramification to the whole."

Agreeing, Mitchell noted that with the current situation, Williams enjoyed a fine faculty, but that WSP attracted students. A loss of WSP, he feared, would remove an advantage of Williams and cause a drop in the quality of the applicant pool.

Concluding, Delisle said that the faculty assured the CEP that they would consider every aspect of the January term, but he worried at the trend of some people to continue to "whittle away at Winter Study until it no longer represented a valid educational experience."

College names scholarship fund for alumnus Jayne

The College has announced the establishment of a scholarship fund at Williams in memory of David W. Jayne III '58.

The scholarship fund is part of the David W. Jayne Memorial Trust. The remaining portion of the Trust will provide for the education of Jayne's children and a trust fund for the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism, which Jayne attended.

Jayne, a senior producer of ABC News, was killed in a plane crash on September 23 in Amman, Jordan while on assignment for ABC News.

The Memorial Trust will be administered by an executive committee chaired by ABC newscasters Harry Reasoner and Barbara Walters. Other members of the executive committee are newscasters Howard K. Smith, Walter Cronkite, John Chancellor, and Dan Rather, Dean of the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism Elie Abel, and College President John W. Chandler.

Donors to the Trust may designate to which of the three areas of the Trust they wish their contributions to go: Williams, Columbia, or the education of Jayne's children.

Editorial

FinComm Folly

We believe that Harry Kelly and some, but not all, members of the College Council finance committee are suffering from a number of delusions concerning the Record's budget for 1977-78. That committee, whose open letter is printed elsewhere on this page, has approved a "talking figure" of $12,000 for the Record's budget, representing a $4,268 cut from our request. We shall attempt to outline these delusions.

Delusion #1—The committee's letter indicates that a majority of its members think that the "costs" involved in the Record remaining with its present printer in North Adams outweigh the benefits. We suggest that they are wrong for the following reasons, among others.

1.) Some of the monetary savings which the committee expects that the Record would incur are purely illusory. The price quote which the committee was given and which it made its calculations from was for 2500 copies of each issue. The Record press run is currently 3500 copies, approximately 1850 of which are mailed to subscribers. This discrepancy alone would probably reduce Mr. Kelly's "$8000 a year" savings by over $1200 a year. Record transportation costs and phone bills would also rise significantly. There would be some not insignificant costs involved in switching to a new mailing system as well. Finally, if the quality of the newspaper declined, as we suggest it would, subscription revenues could be expected to fall in the future.

2.) There are non-monetary costs involved in switching printers which the committee hasn't even considered. Perhaps Mr. Kelly or another finance committee member would like to tell us what the dollar cost is on the need for Record personnel to drive to Pittsfield and back twice a week, at night, over often dangerously icy roads. Or perhaps they would like to inform us of what the dollar cost is of neglecting the College's responsibility to be a part of, and support, the North Adams community. We choose not to place a monetary value on such issues but suggest that they are indeed "costs" that must be considered.

3.) Switching to the new printer would involve some loss of control by the Record over what actually appears in the paper. Experience with other newspapers that are laid out in Pittsfield and printed in Springfield suggests that there would be a substantial increase in communication problems, typographical errors and in the use of "filler" material which is never seen by personnel affiliated with the Record.

4.) The layout and printing procedures which the Record would need to employ would greatly reduce the Record's ability to cover late-breaking stories and events. In effect, Record late copy deadlines would be moved up by a day. This would mean that any events which happened on Sunday night or Monday would not normally make the Wednesday issue. Similarly, events taking place on Wednesday night or Thursday (including College Council meetings) would not make the Friday issue.

5.) The distances involved and the difficulties in getting to Williamstown in the winter would probably involve delays in getting the paper back from the printer.

6.) Our visits over a period of several years to the middleman operation in Pittsfield, where the layout of the paper would be done, have convinced us that it suffers from some serious manpower and equipment deficiencies. Cheap materials and cluttered work areas are the rule. In addition, a telephone survey of other newspapers connected with the Pittsfield operation which we did last year found a lack of complete satisfaction with the quality of the work done.

7.) The risks involved in switching would be high. If a contract was signed with the new printer, the Record would lose much of its ability to demand a quality product. If a contract was not signed, nothing would prevent large price increases over the next few years after the Record had actually switched printers.

8.) We are generally quite satisfied with the services that Lamb Printing currently provides.

Delusion #2—We believe that Mr. Kelly and other members of the finance committee are deluded to think that they are better qualified to judge the "costs" and "benefits" involved in switching printers than are Record editors. Three successive Record editorial boards have examined the "new printer" that the committee keeps referring to and all have reached the conclusion that a switch would be unwise. These efforts, carried out over the last three years, have involved letters, telephone conversations with other newspapers and a number of trips to Pittsfield by Record editors, layout specialists and photographers. Now however, based on one letter to CC president Tom Herwitz last summer and one 45 minute visit to Pittsfield by Mr. Kelly, the finance committee thinks it can more accurately assess the "costs" and "benefits" involved than can the Record. Nonsense. Perhaps Mr. Kelly's experience with the printing of The Spirit of '78 qualifies him as an expert, but we doubt it.

Delusion #3—Somehow, the finance committee seems to think that if the Record budget is cut $4,268 that we will then agree that a switch in printers is best. This is certainly not the case. The College Council can indeed cut the Record budget but the Record editorial board will decide where those cuts are made. While we cannot speak for future editorial boards, this administration has already decided that a cut in the Record budget will result in fewer issues, not a switch in printers. A cut of $4,268, as the committee recommends, would thus have the effect of eliminating about 15 of the 30 issues planned for Winter Study and second semester. (The CC cut itself would eliminate about 10 issues but the resulting drop in Record ad revenues would probably eliminate five more.)

Thus, the question that faces Kelly and his financiers, and ultimately the the College Council itself, is this: would you like 15 more issues of the Record at a cost of $2.16 per student (15c per issue per student) during second semester or would you rather allocate that money elsewhere? In pondering this question, the finance committee would be well-advised to remember that expenditures on the Record serve to lower the costs of virtually every other organization on this campus. For instance, we calculate that last year the College Council elections alone received about $350 worth of coverage in the Record.

We suggest that the students show up Sunday, as the finance committee has asked, and help the committee make its decision.

Letters: waste, Record's budget

Mailroom waste

To the editor:

The mailbox distribution of the "correction" for Monday evening events published in the Register was a flagrant waste of paper—it makes me SICK!! Didn't the distributor think the same purpose could be accomplished in other ways? There are many alternatives, all of which could be adopted and still eliminate this disgusting display of WASTE. A few prominent signs in the mailroom, notification by phone of the JA's and House presidents who could then make the announcement or make a sign in their residences, having WCFM broadcast the correction—a combination of these steps would have been sufficient.

Exhibiting a similar lack of regard for paper conservation was the following day's handout about Don McLean. The print took up only half of a page so why couldn't TWO notices have been printed on each 8½" x 11" sheet? When are we going to bring a halt to this insensitive utilization of our resources?

While I have everybody's attention, I would like to encourage all of you to throw your junk mail (such as these notices) into the boxes located at both ends of the Baxter Mailroom, and-or the boxes in the lobby of Bronfman. Thank you.

Kelly's heroes

To the editor:

An open letter to the students,

As is mentioned elsewhere in this paper, the Finance Committee approved an initial "talking figure" for The Williams Record's budget of $12,000. This represents a $4000 cut from the editors' request. Because of the possible implications of this cut, the Finance Committee wishes to solicit the campus' feeling on the problem through this medium.

First, some financial details are necessary. The present cost of publishing the Record is about $27,000, representing a six per cent increase over last year's costs. Another printer has suggested he could do the job for a total cost of about $18,000, or about 33 per cent less. After the Record's other revenues are applied to the costs, the bill at the present printer would be about $16,000, to be borne by the students from the student activities tax. The costs at the new printer would be about $8,000. However, because several issues have already been produced at the present firm's press, we estimate the total bill for printing the Record this year would come to about $10,500. We reached our figure of $12,000 by adding an additional $1,500 to cover the cost of additional pages, graphics and any transition costs incurred in the switchover process. We must emphasize that this is not our final figure, merely a "talking figure" for future deliberations.

We hope the Record will suggest its reasons for opposing this change. Their concerns are valid and received every possible consideration. These concerns include the inconvenience of switching to a new publisher, the much stricter deadline of the new publisher, the possible loss of direct control over the printing of the Record and the danger of delivery delays between Williamstown and the new publisher's plant in Springfield. These concerns merit great regard; however, it is our opinion that they are outweighed by the benefits which a new printer could offer. For example, we estimate a savings of $4000 this year alone—enough money to pay for the Outing Club's canoes, the Student Course Guide and a touring company for Cap and Bells. Over four years, the savings could amount to $8,000 yearly, or a total of $32,000—twice the cost of a new FM control board at WCFM. A yearly savings of $8,000 would amount to 7 per cent of the College Council's budget. Even if the new publisher raised his costs considerably in future years, it is doubtful he would exceed the costs of the present publisher, whose prices have escalated at 6 per cent yearly in recent years.

In our eyes, the issue resolves around several important questions: is the cost of maintaining the present firm's convenience and quality worth the benefit to the Record? Our answer was no; we feel that the net benefit to the Record is not worth the cost, a cost borne in large part by the students. Is the benefit in savings worth the inconvenience, possible loss in printing quality and possible delivery delays incurred at a new printer? Our feeling was that the benefit here exceeded the cost; that in fact, because the Record staff never tried to run a trial edition at the new printer, any statement about possible quality losses remains problematical, at best. What is the College's relation to the present printer, who currently handles a number of College accounts, obviously at large expense? Our feeling is that this question of involvement

Correction

The October 14 issue of the Record incorrectly stated that the College had recently "resubscribed to an information service which permits social and political activities of corporations," in an article on the deposition of stocks and investment tied to South Africa. The sentence should have read "monitors social and political activities." We regret the error.

The word from Mear's

Business seeks the vocal, literate and responsible

by Julie Beemer

Sooner or later, most of us will drag ourselves over to Mears House on Park Street for matters more serious than the Greek frat letters over the door would indicate. The Office of Career Counseling is there to help us break out of our liberal arts cocoon and ease us into the world of jobs.

Peggy Sloane, the director of the OCC, offered some advice to help make the transition smoother. She stresses the importance of developing and doing well in academic and non-academic interests regardless of the areas in which they lie. She says that besides looking for these characteristics, business employers prefer those who have good writing and speaking abilities, and who are responsible and outgoing. Doing well in any field is more important for entering most graduate schools outside the specific major a student pursues.

It is a false assumption that we must aim for particular careers while we are in college. Sloane said that deciding what you like to do is the most important thing. Later in life we can figure out how to go about doing it. Although she predicts that about 70 per cent of the Class of '77 will enter graduate school in the next five years, Sloane says that some graduates prefer to first check the job market or to travel before continuing with their formal education.

Banking is a popular starting point in the job market because many firms provide management training programs that prepare students for other fields as well. Accounting, which provides exposure to all phases and types of businesses, is also popular because many accounting firms hire graduates and then put them through schools that provide an MBA (Masters of Business Administration) and-or a CPA (Certified Public Accountant) diploma. Small businesses and retail or wholesale firms interest some, while a smaller percentage of graduates are interested in working for the creative arts in acting or technical theater, for art galleries, in dance, or with television broadcasting, or advertising.

Last year was the first year that the OCC was able to accumulate close to accurate information about the previous graduating class. The office has developed a list of statistics showing the percentage of last year's seniors who are employed or are looking for employment in specific fields and a list of the percentages of those who entered specific types of graduate schools. In addition, there is a composite list of the graduates and their majors compared with their present occupations.

Information about the Class of '77 along with an abundance of material about graduate schools and employment are available in the OCC library and all students are encouraged to talk with any of the staff members. Students interested in law schools or government occupations can talk to Cynthia Thomas, in business schools and business jobs to Peggy Sloane, and in social service, teaching and on-campus or summer employment to Jeff Wood.

needs further study, as an issue independent of the Record's budget, as does the issue of the economic impact of switching from a local printer to a Springfield firm. Our final opinion was that it was not worth $4000 this year—and potentially a great deal more in the future—to maintain the current producer's account. The cost to the students far exceeds the cost to the Record. A great savings can be made.

Our decision is neither final nor unanimous. In fact, those of us who voted for the cut had separate reasons for our decisions. It was our feeling, however, that just as the Record has a proper regard for its product, so we are responsible for our duty. That duty is to produce a budget for the College Council which is based on sound information and reflects the greatest savings where savings can be made with regard for the interest of all. Justifiability is our main criteria and in our opinion, we could not justify giving the Record $4000 which it does not vitally need, when many other groups have seen their budgets substantially cut by us. In the final analysis, however, the proof is in the printing. All of our decisions remain tentative, until more information can be solicited. That is why we feel that much more discussion is necessary before a final budget is sent to the College Council. Our meetings are open; the Record's budget will receive its final action next Sunday at 12:30 in the Wilson Room at Greylock. We hope that those who feel strongly about the issue will share their opinions with us then. Only then can we reach a responsible decision which is fair to the Record and to the students, whose money is our responsibility. Please come and help us.

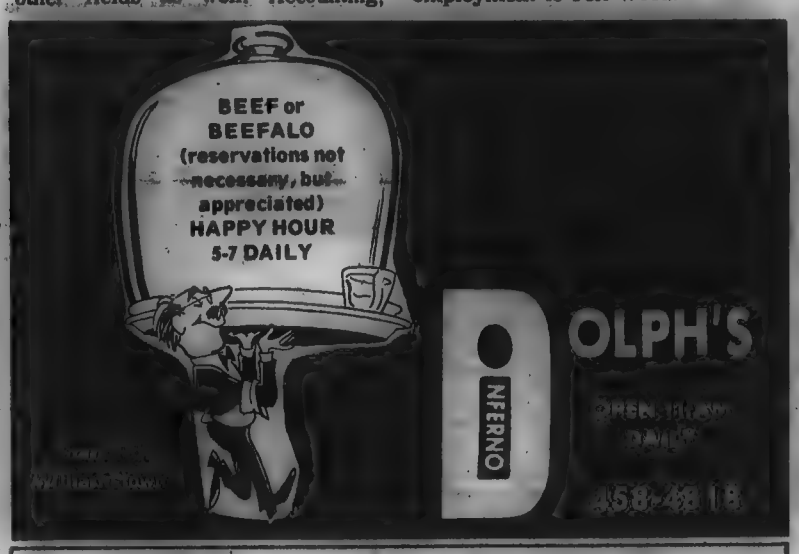
The "present cost of publishing the RECORD" is not, as you indicate, $27,000 but rather $33,777. Our projected printing costs for this year are around $27,000. Ed.

Views on Bakke

To the editor:

It appears that you have fundamental misconceptions about the US Supreme Court, the Bakke case, and issues that special admissions programs raise. The duty of the Supreme Court is to interpret laws and lower court decisions to develop a consistent social and legal framework for American life. Popular opinion does not determine Constitutionality; a majority decision in the Court does.



Specifically in the Bakke case, you indicate that "social values of special admissions programs overshadow the 'unfairness' that Bakke argues they contain." This is absurd. How can you determine the social values and the social costs? It is always difficult to balance the rights of society against the rights of an individual. This is no simple task for the Supreme Court, much less an editor pressed by a deadline. In Olmstead v. U.S. the Court held that only a threat to the state's existence constitutes justification for abrogation of an individual's rights in favor of the rights of society. Are you telling us that the security of this nation is threatened in the absence of special admissions programs?

The special admissions program at U.C. Davis has some social value but that does not necessarily overshadow unfairness to Bakke and others like him. In fact, the program was the epitome of reverse discrimination, solely concerned with filling of minority quotas. Because of the stringent special enrollment minimums, many of the minority students admitted were unequivocally unqualified. Clearly, this is discriminatory against the more qualified white applicant who is not admitted because of the color of his skin.

The UC Davis program deals with minority students who, according to studies done by the University of California, are generally not as well qualified as their white counterparts. Qualification for medical school should be determined solely by grades, test scores, and practical background. It seems to us that the social value of medical schools is to turn out the best doctors possible. Furthermore, a study by the AMA indicated that 85 per cent of minority admissions students do not return to urban centers for private practice.

We believe in equal opportunity for all American citizens. However, no justification exists for achieving it at the expense of others and at the expense of the quality of our pursuits. The gravest mistake this country could make would be to rush headlong into this predicament without careful consideration.

CLARK CRISIS

Clark Director plans changes

Brooke sees paintings in new light

by Sarah Hood

What is a former London cop, who always dreamed of becoming a music hall performer, doing in Williamstown? Well, he is the new Director of the Clark Art Institute, David S. Brooke, and he replaced George H. Hamilton in that capacity last month.

Brooke is English, and a trendsetter of the early 1950's. Well ahead of the times, he took time off between secondary school and university—not a timid year but a full two and one-half year hitch in the British Army. He was stationed as an MP (not member of parliament) in the Bowe Street section of London (The heart of the city—the theatre district, Picadilly). He valued the opportunity to become acquainted in depth with "this fascinating section", and it was only with great hesitation that he left his police duties to cross the Atlantic to study Art History at Harvard on a scholarship.

Which naturally leads one to wonder where the interest in art developed? As a child he was a "hanger around in antique shops and museums, a collector of everything, and an inventor of complicated machines that never quite worked." He grew up in a "family of projects," and, in fact, his Harvard scholarship was a project set up well in advance by the American side of his family during the nineteenth century. After completing his B.A. he stayed at Harvard for his PhD, specializing in eighteenth and nineteenth century art, particularly British. At the same time he served as an Assistant Curator of Loans at the Fogg Museum. He says he owes his love of painting to Boston and its riches, having spent an "awful lot of Tuesday evenings in the Museum of Fine Arts." It was in 1961 that he first visited the Clark, remembering being struck by the "grandness and beauty of the art mirrored in the surrounding landscape."

The Smith College Art Gallery was the scene of his first "real" job in the museum world, as Assistant Curator of the Collection. From there he became Curator of the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto, serving from 1965 to 1968. Another radical change of scenery accompanied his move to Manchester, New Hampshire in 1968 where he was Curator of the Currier Gallery, the position he left to come to the Clark.

Though similar in size to the Clark, the Currier presented "an entirely different set of possibilities and problems." Currier was a Manchester banker who left a small core of local decorative arts, "well-chosen" variety of medieval to modern paintings, and a large endowment which provided funds for acquisitions. Brooke's major goal was to stimulate community interest in Manchester's only major gallery. It serves no university, is not located in a picturesque setting and its attendance (30,000 per year) is well below that of the Clark (approximately 100,000). What the two have in common is the eccentric tastes of their benefactors and their individuality, concepts in which Brooke delights when applied to museums.

Why did he come to the Clark? "It is bigger, more distinguished, presents greater challenges, and there are more knowledgeable people with whom to share ideas". He had added his own interpretation to the Currier—"any museum needs a vitality derived from rotation." For the moment he is still feeling his way around the Clark, with the onus of double duties. Charles Cunningham, Chief Curator at the Clark also retired this year, and Brooke is temporarily filling that post as well. He is also a Lecturer in Art, and will teach his first course, a Winter Study, "The Profile of an Art Museum," in January.

Brooke plans to emphasize his duties relating to the collection. A rearrangement of the galleries to show "the paintings in a new light, and to give them a chance at dialogue with different neighbors" is prominent on his agenda. The Clark is a building of idiosyncratic spaces, and Brooke feels no gallery should be permanently labeled "French" or "American." He would also like to increase the number of publications and exhibitions originating at the Clark, making fuller use of the graduate students. He is, not surprisingly, encouraging gifts, a problem at the Clark since it is stamped with one man's name. Strengthening and widening the parameters of the Clark's taste and views, particularly with the acquisition of local pieces is another objective. "Constant acquisition is necessary to any museum's excitement level and vitality."

A sense of humor and a grain of salt are Brooke's professed keys to a museum's success. He stressed concern that the staff not take itself too seriously; that the Clark not only be the scene of rarified lectures on soaring verticality and the pulvinated frieze, but seek to attract the untapped local population unaware of the "absolute delight and visual knockout" so close to home.

Brooke will be acting out his fantasies on the Clark stage later this fall when he presents "The Magic Lantern Show," a bit of Monty Pythonesque nineteenth century song and dance.

DeBroca spins charming tale in 'King of Hearts'

The Williams Film Society presents "King of Hearts" tonight in Bronfman Auditorium at 7 and 9. Admission is $1.

by Dan Frazier

"If we weren't crazy we'd all be insane."

—A Popular Song

If the Anthropology Department had a class called "Cross-Cultural Indices: World War I to Vietnam," King of Hearts would most certainly head the syllabus.

It's no mistake that King of Hearts has a devout cult following from Cambridge to Berkeley. When it appeared in the art-houses in 1966, this film was a parable for an America expressing itself with napalm. Director Phillipe DeBroca approaches his films with an almost playful enthusiasm, and we can feel his joy between every frame of this one. He tells is charming fairy-tale so well that people somehow confuse it with political satire.

The inmates of the local asylum have taken over a deserted French town to be blown up at midnight, and Alan Bates is the befuddled Scottish Private Charles Plumpick sent to find the bomb. But the new citizens don't care—why should they? They're enjoying themselves more than did any flower children.

DeBroca has whipped up an attractive bit of inconsequential fluff. George Delerue's lilting and sparkling music suspends the delightful goings-on outside of time and the real, murderous world.

Meanwhile, the reluctant emissary from that world is crowned by the inmates and engaged to the tight-rope dancer Coquelicot, a spindly and winsome Genevieve Bujold.

But the armies of both sides rudely interrupt their magical spell, and the gentle inmates, with their wisdom-of-the-ages, retreat to take refuge in their safe and non-violent enclave.

That sounds nice, doesn't it? It could be a commune in Vermont, vegetarian by economics instead of culture. Burrowing in makes sense, be it in an asylum, a commune, or Williamstown. It keeps you from getting hurt. And if the real world were only that simple, it too would be as healthy and playful as King of Hearts.

This Saturday night from 9 to 12 p.m. in the Rathskellar, the Williams community will have the unique opportunity to see David Misch. Who? David Misch! All seriousness aside, David Misch—who owes his publicity agent $46 and makes no claim to being a superior bowler—is a comedian, the first to appear in conjunction with the Williams Coffeehouse in a long time. Armed with a guitar, a Sony tape recorder, "Somerville" (never mind), and at least a three hour repertoire of parodies, surreal adventure tales, satires, and health hints, Misch promises (or his press release-media blitz does, anyway) to dazzle his audience with slides of his family (no projector), a mock anthropology lecture on giant pygmies, and other fun things.

"To call my act the salvation of Western Civilization as we know it would be a vast overstatement," Misch says. "But if it will get me bookings, I'll use it."

Stocking lecture

Fred Stocking will repeat his faculty lecture of last spring at the Clark Art Institute this Sunday, October 23, at 2 p.m. The lecture is entitled "A Victorian Folly, Being a Slightly Modified Repetition of a Faculty Lecture on the Albert Memorial Delivered on March 3, 1977," and is brought back by popular demand.

Stocking is the Morris Professor of Rhetoric at Williams. He received his doctorate from the University of Michigan in 1946, has been at Williams since 1939, Chairman of the English Department 1963-66, and has held many distinguished academic appointments at other institutions. His lecture on Sunday, October 23, at 2 p.m., will be free and open to the public.

Mc Lean tonight

Don McLean, one of the most acclaimed singer-songwriters of the past decade, will be appearing in Chapin Hall tonight at 8. A limited number of tickets are still available, and will be sold at Chapin starting at 7:15.

McLean's appearance at Williams winds up a series of well-received concerts throughout the Northeast, including a four-show stint at The Bottom Line in New York this past weekend. According to ACEC Chairman Steve Case, "McLean plays when he wants to, where he wants to, for as much as he wants to. He's familiar with Williams—he lives two hours away—and wanted to play here, which is why we were able to get him at an affordable fee."

McLean's eighth album, Prime Time, was released this week by Arista Records amidst rave reviews.

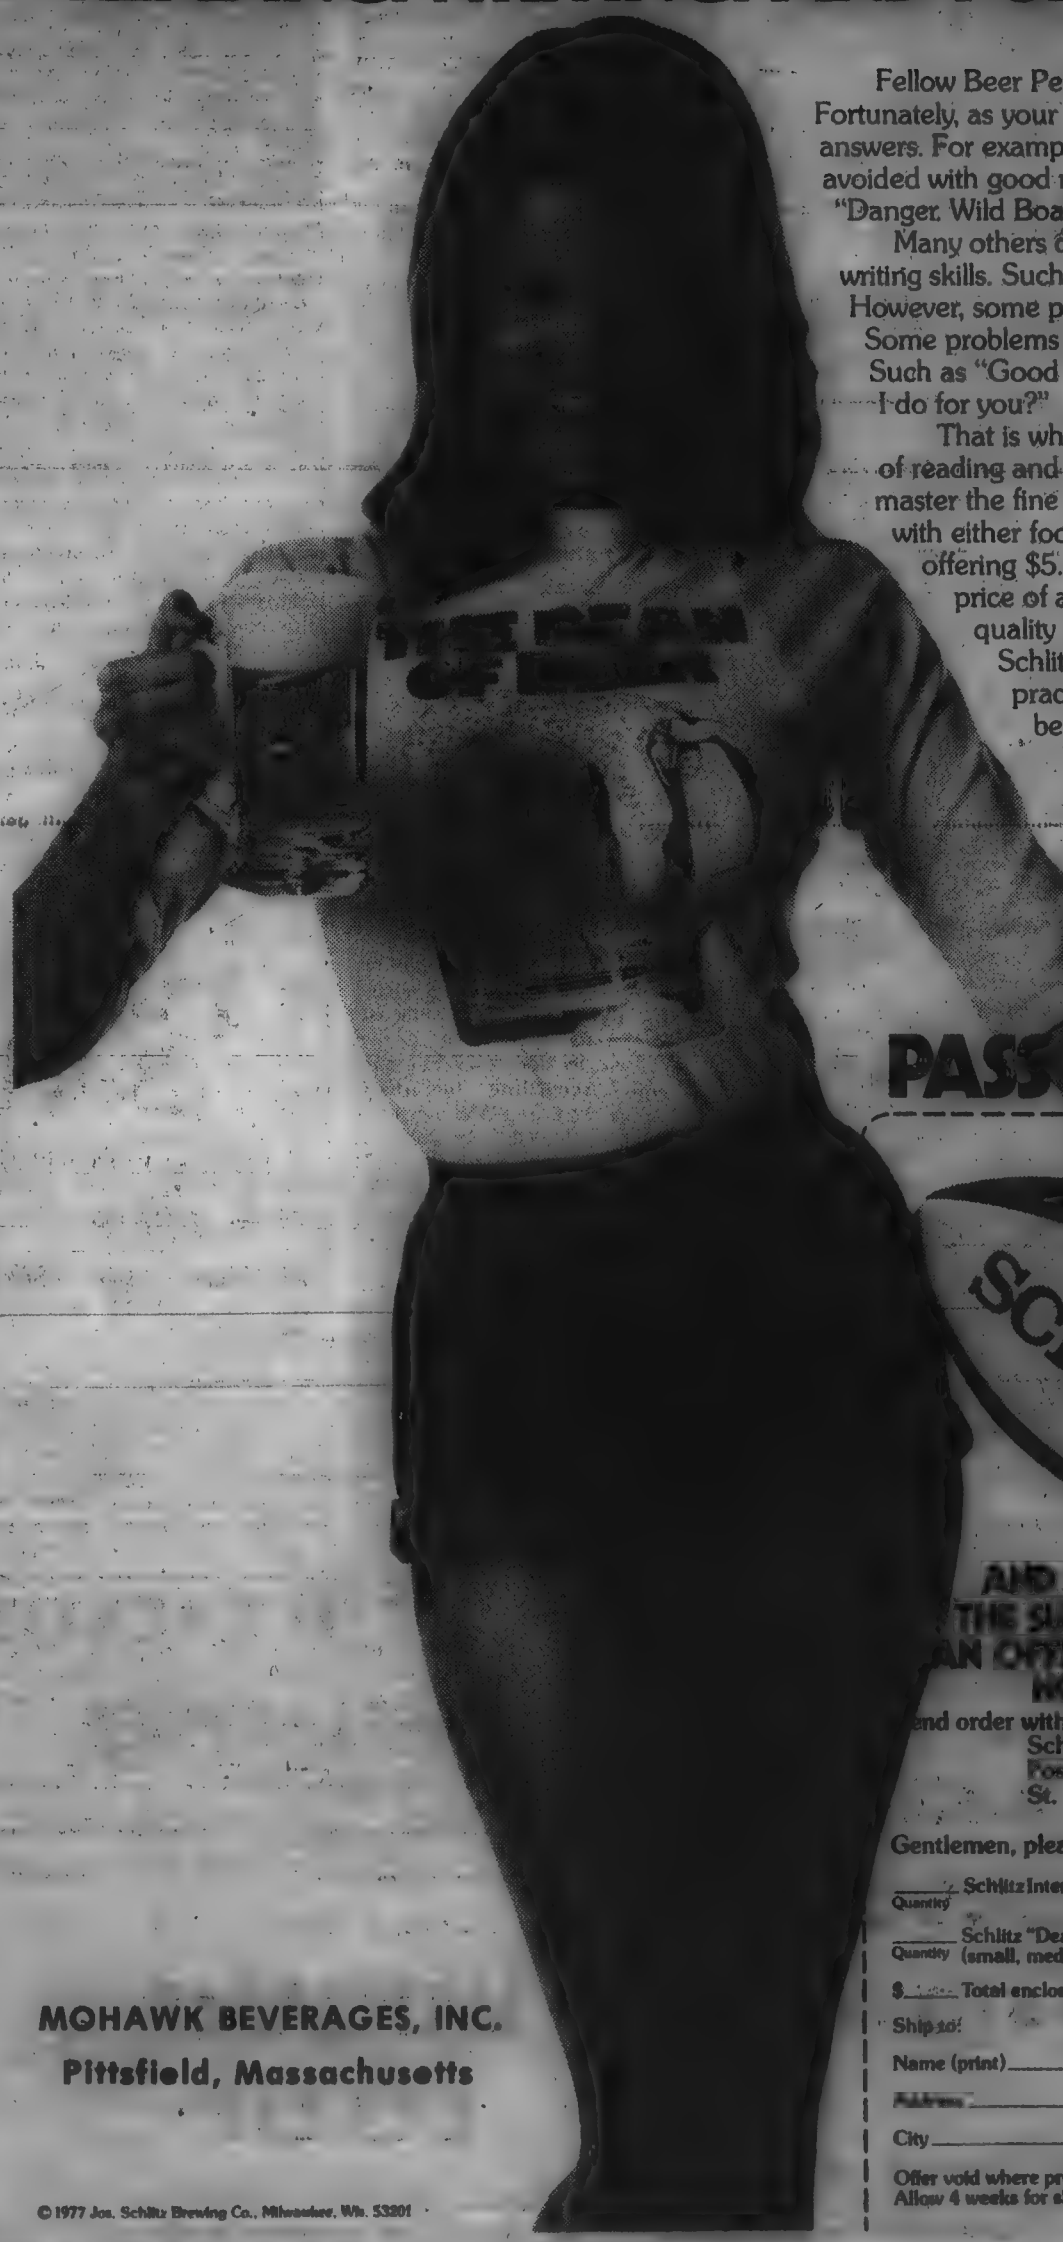
Klaatu
Hope
ST-11663

By Marcus Smith

Klaatu achieved notoriety last year as the "perhaps they're the Beatles" group. Their first album displayed a highly polished, highly produced sound containing smooth, clear solo singing, tight harmonies, complex construction, controlled electric guitars, and camp humor—all of which made analogies to Sgt. Pepper understandable if not possible.

Unfortunately, Klaatu has stepped off the mystery themselves with their new album, Hope. Gone is the high-spiritedness of "California Jam." Gone is the crisp rock of "True Life Hero." What remains instead is truly eclectic music. The tightness and quick vitality of the first album has been replaced by slow, stretched out compositions of an extremely misguided nature. Vioms incessant organs and harpsichords, sloppy classical filler, sound effects, contrived cheerfulness, intergalactic theatricism—all this and more make Hope a record of pure kitsch, of "art pop" gone wrong. Incorporating all the excesses of self-consciously orchestrated pop music, Klaatu's new sound is as pretentious as it is tedious.



Much of the new album is just simply unlistenable (even during a first listen). "Long Live Politzania" is 9:06 of inane pomp and discordance that only Klaatu's immediate fan could love. "Prelude" offers us a mish-mash of brass bandishness and film credit classical music with electric guitar interludes. (Mozart would cringe). "The Loneliest Of Creatures" displays the group's operatic singing "talents" (Freddy Mercuries they're not, and that's not a compliment to Freddy either).

"Around The Universe In Eighty Days" is perhaps Klaatu's answer to "Space Oddity" and The Moody Blues, and a real oddity it is. Complete with an embarrassingly trite poetic rendition (the kind of thing we'd try to overlook with The Moodies), the song is a classic example of grandoise, pseudo-epic naivete. A definite "Oh Wow!" song.

Klaatu, in short, has apparently resumed "the search for the lost chord"—without the success of their predecessors. A talented bunch, they have let "cosmic" quirkiness extinguish their rock instincts, allowed their creative abilities such a free reign that the result is irksome, organized chaos.

"For what appears sheer grandiosity let no legacy remain ('Long Live Politzania!')," Klaatu's lyrics have never been more appropriate. Let's just hope their next hope heeds such advice.

THE DEAN OF BEER SUGGESTS ALL STUDENTS IMPROVE THEIR READING. WRITING. AND PUNTING.

Fellow Beer Persons, life is full of problems. Fortunately, as your Dean of Beer, I am full of answers. For example, many problems can be avoided with good reading skills. Such as "Danger. Wild Boar Ahead."

Many others can be avoided through good writing skills. Such as "Dear Mom, Send Cash."

However, some problems require more. Some problems require special attention. Such as "Good evening, Officer. What can I do for you?"

That is why, in addition to the fine arts of reading and writing, I recommend you master the fine art of punting. Preferably with either foot. That is also why I am offering $5.00 off the suggested retail price of an official, intercollegiate-quality Wilson football, with the Schlitz emblem. So you can practice. (Besides, no one would be interested if I offered $5.00 off on lip balm.) Class dismissed.

Golfers defeat division 1 Yale

On a beautiful Sunday afternoon in the lush confines of the Purple Valley, seven swaggering Titans hailing from Yale University arrived to do battle at the Eph linksters own prestigious, awesome, ever-so-challenging 6,322 monster layout, Taconic Golf club. After the first nine holes of play, the heavily favored Yale squad found themselves in deep trouble. The Williams golfers, sporting a flashy 4-1 record conjured up images of Achilles as he spoke to Lykaan, the Trojan in the Iliad: "So you die also, what is all the commotion about it." Indeed, Williams ended the season at 5-1, crush Yale by 21 shots in a stirring day 407-421 triumph.

Grabbing medalist honors for the second time this season, Marcel Bodin balanced a collapsing swing with the touch and precision of a bomb squad specialist. His 79 was a fine score, because at this time in the season, the condition of the fairways and putting greens have begun to deteriorate. Right behind Marcel, junior Dan Katz contributed an 80 to the Williams effort. Although Katz began to show signs of psychological aberrations with shanks on the thirteenth and fifteenth holes, he managed to hang on for the completion of an otherwise solid round.

Playing in the number one spot for the first time, young Bill Sprague, 1977 Williams College Golf Championship victor, continued his resurgence with a respectable 82. Young Sprague fought a balky putter most of the day, but his now impressive ball striking ability, aided by wrists which are a wonder of natural selection, allowed him to remain only three strokes off the medal pace.

Senior co-captain Doug Chumbley began the day with his golf balls exploding off the clubface like shells from a 30-30 Howitzer. Unfortunately, Chumbley did not keep pace with his early hole heroics but still finished with a good score of 82. Coach Rudy Goff is especially pleased with Chumbley's performance this year, because he has emerged from two years of oblivion to become a consistent performer on the team.

Rounding out the scoring, Ed "Big" Bousa, posted an 84. Some things are inconceivable and so it is with Big E. It could have been the heartbreaking letdown of the extra hole semi-final loss to Young Sprague in the College Championship. Possibly the leg action was out of synchronism or his head was moving too much. Whatever the cause, nothing can make us forget Bousa's fine play throughout the majority of the season. The 1975 New England Junior Champion will unquestionably be back.

Although neither Bill Upton's 85 or Chris Malone's 86 counted in the scoring, both displayed streaches of impressive shotmaking, and will be looked to for big things in the spring.

In looking over the season, Rudy Goff was very proud of the teams outstanding 5-1 record. The Eph linksters are relatively inexperienced, and the total collapse on the second nine holes against Springfield will not likely happen again.

Jumbos big in size, thin on experience

by Tim Layden

A little less than a year ago, Tufts' school mascot, a huge, stuffed remembrance of famous circus elephant Jumbo, was destroyed in a fire which gutted the Medford, Massachusetts University's Student Union. Judging from the appearance of football coach Paul Pawlak's 1977 roster, the institution's grid program should be able to offer several possible replacements for Jumbo along their front offensive and defensive lines.

"They're probably the biggest team we've played since I've been here," said Williams Head Coach Bob Odell of the invading Jumbos. Indeed, the Tufts interior lines bear a strong resemblance to elephants, lacking only trunks and a craving for peanuts (the jury is still out on whether or not they fear mice; if so, Odell might well start one at linebacker).

Tufts lost 17 lettermen to graduation, including running back Tim Whelan and quarterback Bob Berluti. In sophomore Chris Connors (245 yards in a 21-17 loss to Norwich), Pawlak seems to have adequately replaced Berluti, but replacing Whelan, the school's all-time leading ground-gainer, is impossible.

The 1-3 Jumbos, conquerors only of winless Hamilton, are hoping to get outstanding play from their front lines, while allowing their inexperienced skill players to gather valuable playing time. The unit topped Hamilton 30-20, but has suffered losses to Wesleyan (18-9), Middlebury (41-0) and Norwich.

All-east tackle Mike Kelly, a 235-pounder, anchors a veteran offensive line, while a pair of whales, Terry Richards (250) and Mark Buben (240) are the stalwarts of the Tufts defensive front. "They beat you with brute strength and awkwardness," says Odell, "they aren't real quick, or they'd be at Harvard."

Obviously, for Williams, the game plan will be to play "Jack" and try to get to the bottom of the beanstalk before the big old giant gets you first. Translation: take advantage of the slow Tufts lineman with the outside and passing games. "We don't anticipate beating them inside," remarked Odell, "our plan is to get outside on them, and then throw it."

A busy afternoon seems in store for Bill Whelan and favorite targets Ken Hollingsworth and Herb McCormick, a duo all set for another matinee performance of "The Flying Burritto Brothers." Tri-captain Scott Harrington will return to a starting tailback spot, alongside Dave Massucco, with Greg Collins ready. Gus Nuzzolese the squad's offensive player of the week, goes at fullback, and Todd Eckerson is the tight end.

Freshman Bob VanDore was moved to offensive tackle in the Trinity game as a desperation measure after Jack Spound was injured. VanDore has made the best of his chance and hung on to a starting job. Steve Rogers is the other offensive tackle, with Jay Skerry and Ken Schoetz at the guards and Joe Maguire snapping.

The Williams defensive unit is beginning to look like an episode from the 4077 M-A-S-H, with both starting tackles and a key roverback all out with injuries. Pete Tuttle (ankle) is probably not ready this week, Bill Couch (ankle, again) reinjured himself in practice Tuesday and is doubtful, as well, and rover Mark Eckert, of course, was lost for the season in the Middlebury loss.

"(Dan) Towle and (Colin) Hart did a respectable job, said Odell, in reference to the battle of the trenches last week against Bowdoin pro prospect Steve McCabe. The duo will flank frosh Brian Benedict on the defensive line Saturday, as Ralph Spooner will miss at least one game with, yup, you guessed it, an ankle injury.

Russ Gee and Mike Masi go at the end spots while John Thiel and Phil Shuman are the linebackers. Shuman, apparently soundly beaten out by Benedict in the second game of the season, came off the bench in the latter stages of the Bowdoin game and threw his body around the turf to the tune of 24 "thud" points (outstanding for one half) and defensive player of the week honors. Andy Krakauer, Mark Gerry, Long Ellis, and Greg McAleenan will start in Dick Farley's secondary.

The Tufts game is the final home contest until "you-know-who" rolls in for the season finale. If the Ephs hold true to form it'll be another spine-tingler on Weston Field at 1:30.

Water Polo

It's water polo weekend Friday and Saturday at Muir Pool as Boston College and UNH surface for a conference tourney against Williams. The Ephmen, sporting a 1-1 conference record and a 3-3 mark overall, move into action against top-rated BC Friday at 8:15, with a conference match between two other squads to follow. The polo players take on UNH Saturday at 9 a.m. hoping for a repeat of October 8, 14-11 dunking of the easterners.

Although Williams lost a tough 8-6 decision to Amherst last Friday, the team hopes to rebound for two more conference wins this weekend.

Women open swim season

The women's varsity swim team opens its fourth season in Muir Pool tonight against Middlebury at 6:00 with a lineup that boasts depth, talent and very few—if any—weaknesses.

Co-captains Anne Youngling and Nina Murphy, sophomore Keron Walker, Sue Tuttle, and Joanna Monroe return from a successful season which culminated in their outstanding fifth place finish at the New England Championships last year. Murphy and Walker have a piece of five college records each covering backstroke, free, fly and sprint relays events. Tuttle is the current breaststroke record holder, while Monroe and Youngling add depth in the flys and freestyles.

Despite the loss of distance swimmers Marilla Pearsall and Carol Ann Smalley, the team has no weaknesses in the 200 and 500 events. Upcoming freshmen Katherine Pearsall, who is very capable of following in her sister's footsteps, Molly Murphy and Linda Reid will cover these remaining freestyle races and will round out Coach Carl Samuelson's entries in the backstrokes and IM. Senior Carol Buck will also try her hand at the IM and butterfly after a year's absence from the team.

The only possible problems could be the diving and breaststroke events. Tuttle will not be available for the Middlebury meet, while diver Laurie Norton and Mary Southworth returned to Conn. College this fall.

Racketwomen bop Smithies

by Evan Bash

The women's tennis team took a confident first step in its journey toward the pot of gold that beckons from down the road of this week's action, easily handling Smith 8-1 for Williams' third victory in a row and seventh in ten decisions.

Step two in the voyage came yesterday against Union, concluding the Ephs longest winning streak of the season. But the real riches lie at Amherst in the New England Tournament that will be held there this weekend. Although Williams does not have the same type of overpowering team that swept its way to the Tournament championship last year, coach Curt Tong feels that the fine play the squad has produced of late points toward another good tournament performance.

Against Smith, captain Laura Carlson and Becky Chase both prepped for their singles assignments at Amherst with well played wins. Trudie ten Broeke triumphed 7-5, 7-5 and Sherry Willcox, who will be playing doubles with Ten Broeke in the tournament, won 6-1, 6-2. Freshmen stars Ann Morris and Laura Goebel both shone with easy victories. In doubles, Amherst-bound Amy Demorest and Sally Kruse won, as did Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale. Only the makeshift team of Sherry Silman-Laura Kelly lost for the Ephs.

Grady's hat trick powers purple past Smith, 6-1

The sun finally shining, the women's field hockey team blazed over Smith Tuesday 6-1 in yet another win for the victorious Little Three Champions. Smith's hope for that elusive first win over the Ephs was quickly laid to rest as sophomore sticker Monica Grady grabbed a hat trick to give the visitors an early lead.

Grady, reaching the peak of her performance this season according to coach Linda Wilkins, connected for the first goal off a corner rebound twelve minutes into the game. Ten minutes later it was Grady again, this time on a solo dodge-and-drive play from the fifty for the awesome tally. It was but five minutes before Grady felt the urge again, thus completing her triple threat. Reflecting Grady's goal, inner Val Corning made it 4-0, two minutes later. Co-captain Liza Olsen, despite strong play, was continually frustrated at the goal.

The second half was less eventful for the squad as they scored only two goals to Smith's one. Sally Kraft opened the scoring before Smith finally got on the board with a centering pass from wing. The remainder of the half saw the ball rally at midfield with the Ephs' halfback contingent of Dawn Bedrosian, Leslie Milne, and Sue Wright hanging tough. Williams' perseverance paid off though as Corning scored again to make it 6-1 finally.

Williams now 5-2-1, meets traditional rival North Adams Tuesday on Cole Field. The cross town contest pits an experienced Williams squad against the perennially psyched State squad at 3 p.m.

Budgets ready for CC floor

A somewhat frazzled Finance Committee ground through final deliberations on the budgets of 40 student organizations funded by the Student Activities Tax Sunday, ready now to present their findings to the College Council Nov. 3.

The committee wound up its fall session with a $5,500 "buffer" fund held in the treasury to give the council room to make additions to its proposals and to take care of minor overruns in activities budgets.

Several groups received increases in recommended allocations in Sunday's meeting. The Outing Club was raised $1,200 to purchase two canoes, with the stipulation that membership dues increase next year.

The Lecture Committee's proposal was upped $900 to help fund a resident performance to $4,800. The Rugby Club is slated for an extra $167 for insurance mandated by, but not paid for, by the College.

Crowds at recent concerts have reduced expected deficits for the ACEC, and the Finance Committee has cut its proposed allocation some $3,000, to $15,500. The Williams Coffeehouse has provisionally cut $245, to $3,855. The Baroquen Recorders group was not funded, since its $75 request is being met by concert proceeds.

The Record's budget was cut to $13,000 from a $16,000 request. According to Finance Committee chairman Harry Kelly, this "will require economy" from the Record staff. The committee cut $2,200 requested for a commencement issue, claiming the College should fund it.

Scott Fenn, Record editor-in-chief, countered that chances for receiving this funding are doubtful at present. An $800 cut could be met by decreasing the size of a few issues, he said, but a $3,000 drop would require the elimination of some issues, possibly during Winter Study. The final decision on these allocations will come in the College Council.

The council should finish its review of allocations by Nov. 17, Kelly said. He added that the Finance Committee will continue its work, monitoring student activities, redrafting its guidelines and preparing an annual report next semester.

Bond judges experiment

Unless it is stemmed soon, the "slow slide from benign concern to malignant neglect" will cancel 200 years of effort in the name of human rights, according to Georgian state senator Julian Bond.

Bond told a large audience in Chapin Hall last night that although the American experiment in democracy was flawed in its conception by denying women and blacks a voice in government, the human rights movement of the 1960's has made them equal before the law. However, he continued, equality of condition does not necessarily imply equality of result.

"We cannot understand the events of the recent past even though we have lived through them," he said. The gains of minority groups have been important, but much more must be accomplished before the democratic experiement is a success. Bond outlined a program based on more equitable redistribution of income and wealth, full employment, "cradle to grave" educational opportunities and social control of monopolies and services which would secure a more tenable economic future for the United States.

"We have got to learn that sufficiency for those at the bottom will not deny security to those in the middle," he explained. "The movement of the 60's has failed to sustain and expand itself in this respect."

"The Carter administration is sensitive to criticism," Bond said, implying that further gains in the area of human rights might be forthcoming. "It is the squeaky wheel which gets the grease. Already Carter has revised a welfare reform system which looks as though it would be an effective beginning to more change."

"However, it is always risky to discuss the future at all," he concluded.

WCFM decries cuts

The management of WCFM announced Wednesday night it could not continue to broadcast on a full time basis if it did not receive more money than the amount tentatively approved by the College Council's Finance Committee.

Aging equipment that now necessitates expensive repairs and the increasing cost of replacing equipment combined with the Finance Committee's refusal to grant the station more money have put WCFM on the verge of financial collapse, according to WCFM News Director Joe Avellar.

WCFM originally requested about $13,000 from the Committee. This request was pared down to $10,326 for strictly day-to-day operational expenses. The Committee approved a budget of $7800, an increase of $300 from last year's budget.

"It just comes down to money," he said. "We need more for day-to-day-operations. If we don't get more money all our programming will suffer and the frills and extra programming will disappear."

New Committee on Student Life parallels the CUL

The Committee on Student Life (CSL) will investigate remedies for "a lack of diversity and coordination" in college social activities, according to Joel Smith '79, chairman of the newly formed parallel committee.

The CSL, a student committee created this year to parallel the work of the Committee on Undergraduate Life, met for the first time. According to Smith, members agreed that there is a "real problem with social life at Williams." "Social events haven't been spread out that well, and they've tended to be very similar," he pointed out.

The CSL discussed forming a committee composed of house social chairmen that would meet periodically to allow houses to coordinate activities and to avoid scheduling similar social functions on the same weekend. Smith also suggested the printing up of a house social calendar for this purpose. The committee will meet with house presidents next week in order to obtain their viewpoints on the issue.

According to Smith, the CSL's first investigation will be "an intensive effort." "It's better to get one thing done right off than to worry about a lot of things without getting anything accomplished," he declared. Later this year, the committee will probe such issues as freshman housing, the junior advisory system, and the absence of the WHEW, which sponsored Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend last year.

The major purpose of the CSL is to "solidify student opinion" on the issues that concern the CUL, according to Smith. He cited a lack of time as one factor limiting the CUL in its efforts, and also pointed out that on the CUL, a student-faculty committee, "the faculty may not be as concerned with acting on a specific issue as the students are." "I think we're going to make progress in areas that wouldn't have been attacked by the CUL," Smith added.

Smith acknowledged that he was initially "a little worried" about the CSL's future. "I really wasn't sure why we were here," he admitted. After the first meeting, however, he assessed the committee's attitude as "very enthusiastic." "People came in right off with ideas," he said. "Right now, things look pretty optimistic."

The CSL is composed of 12 members, including the seven student members of the CUL. The five other students recently elected to the committee are John Barker '78, Carrie Brown '80, Steve Davidson '80, Al Gentry '78, and Lisa Hartigan '79.

College panel airs security concerns

"People aren't aware of the possibility of bad things happening in Williamstown," summed up Melinda Ballou '79, Williams Women representative at the Panel Discussion on "Security: The College and the Community" last Thursday.

The panel also included representatives from Security, Buildings and Grounds, the Infirmary, and Glenn Shannon '78, president of Spencer House.

The discussion, was poorly attended by students, the first of a series of three discussions sponsored by the Williams Independents on "Down from the Ivory Tower: Williamstown and the College." The audience consisted mostly of townspeople who live in the immediate vicinity of the Williams campus.

Glenn Shannon, Dr. Robert Goodell, Sue Stred, Ralph Iacuessa, Melinda Ballou and Walter O'Brien address the relationships of the town, The College and security. (photo by Oettgen)

Ballou, speaking as a trained rape crisis counselor, said that there is an "attitude of complacency which ought to be dispelled" on campus and in the community. People, she said, seem to think that assault, rape, and even robbery do not occur at Williams. However, they do happen, she asserted. She urged students to exercise a reasonable amount of caution by locking their doors, calling for a Security escort if it is late at night and above all to tell friends that they are coming so that they are expected. We must recognize that "we are afraid to be afraid," she said.

Walter C. O'Brien, Director of Security, declared that the students need to take an active role in assisting security officers to prevent break-ins and vandalism. He said that Williams students should be alerted to watch out for and report to Security any strangers in college buildings or any sudden problems or property defects.

The General Foreman of Buildings and Grounds, Ralph W. Iacuessa, spoke of the approximately $88,000 spent on outdoor lighting improvements to the campus in the last fifteen years. He, too, called for student and faculty cooperation saying that B & G had to be notified if lights were not working since maintenance crews do not work at night.

Dr. Robert A. Goodell, Director of Health, spoke positively about health-related incidents at the College. "Assaults are very rare," he asserted, while also confirming that the Infirmary had never had a reported case of rape. When there are emergencies those at the scene have generally seemed to handle the situations very well, he said.

Shannon brought up a recent case involving the breaking and entering of a student's room to point out that "wrong-doing" does occur at Williams. He maintained that if students want to be treated as adults they should take that seriously in their relations with Security and the Williamstown police. If caught "bending the rules," students should not be allowed to fall back on the excuse, "I'm a college student," he said.

In addressing the similar problem of intra-College burglary, Iacuessa said that the College tries to deal with such cases internally. He said that there have been expulsions in the past, and that often a student would rather face a court than be called in to the Dean's office and risk "blowing his whole life if he has to leave school here."

Questions from the audience centered around complaints of excess noise late at night by residents of Southworth St., near Dodd House, and lack of adequate lighting on parts of campus, chiefly around the Science Quad. O'Brien assured the audience that one call to Security will usually suffice to get loud music turned down.

One common problem Williamstown residents face, one member of the audience said, is that if something is amiss people just throw up their hands and say, "Oh, it's the college!" They need to take a more active role in bringing problems to light, she said.

A spokesman for the Williams Independents expressed afterwards that he was sorry there had not been too much interest in this subject. "We hope," he said, "that the future panels will attract more turnout."

The next panel will be on "Economics: The Purple meets the Green" and will be held this Thursday night Oct. 27, at 8:00 A.M. in Jesup Hall.

Matthew A. Pauley '81

The move of the Pentagon and the Carter Administration to press for a development of the new MX (missile experimental) is already igniting major debates over defense strategy and is likely to influence the future of SALT and, more important, the entire American philosophy of nuclear war.

Opponents of the new super-weapon claim that it would badly upset the SALT agreements. Moreover, they attack the new weapon on the grounds that it would, as The New York Times pointed out in a recent editorial, "profoundly change American strategic policy and increase the risk that a diplomatic crisis might escalate to nuclear war." Because the MX has up to 14 nuclear warheads compared with 3 for the minuteman, our most advanced nuclear weapon at present, and because of its greater accuracy, it would give the United States the power to destroy a great majority of Soviet missiles in a first strike. Some say that the Russians, in an extreme situation, would be tempted to strike us first rather than run the risk of having their vulnerable land missiles be destroyed by the powerful MX. Opponents of the MX claim that the United States should not spend the 30 billion dollars necessary for the project, a sum that would cancel out any savings from our decision to halt production of the B1 Bomber, and should instead concentrate on our submarine missiles which are mobile and, of course, less expensive to maintain.

Nevertheless, the two innovations offered by the MX-mobility and increased offensive capacity—are occasioned by drastic changes in the nuclear developments of the Soviet Union. The Air Force now reports that the Russians have developed increasingly accurate ICBM's capable of destroying, in one blow, a substantial proportion of the present stationary American missile force. Our silos though "hardened" and reinforced might not be able to withstand a massive attack. Many spokesmen avow categorically that the American missile system as it stands is in no danger from a Russian first strike. But how are we to know how far the Russians are advanced in their offensive nuclear weapons? As it is, we must assume that they can wipe out a significantly large portion of our missile force. By providing a moving target, the MX would be very difficult to destroy. Hence, it would virtually insure that a great percentage of our missiles would survive a Russian first strike. Such an assurance would then give us greater power to retaliate.

The policy of the United States until recently has required only enough second strike nuclear weapons to inflict a considerable degree of damage on the Soviets, a policy commensurate with MacNamara's idea of assured destruction. The Carter Administration, however, has said that our retaliatory forces must be able "to retard significantly the ability, of the USSR to recover from a nuclear exchange and regain the status of a twentieth century military and industrial power." Such stiffer requirements for the second-strike force make it almost imperative that we be able to protect a significant proportion of our missiles from a Soviet first strike.

The greater offensive capacity of the MX would make it possible to hit more targets in the Soviet Union. Such power would match recent Soviet strides that have allegedly increased their protection and therefore their survivability. In short then, the MX would permit us to safeguard enough missiles from a Soviet assault so as to inflict heavy damage on their missiles sites—enough damage to destroy them as a viable superpower.

Opponents of the MX are correct in assuming that the new weapon would drastically change the nature of nuclear war since it would make it possible for one superpower to virtually destroy the other in one blow. Yet, consider the possibility that the Russians might begin development of this secret weapon. Should we allow them to add this massive missile to their arsenal at a time when they have already outstripped us in conventional missile force and ABM's? Rather than promote war, the new missile would assure that the Russians would not be able to destroy us in one blow. With regard to SALT, true our possession of the weapon would retard negotiations on several issues. But, it would give us a strong bargaining position without which we would find ourselves increasingly subservient to the Soviets. And which is more important, the future of SALT or the security of the United States?

In this nuclear era, the MX, though a terrible weapon, is absolutely essential if we are to keep our parity with the Soviets. To allow them to develop increasingly superior weapons and to do nothing ourselves because it would upset our negotiations—negotiations which they have obviously not let interfere with their military plans—would be virtual suicide. The American people and the Congress must realize that the MX is a necessary item for protection, for only through deterrent strength can global wars be avoided.

Letter: Course guide fails?

To the editor:

The words "fail" and "failure" used to describe the condition of our student course guide this year prompt me to say a few words of my own. I would like to call attention to the fact that failure on the part of the course guide committee is just as much a failure of and for the entire student body. It isn't surprising that the CEP reports that Williams students are becoming increasingly more reluctant to take courses which are not in their departments. This matter is past being a minor concern. The faculty and administration are already talking about increasing the number of division requirements for the purpose of restoring the "liberality" to this institution. The course guide, as a positive means of student input into educational policy, could be a means to avoid faculty recourse to coercion.

Let me explain. Now that the College Council has expanded committee membership to virtually anyone who wants to participate, it might be better to entitle it the Course Guide Organization. As such it can benefit from an increase in manpower and then, perhaps, an increase in investigative scope. Right now its potentials are incredible. To begin, in addition to the numerical data offered in the last guides the current one can tap some of the more useful subjective sources of information. For instance, the Guide can focus on departments in conjunction with the courses in order to give students a clearer picture of what it means to be taking one particular course within the larger discipline that a department or division embraces. It can focus on course syllabi and emphasize differences between courses, i.e., textbook vs. documents or survey vs. in depth orientation. It can describe a professor's propensity to lecture and the style and emphasis of those lectures. Innovation should be the essence of the Guide's approach this year. Even more than data return, the Guide could use additional ideas. I suggest that a Guide which sends its members out to interview professors, talk to students, and think will be a considerably more interesting organization to belong to than one full of mere data-chasers.

If the Guide is successful Williams students would fear less to cross department boundaries and professors wouldn't have to coerce new students to take their classes. An atmosphere of cooperation between students and faculty could develop which would make courses at Williams more varied and worthwhile.

The professor's fear of the course guide is not of the publication of course assessments but rather inaccurate and vindictive assessments. There is a difference between a student's private grade and a published statement that a certain professor is a boring person. A wider emphasis will give less dynamic professors a chance to redeem the public image of their course by giving the studied material a plug not allowable in the standard course catalogue and by revealing interesting things about their own pursuits and research.

If the course guide proceeds in this way I cannot help but think that the numerical data input, as a result of increased student interest, will in turn increase. There are very few students that I have talked to who wouldn't be willing to help in some form of serious assessment of their major department. Any success which the Guide attains will spring from the efforts of the students to benefit themselves.

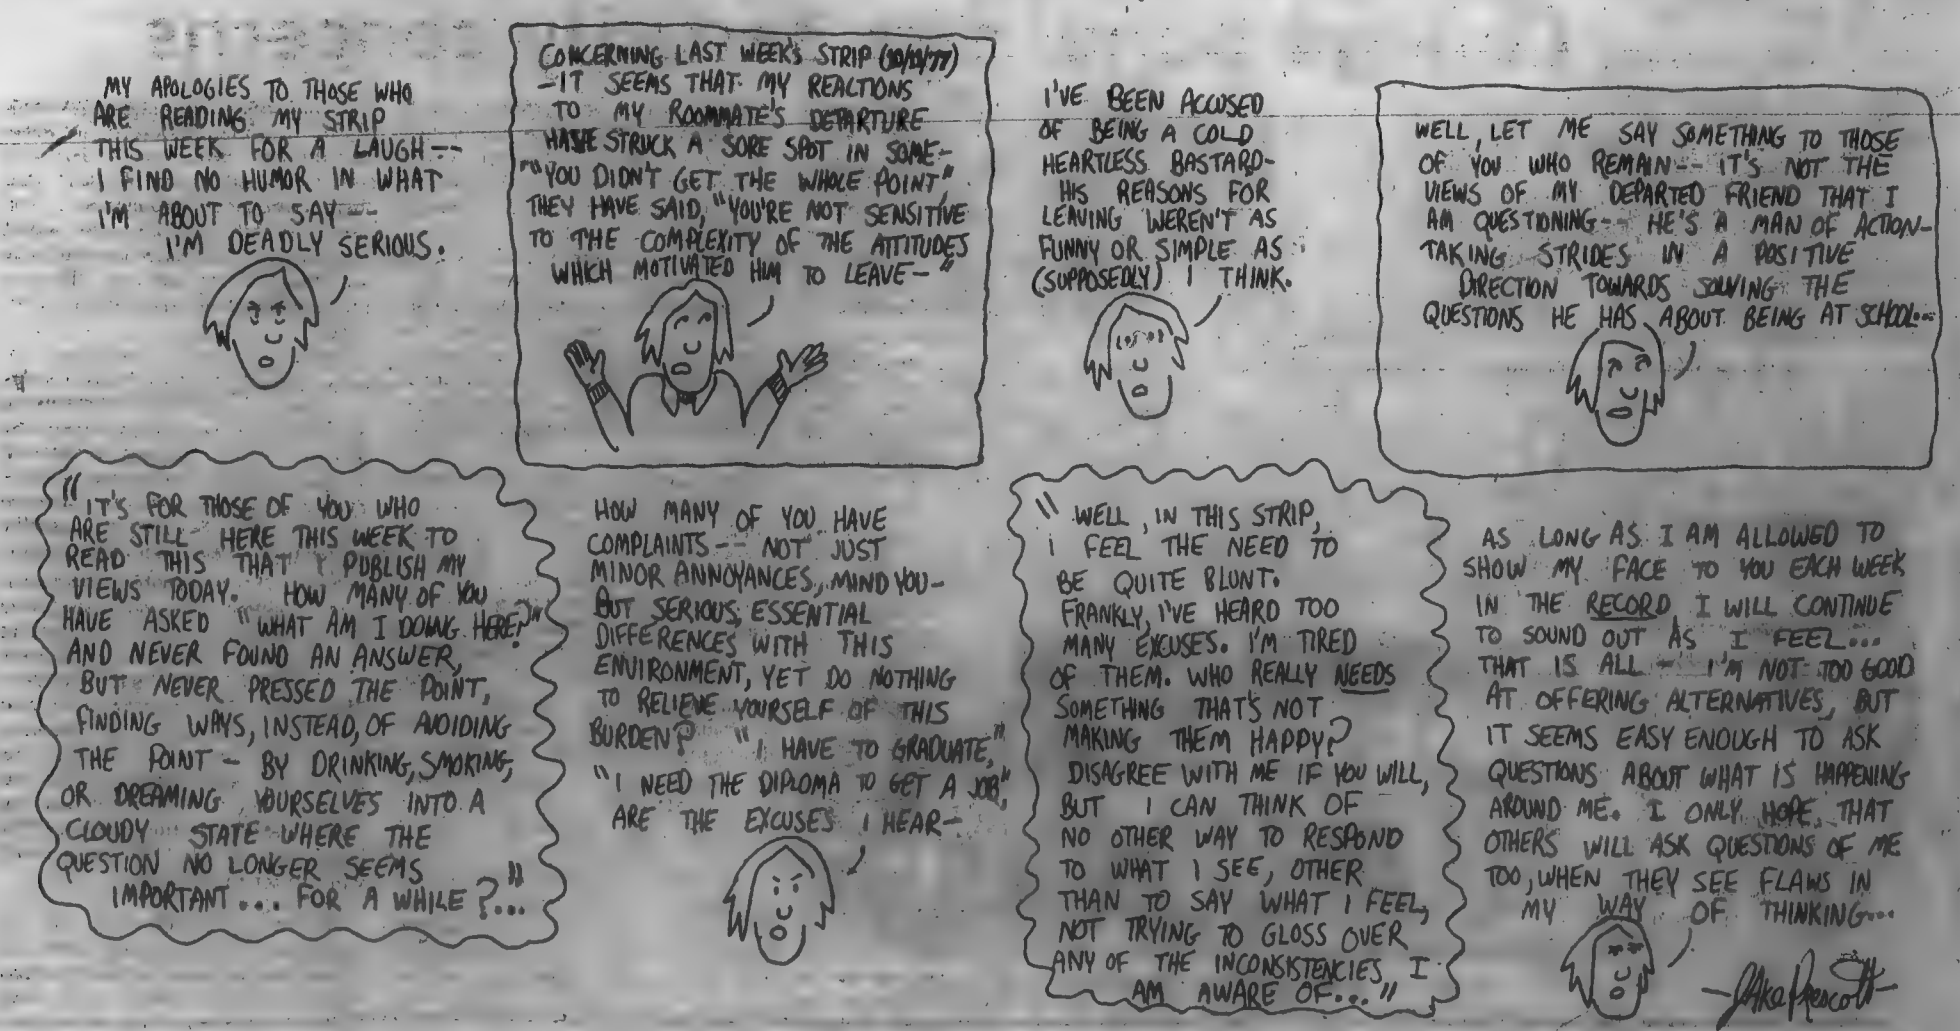
Sincerely,
Peter Friesen
CC Vice President

Letter: Prison pen-pal

To the editor:

I am presently incarcerated here at the Correctional Medical and Reception Center, and since the onset of my incarceration I haven't had the occasion to receive a visit nor a soothing volume of personal mail and as a result I find I am a very lonely man.

I tend to be a rather philosophical individual and I enjoy relating with other people a great deal. I find that to be a rather tedious task within the confines of this drab environment.



My name is Ronald Maxwell; I am 28 years old and a scorpio. My interests include modeling, music, philosophy, and creative writing. I am from Shaker Heights, Ohio. I would like to get to know you, and hope that perhaps we might share an idea, a smile and perhaps a bit of wisdom.

If you would elect to make the lonely days of a seemingly forgotten man a little brighter, please write to me. I will answer all letters.

Energy group forms

by Christine Ross

To combat high energy bills and to conserve quickly dwindling energy resources College President John W. Chandler announced that an Energy Conservation Committee will study energy use at the College and recommend ways to decrease energy consumption.

Building and Grounds has already taken several large steps toward energy conservation in past years. Classics Professor Charles Fuqua, chairman of the student-faculty committee explained, "Most of the easy things have already been done. However, if we can effect what seems a minimal change in energy use or prevent any growth or creepage in the use of power, it will result in tremendous avoided costs."

The Energy Conservation Committee hopes to decrease energy use after thoroughly analyzing energy consumption at the College, reviewing existing policies and finally, making recommendations for adjustments in energy consumption. These recommendations, which Fuqua projects will be only in preliminary form by the end of the semester, will cover two major areas. First, they will initiate programs to heighten student awareness of the energy problem. Second, they will work with the Physical Facilities Committee presently making recommendations to comply with Massachusetts law requiring access to public buildings by the handicapped to coordinate recommendations for making buildings economize further on energy. They will investigate, according to Fuqua, "whether there are any buildings that are sewers for energy, and if they can be improved."

Fuqua has done energy studies for the College before. Faculty members Hank Art and Lee Drickamer and student members Tom Black '80 and Malinda Bergamini '80 were also chosen for their previous interest in energy conservation. Ross Keller of Food Services and John Holden of Buildings and Grounds join the committee to add the insights of supervisors of agencies which use a large amount of power. Fuqua explained that the committee will be "continuous," both to maintain student awareness and to extend last year's work on a "tremendously big problem."

Jorling returns home

Thomas Jorling, Director of the Center of Environmental Studies on leave of absence, returned to Williamstown last Friday to discuss some of his responsibilities for this year. He presently heads the Office of Water and Hazardous Materials, one of the five major divisions of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Jorling's appointment to this position last year came partially as a result of his efforts for recent legislation concerning environmental issues. He is finding, however, that about 75 per cent of his time must be spent filtering through the red tape characteristic of federal agenices. Only the remaining 25 per cent is actually devoted to practical environmental research.

Still, Jorling is enthusiastic about the work being done by the EPA. One major topic of research concerns the future of our sewage systems. Within his division, methods of disinfecting and recycling sewage water are now under investigation. Studies include disturbances in the water quality below the earth's surface.

Controversies on the subject of pollution controls pose complicated problems for Jorling. Although he supports the preservation of the environment, he must constantly consider the adverse effects of control policies. What should be done about a factory that is at the same time polluting and prospering? If the EPA shuts it down because of its threat to the environment, it must face the subsequent unemployment of the workers. According to Jorling, pollution control laws in the United States seem very lax in comparison to foreign countries.

In forming pollution control policies, the EPA has had to tackle the problem of pricing human lives. They have actually created a graph determining the amount of money that should be spent to save a life. Specific amounts have been suggested as the worth of one man. Jorling stresses that good judgment is more valuable than scientific genius in making these decisions.

Before his appointment to the EPA, Jorling held other positions in Washington, D.C. He served as the Attorney-Advisor for the Solicitor's Office of the Department of the Interior from 1966-68. He spent the following year as the Assistant General Counsel for the Smithsonian Institute. From 1969-72, he worked as the Minority Counsel for the Committee on Public Works in the Senate, which drew up most of the laws now controlling the EPA.

Williams and Bennington join in arts session

by J. S. Sanoff

Only a small student audience assembled in Garfield House last Thursday to sample the current state of college culture at the second Bennington-Williams joint performance. Five poets and two musicians from the two colleges, invited to celebrate here by Mark Truran of Williams and Robin Bowie of Bennington, offered an intriguing evening of generally new art. Jake Raskob, guitar player, entertained with light songs and inventions while the group settled on sofas and drank wine in the dark wood dance hall that was the scene of the event.

Around 8:30 Mark casually introduced the proceedings, and asked one of the visitors to begin. John Dieboll, a lean and serious young man dressed in dark clothes, took the reader's seat in the front of the room. After a pause, he recited in a deliberate voice, occasionally looking up from his text to search his listeners' faces for their reaction. Two of his poems "God Rooted Anger" and "Arjsen to Wander" seem to be allied efforts. Both concern men alone on a journey in rough desolate country: in the first the subject is a farmer hiking through ominously flooded ground one day away from his wife and home, in the second, the narrator apparently an exile or homeless figure half drifts, half is mysteriously "lifted" into "slow migrations" in the mountains of Dorsetshire, England. Another point in common is the sense of ordeal. The farmer is the target of divine "anger" which makes itself manifest in the flooding river, "aimed wildly from hell." His hands will "not be pocketed for days - Nor will they move to touch his wife tonight." In "Arjsen to Wander" the narrator is pulled from his camp bed-roll by unattached hands that steal his "heart or my heart" and hid it - beneath the summit of West Mountain." His poetry is of the modern style. The situations are unexplained, actions are fragmentary and uncaused. Its images are often in the surrealist vein, with trees seen as made of bones a common vision. The impulse is toward obscurity. The general lack of sonorous verse is, however, partly made up for in this fine onomatopoetic description of the farmer, "Tucking between cows his boots suck and slip - suck and slip where there aren't banks . . . ." Dieboll's poetry with the separation of its characters, wilderness settings, and elusive meaning might be explained as the artistic venting of a brooding private fury or passion. Perhaps he is telling us of his personal demons. The audience listened.

Mark Truran went next, amiably reading two translations from turn of the century German poets and selections by grade school children. "The End of the World" by Jakob von Hoddis matter-of-factly portrays the modern world gone awry. "From an executive's pointy head, a hat is flying - The steam locomotives are falling off the bridges." "De Profundis" by Georg Trakl is very literally rendered:

It's the stubble field, in which a black rain falls,
It's the brown tree,
that stands alone.
It's the hissing wind,
that circles empty huts.
This evening is sad.

The moon, stars, earth and people figure largely and simply in the work of Truran's child authors. "I see the moon and the stars. - I see clouds and birds . . . I see grandma and grandpa eating lasagna and meatballs and bread," writes Barbara in the third grade. Nearly everyone is attracted to children's work. And clearly Truran is too, but as an adult sharing children's poetry with other adults he makes, perhaps inevitably, their words sound too heavy, too portentous.

Luch McKnee, a slight woman from Old Bennington who was asked by the students to read with them, stood to read her poetic addresses. Her work relies on artful picturesque descriptions. McKnee's "Zoo" is filled with "ribald monkeys," and "great lions, domestic beyond conception." In "Fiesta," "With buzz and zig zag - Bees cut August heat." Both poems have lamentable tag lines, though: "Zoo's" is "We take what we can," in "Fiesta" there is "A slice for everyone." In "The Trespassing" we are again offered attractive words, "a serpentine of yodeling panthers Lighting walls into Byzantine iridescence." Nevertheless "I hungered for more emotion and musicality in her verse.

In his sneakers, Andy Teirstein bounced up to be the middle act of the evening. In unaccompanied voice, he sang an ode to Greenwich village life called "The Final Glass" composed by Dave Van Ronk to be the closing time finale at a bar The Sacred Gin Mill. Then, using guitar, violin and viola he played a bluegrass number, a footapping walking song, "Keep it Clean," and a seaman's ballad to ladies. Teirstein's performance earned him the first applause of the evening. He was a grinning boy in the company of rather more grave men and women.

Peter Filkins was the second of the Williams poets, and he too read a piece by children. In this case it was a poetic list by Nicholas and Nicole of what "You can eat - You can't eat." A section of it reads,

You can eat sap.
But ya can't eat sequins.
Can ya eat quinces?

As I said before, children's verses are fun, but it's hard for grownups to read them well. Of his own poetry "The Midget King" was the most attractive. The image of a miniature king at the end of a long reign and dynasty is well invoked:

Down through the years the fine line of your past has come to this:
two tiny shoes
and a heart which grumbles.

Viewpoint: Thank you Martha Williamson

by David A. Barnes

When I heard that 'Bunny' (as Martha Williamsons' friends call her for no apparent reason) was returning to direct part of the Freshman Revue this fall, I immediately assumed that she had finally finished writing 'Presently Untitled', a musical which was performed last year, and was going to present the completed version as her contribution to this year's production. But Martha surprised us once again with 'The Regulars', an hour musical about lonely people in a crazy singles bar, or was it about crazy people in a lonely singles bar? In any case, it was an interesting show that had an ending of its very own. It was the fifth revue that Martha was involved with, and the third musical which she wrote with that short, bearded piano player, Marc (with a C) Lichtman. The beauty of working in a Williamson show is that she has a great amount of consideration for her cast. She knows how easy it is for an actor to get bogged down with a vast script so Martha staggers her distribution of lines; the beginning of a speech is given to the actor in the first few weeks of rehearsal, and sometime shortly before opening night the remainder of the lines are handed out. This revolutionary approach to directing leaves a great deal of time to the development and perfection of one's character through improvisation, a device which Martha values highly, and depends upon heavily. Another aspect of Martha's involvement with the stage is that she was always eager to give those who had never performed before a chance to get in front of an audience and to make complete fools of themselves. Some have never forgiven her for this, but others, like myself, owe their entire acting careers to it. More than anything else, Martha Williamson has been responsible for making today's theatre misfits into tomorrow's theatre misfits, in some cases she has even been known to make today's stars, tomorrow's misfits.

Well, this weekend an era came to an end as Martha made her second and final (?) farewell in a cabaret entitled, 'Wine, Women, and Song'. The wine was twenty-five cents but the women were worth a million as Martha and Gwen Nichols gave a grand performance. The songs ranged from standards, to Sodheim, to Lichtman-Williamson originals, and to an audience participation version of 'Day by Day' which closed the show after two encores. A good time was had by all—thanks Martha, for everything. Love, Christian Jason - Jake Porter - David.

McLean, Lankford impress crowd

Singer-songwriter Don McLean entertained 850 people with his musical artistry at Chapin Hall last Friday night. McLean mixed old favorites such as "American Pie," "Vincent," "And I Love You So," and "Dreidel" with new material from his recently-released eighth album. Though McLean's performance indicated that his musicianship and song-writing are of rather mediocre quality, his ability to captivate the audience and incorporate them into his set substantiated McLean's reputation as a first-rate entertainer.

Scott Lankford '80 opened the show with a well-paced 30-minute set, and almost upstaged McLean. Lankford, a popular attraction at coffeehouses, was in complete control of the crowd from the moment he stepped on stage. He blended humorous pieces such as the "Vassar Hygiene Song" with standards like "Classical Gas," "Circle Song" and the "Theme from Beverly Hillbillies."

All in all, the McLean-Lankford bill was an entertaining evening of mellow music.

Financially, the concert was a major success. Orginally budgeted to lose $1600, the actual loss was estimated at $700. In addition, the concert was a success in that it catered to often-ignored non-rock fans.

The king is regarded as quite queer by his subjects, and his courtiers complain idly. We expect to find that privately the half-mad potentate nourishes a heartbroken ideal or some lost dream. Instead, we learn that he is merely "indifferent" and intends to cling to power until overthrown. Perhaps this fantasy is all too factual?

Marylou Meriam read the best original work of the evening. In a mythological piece about Arethusa a forest huntress she creates a tender image; Arethusa "slept alone - In thickets where deer had matted the grass - Leaving it plush, rounded by their ponderous bulk." Two poems which lack such visual richness, but are nevertheless full of sophistocated observations of the development and dissolution of a love affair are "Facts About Romance" and its companion piece "More Facts About Romance." The second poem's first stanza finds the affair at contradictory equilibrium:

No, more epiphanies are not Having reached balance, bloomed
Being fragrant, lush, yet unripe.

This situation of limited contentment is then upset on the day "that tree trunk - swayed to the roots." Meriam's conclusion is that their alliance is ended by "wanting more." In her poems, Meriam does things well, but separately. If she could combine imagery without knowing precision in matters of love, it would be a potent advance.

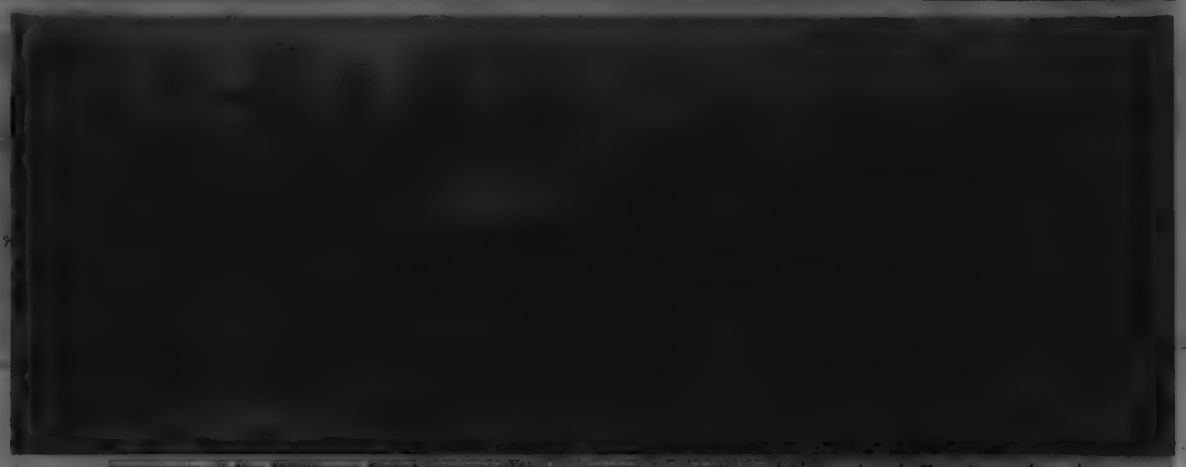
Netwomen place eighth at New England's

by Dana Bash



Ask any successful coach from Woody Hayes to Walter Matthau (Bad News Bears), what one of the toughest things to do in sports is, and he's likely to respond "defending any championship you've won." Some of the women's tennis team found out how true that is this weekend, as the defending champions, lacking the strength that won the title last year, fought to an eighth place finish out of the forty-two teams competing for the New England Tournament championship won Sunday by Dartmouth.

Assessing Williams performance, coach Sue Teng was pleased, saying "we went as far in the tournament as we could have hoped." The tournament format allowed for two singles and two doubles entries from each team, and all the Eph's entrants played about as well as they are capable.

In first round singles action, captain Laura Carson lost a heartbreaking decision, as Springfield's Robin Rock, the ninth seed and a nemesis Carson had scored a dual match victory over, captured a third set tiebreaker to advance. Entering the consolation tournament, Carson moved through to the semi-finals before she was upended.

Becky Chase almost pulled off a great upset in the second round, as she battled Trinity's No. one and the third seed in the tourney, Wendy Jennings, through three sets before faltering in a great effort.

Both of the Eph's doubles teams advanced to the round of sixteen by winning two matches before being knocked off. Amy Demorest and Sally Kruse whipped a good UConn team in the second round, then found the going tougher as they fell to a duo from UMass. The combination of Tradie Broeke and Sherry Willcox, teamed for the first time, had a good tournament, eventually losing to a Middlebury duo.

Women set school records, X-C team places 4th in New England's Cyane Gresham cut more than sixty seconds off her best three mile time Sunday as she led Williams to an impressive fourth place finish among 25 teams at the New England Women's Cross Country Championships.

Gresham, who led the pack after the first third of a mile, finished thirteenth behind the fastest group of runners ever to participate in the championships. Her time of 17:54 was the first sub-18-minute clocking for any Williams runner. She trailed the winner by little more than a minute.

"Three years ago, the winner of the New Englands won the event with an 18:30," coach Bud Fisher commented. "This year, three of our runners were below that. It's amazing how the competition has improved in such a short time. It's incredible."

Michele Culsforth was the second Williams finisher in 13th, as she also ran to a personal record at 18:10. Trish Beckwith, Lisa Kirschner and Marty Epstein rounded out the team effort with excellent races and 29th, 35th, and 36th places of 250 starters, respectively. Williams held onto a strong lead over nemesis UVt, but could not manage to challenge Harvard, UMass or Middlebury, who finished 1-2-3.

Next Wednesday, the team will come up against Wesleyan and Amherst in a somewhat anti-climactic Little Three Championship Meet. According to Fisher, "if we show up, we will most likely win."

Tufts hands Ephs third home defeat

the game, a youthful re-creation of a pudgy Sonny Jurgensen named Dennis Works was inserted into the Tufts lineup. And he managed to hang onto the ball for enough of the second half to prevent Williams from mounting an offensive surge.

Tailback Mike Band, who rushed for 108 yards on 41 carries (show me someone who can't get 100 yards on 41 carries an I'll show you Izzy Lang), carried the ball on 22 of Tufts' last 26 plays and helped seal the second win over Williams in as many years.

A Whelan rainmaker down the sideline to McCormick made things exciting, but the clock ran down. Aside from Whelan's throwing, Nuzzolese was the prime Williams offensive weapon, with 60 yards on 16 carries.

Runners now 10-0

Purple wave wins two tri-meets

by Frank Carr

The Williams cross-country runners swept the first three places in last Wednesday's match scoring 24 points, with Coast Guard in second at 41 and WPI third at 63. Joe Kolb negotiated the 4.8 mile Coast Guard course in 23:07 for first place, while Frank Carr posted a time of 23:18 to finish second. Tom Schreck outkicked runners from WPI and CG in the last 100 meters and clocked 23:32 to cap off the sweep. The Ephmen locked up the victory with senior Dan Sullivan in eighth place and freshman Phil Darrow, in his first varsity race, showing superb form with a tenth place effort.

Kolb and Carr continued to dominate the New England cross country circuit with another 1-2 performance against MIT-Tufts Saturday. It was certainly a day for seniors, as Sullivan followed Kolb and Carr for a 1-2-3 loss of '78 performance. The Williams harriers scored a low 18 points for the tri-meet victory, followed by MIT with 50 and Tufts at the rear with 63.

At the start, Barry Bayus of MIT took the lead with Kolb on his left and Carr alone in third. Just before three miles, Kolb passed Bayus and just after three miles Carr did the same. Kolb lengthened his lead over the remaining part of the course and coasted into the winner's circle with a 25:13 clocking for the five mile course. Carr sprinted into the runner-up spot at 25:26 and Sullivan followed twenty seconds later.

The purple flood continued with super frosh Phil Darrow blasting down the final half-mile stretch for a 25:54 clocking and fifth place, while sophomores Mike Behrman and Garrick Leonard finished 7th and 8th with times of 26:11 and 26:20.

Junior Tom Schreck had an off day on the Franklin Park course and finished 16th, while Dave Breuer rounded out the varsity field in 24th place.

The junior varsity squad, now 4-0, clobbered the Boston opponents by similar scores, despite a wrong turn by three of its top runners. The Ephmen fought to gain back the lost yardage and although a Tufts runner won the contest, a trio of purple cows captured second through fourth and helped bring the squad to a 24 point victory. MIT followed in second with 53 and Tufts was last again with 61 points.

Hans Geisecke (16:55), Steve St. Clair (16:57) and Larry Wu (16:59) combined for the sweep and Rusty Anderson split a pair of MIT harriers for sixth place at 17:11. Jon Miller traversed the 3.1 mile course in 17:30 for ninth place and John McCammond, who fell way back after that unfortunate wrong turn, followed in tenth with a 17:31 clocking. Frosh burgers Pat Dobson (17:37) and Ned Collins (17:41) both finished ahead of Tufts second man in 11th and 12th respectively.

Rounding out a spectacular J.V. effort were Dan Riley in 14th (17:56), Bob Tyler in 22nd (19:20) and Erik Oline finishing in 26th at 21:28.

The Women's Varsity volleyball team is 14-1 in their second season. Saturday they won a tri-meet which included Bridgeport, a PE majors' bastion. (Johnson)

Volleyball sports 14-1 record

The women's varsity volleyball team boasts a 14-1 record thus far with a game against Russell Sage remaining. Coached by Sue Hudson-Hamblin and captained by senior Leslie Ferguson, the team has played with remarkable consistency and ability. A large part of its success is due to the influx of talented freshman players both on the varsity and J.V. levels.

Cathy Gernert is an excellent setter. Other starting varsity freshmen are hard-spiking Sue Gilmore and Laurene Von Klan. Rounding out the remaining varsity starters are Ferguson, junior Sue Jacquin, who has been with the team since its beginning, and sophomore Lisa Mardier.

The team's winning record is also due to the depth and strength of its bench. Sue Laidlaw's height is valuable in blocking while fellow sophomore Karen Dold contributes to the offensive end of the game with her hard-driving serves. Another freshman, Rachel Aliber, gives the setting department a competent back-up.

The J.V.'s 1-3 record does not really give a good indication of the team's ability. Most of the matches have gone the full three games with Williams coming up on the short end of the stick. Co-captained by junior Manette Jen and sophomore De-De Plantier, the team has been constantly improving, exhibiting increasing unity. Again, freshman players have been an asset.

Ann Holm's setting ability, along with Debbie Hurtt's strong serving and Evelyn Melher's all-around play, have kept the J.V. matches extremely close. Laurie Ingersoll, probably the next varsity setter and Pam George, a good spiker and server, provide the team with stability. Juniors Michele Johnson and Lyn Paquette have improved immensely over the course of the season and combined with the formidable serving of Dana Mulvaney, make a solid, consistent trio. Another sophomore, Lucy Buchen, was sidelined with an early ankle injury but will be back on the squad in time for the next game.

The varsity's only loss came on the first day of the season against a strong Springfield College team. In its subsequent matches, the varsity has virtually annihilated its opponents. The vanquished are: UNH, Western New England, AIC, Fitchburg, UVM, Green Mt., Faith, Union, North Adams, Albany, and Mr. Holyoke. If the varsity maintains its nearly unblemished record, it is quite possible the team will qualify for the MAIAW tournament November 12-13 at Salem State.

3 boats make Charles top 10

The Williams crew travelled to Boston over the weekend and placed boats in the top ten in three categories at the prestigious Head of the Charles race. The winding, three mile Charles River course handled over 3,000 competitors on Sunday, with 40 boats racing in each division.

The women's eight rowed to seventh place in their division with a time of 19:49.3. "It was a great performance," commented coach George Marcus, "we were hoping for the top fifteen—this greatly exceeded our expectations." The women's four also had an excellent race, finishing sixth at 21:00.2 behind four veteran clubs and one college (FIT).

Senior Ken Leghorn glided to a fourth place finish in the novice singles, John Peinert (the men's coach) captured 16th in the lightweight singles, the men's elite eight stroked to 23rd in a 17:04.6 clocking and the men's light four completed the course in 20:28 for 30th place.

Tufts muscles gridders, 9-7

by Tim Layden

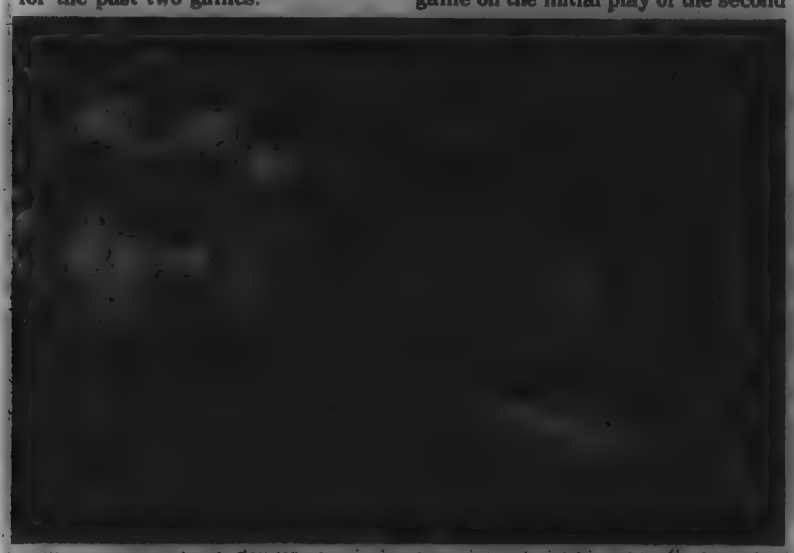
It probably wouldn't come as a great surprise to anyone if Bob Odell opted for an all-road schedule next season, or perhaps began playing home games in North Adams or up at Mt. Greylock High School, anywhere but Weston Field. Saturday's 9-7 loss to Tufts was the Ephs' third straight at home this season, and left Williams at 2-3 on the 1977 season.

The Purple have now suffered back-to-back two-point defeats. Last week it was a field goal attempt which came heartbreakingly close, this week it was two punt snaps which went astray, and resulted in all nine of Tufts points.

It seems unfortunate enough that the past two losses have been nail biting-ly close, but it leaves an even queasier feeling in the pit of one's stomach when the two players most critically involved in the final decisions are two of the most unselfish and dedicated individuals on the squad.

Last week, spirited split end Ken Hollingsworth was typically super all afternoon, but his potential game-winning field goal bounced off the right upright. And with tri-captain Pete Tuttle out with an ankle injury, sophomore halfback Dave Massucco was forced into duty snapping punts, for the past two games.

Massucco, son of the WRI mentor, is a hard-working halfback, who catches passes, blocks, and runs with the football equally well. Two of his snaps Saturday sailed over Greg McAleenan's head, one left the visitors on the three-yard-line, the other went through the end zone for the decisive safety. "He's come out here every day and practiced it," said Odell of Massucco, "there's not a more conscientious kid on the team." It's tough enough to lose two straight by such tiny margins, but when such class people as Ken Hollingsworth and Dave Massucco are branded with goats' horns, defeat becomes almost unbearable.



The story behind the headlines Saturday was a big, and "not as slow as everybody thought" Tufts front defensive line. "Their big men up front just teed off on our offensive line, and pretty much dominated us," explained Odell. Bill Whelan managed 124 yards on eleven completions, but was under strong pressure all day long.

A facemask penalty against Tufts, while attempting to wrestle Gus Nuzzolese to the ground (apparently the only way to stop the big sophomore) and a Herb McCormick "reach-for-the-sky" catch set up the first and only Williams score of the game on the initial play of the second quarter. Whelan flipped a 24-yard scoring strike to Massucco on a post pattern through the middle of the Tufts defense. Hollingsworth booted his tenth PAT without a miss for a 7-0 Williams lead.

Tufts found itself mired in a simple, ineffective offense throughout the first half, as the makeshift Eph front three of Brian Benedict, Colin Hart, and Dan Towle throttled the Jumbo running game. The invaders however, pounced on the first errant snap at the Williams three, and Mike Band scored from the two with 1:25 left in the first half.

Women's swim team swamps Middlebury

Williams swept eight of fourteen events and one college record fell Friday night as the women's swim team trounced Middlebury in its opening meet, 85-37.

Co-captains Nina Murphy, and Anne Youngling, sophomore Keron Walker, and freshmen Molly Murphy and Katherine Pearsall accounted for the majority of Williams points. The team of N. Murphy, Walker, Joanna Monroe, and Youngling combined to run away with the 200 Medley Relay, while Murphy was back in the pool after ten minutes to take first in the 200 IM and a second in the 500 Freestyle later in the meet.

Pearsall and Molly Murphy swept all four of the freestyle events between them, with Pearsall first in the 200 and 500 events and Murphy winning the 50 and 100. Murphy and another freshman, Linda Reed were also members of the prevailing 400 Freestyle Relay with Walker and Youngling.

Walker trimmed a tenth of a second off her own college record in the 50 Fly with a 28.4. Along with performances in the two relay events, she managed a second in the 100 backstroke.

Veterans Carol Buck and Monroe sparkled in the fly events, while Hilary Hodgeson came from behind to nip a Middlebury opponent for first in the 100 breaststroke. Freshman Anne Strook took second in the diving event after a balk cost her an almost certain victory.

The Ephwomen will face Mt. Holyoke and Wellesley in their next meet on November 4.

Water polo bows to B.C., beats UNH

The Williams water polo team split a pair of games during last weekend's tournament at Muir Pool. Boston College, ranked third in Eastern United States play, poured in six second period goals to defeat the Ephs 12-4 Friday night. Scoring for Williams against the Terriers were Mike Feltes, Brian McDermott, Gordon Cliff, and Bob Kraus. Even though they lost the game, the Ephmen demonstrated fine passing between their forwards coupled with a strong defensive effort in holding B.C. to 12 goals.

Led by Mark Roche's 6 goals, Williams came back to crush a tired UNH squad Saturday morning, 28-4. Sporting balanced scoring and a well coordinated passing attack, the Ephs struck early and often in upping their conference mark to 2-3. According to player Mike Feltes, "with the defense putting in a strong effort throughout the tournament, the forwards were able to display better ball control than in the past."

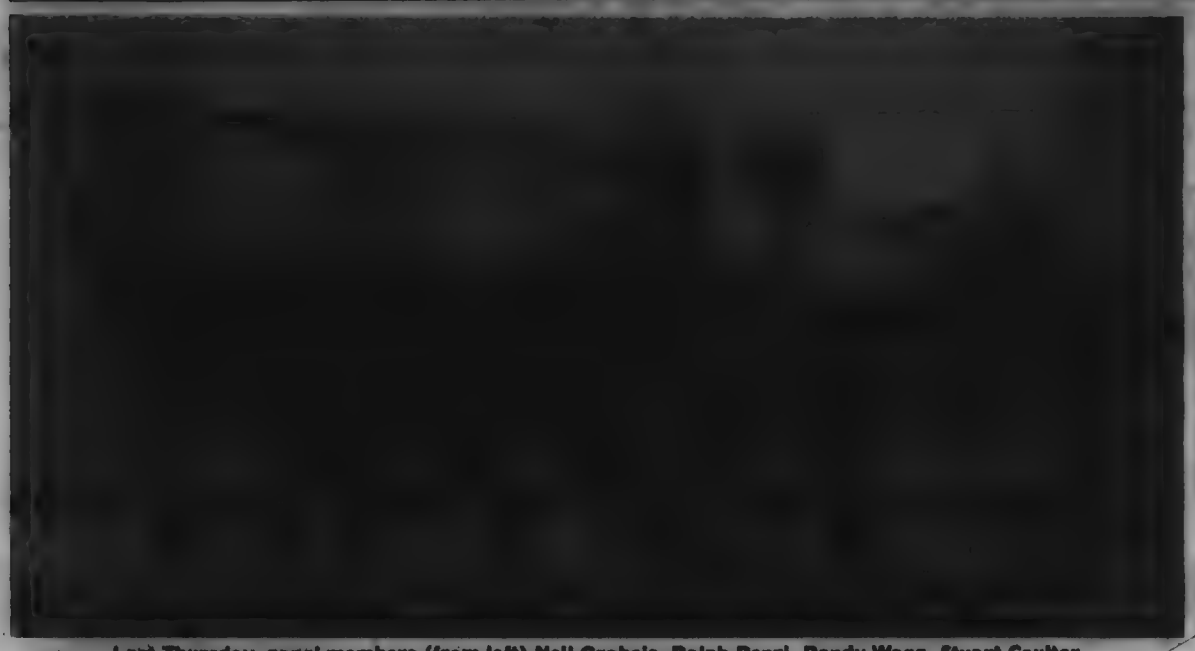
In addition to the fine effort by Roche, Feltes threw in five tallies and Gordon Cliff four while Mike Murphy, Bob Kraus and Glen Shannon got three apiece and Guy Hoelzer and Brian McDermott each scored twice. Led by John Trapp, the defensive corps of Keith Berryhill, Sandy Pike, Ben Gruder and Bill Baldiga showed much improvement in tuning up for the upcoming championship tournament.

Following two weeks off, the Eph polomen will travel to the University of Connecticut for the New England Championships of the weekend of November 4 and 5.

Reynolds named Athlete of the Week

Sara Reynolds, halfback on the women's soccer team has been selected as the Record Athlete of the Week following her hat trick in the Tufts game last weekend. Reynolds' three goals drove the Ephs to a 7-1 win over the Jumbos and extended the team's record to a perfect 6-0 mark.

"She has been an invaluable player for the team," commented coach Judy Zimicki. "There are only a couple players in our league that can play as well as Sara."



Honorable Mention—Junior cross country runner Cyane Gresham has been awarded an honorable mention this week as she placed 13th in a field of 250 starters at the New England Women's Cross Country Championships. Gresham sliced over a minute off her best three mile time in leading Williams to a fourth place finish in the 25 team meet.

VOL. 91, NO. 16 WILLIAMS COLLEGE NOVEMBER 4, 1977

Council presses for higher Record budget

Following extensive debate Thursday evening, the College Council voted 17 to 5 to reject the Finance Committee's proposed 1977-78 Record grant of $13,000.

As a result of this reversal, the grant will be resubmitted to the Council after further review by the Committee.

Opposition to the $3286 cut in the Record's requested allocation focused on two issues: whose obligation it is to pay for its Commencement issue in June and the validity of the Finance Committee's decision to compel the newspaper to reduce its operating costs by $1000.

By refusing to pay for the Record's Commencement issue, the Committee hoped to make it necessary for the College to absorb the cost of the issue in question. According to Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly, "If we step in and take a firm stand, then the College may have to assume the cost of the June issue." The Record, however, must plan on either not printing a Commencement issue, since no money has been provided for it, or reducing the number of pages in its regular issues in order to save sufficient funds for the June issue.

The Committee's denial of an additional $1000 to compel the Record to economize was termed "arbitrary" by Assistant Dean Eileen Julien, faculty adviser to the Council. "Although I was at the Finance Committee meeting," she said, "I don't understand why $1000 was the perfect amount to cut." Kelly maintained that this reduction would only result in a shrinkage in the size of the Record of only three pages each month. Scott Fenn, Record Editor-in-Chief, pointed out that this would "cut our advertisement revenues," necessitating a further decrease in the size of future issues.

Pique faced a College Council grant reduction of $200. It originally requested $3500 to defray its total expenses of approximately $4700. The Council agreed to supply BackTalk with the full $2400 it requested. Likewise the Gulielmensian received the $9500 that it initially sought. The Boat Club crew will receive $4000 toward its total projected costs of $30,000 for 1977-78. The Outing and Riding Clubs received grants of $3955 and $25 respectively.

Panel sees town-College mutualism

The economic interaction of Williamstown and the College formed the basis of a panel discussion on Thursday, October 27, sponsored by the Williams Independents. While all members of the panel agreed that the College and the town are "inextricably connected," each presented a different perspective on this interrelationship.

Participants in the program, the second in the series "Down from the Ivory Tower," included Neil Grabois, Provost of the College, Ralph Renzi '42, owner of Renzi's Bookstore, speaking as both a merchant and a member of the community, Stuart Coulter '80, student at Williams and resident of Williamstown, and Gordon Winston, Professor of Economics.

The presence of the College creates a definite influx of money into the Williamstown area, through the money spent by the students and by the College itself, according to Grabois. Building contracts, maintenance funds, and employment all help increase the wealth of the region. The number of employees at Williams has grown from 480 in 1964 to about 750 in 1976, an increase that has meant more tax revenues for the town, Grabois said. The College is also a large taxpayer, since it is assessed for all buildings and properties not used directly for educational purposes. The total tax contribution by the College approaches $180,000 a year, according to Grabois. In fact, he added Williams pays more than it is assessed. Grabois pointed out, however, that by its beautiful setting and other features, the town helps the College by making it more attractive.

Renzi acknowledged the dependence of the town on the College for both commerce and revenues. He also stressed that cooperation between the College and the town would produce the best results for both. With plans for a new gym that could alter the appearance of Spring Street, it is essential that a joint planning committee study the problem of restructuring the shopping area. Federal grants are a possibility, said Renzi.

Renzi thought that the College has been over-generous toward the town with its facilities. With the recent expansion of the college enrollment, the facilities have become overtaxes, and the town has not had as great access to college properties as it had in the past. Williamstown, which never had any need to build its own facilities, now finds itself in a predicament.

Stuart Coulter '80, however, said that as a resident of the town, he made little use of the college facilities and, in fact, did not realize they were open to town residents. He said he felt that the town and the College often form two distinct social worlds, although they depend on each other economically.

Professor Winston, pulling together the statements of the others on the panel, said that Williamstown and the College form an "incredibly combined and integrated" economy. He said he believes that it would be almost impossible to imagine either the College or the town not drastically different if the other did not exist.

Carter pledges enforcement of '55'

by John Rindlaub

Roadtripping may be half the fun, but President Carter is determined that you won't be able to get there in half the time. CBers might put it this way: "Watch out for the Big Smokey who is shooting for the Double-Nickel."

This highway lingo warns those of us behind the wheel that Carter is determined to enforce the 55 miles per hour speed limit vigorously. (Or "the Double-Nickel." "Smokey" is a state trooper.)

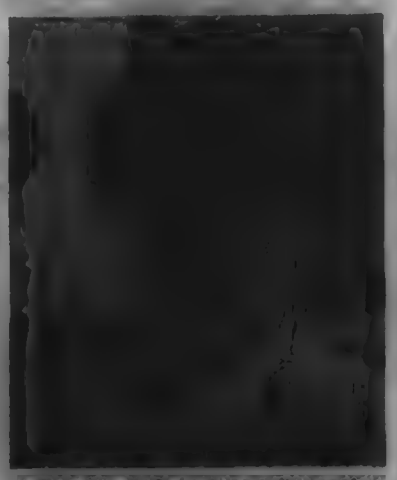
According to an article in The Christian Science Monitor (Tues., Oct. 25) the administration's goal is to have 85 out of every 100 vehicles on the nation's highways traveling below 55 m.p.h. by 1985. Hopefully, we will all have graduated from Williams by then, but the implications of Carter's goal will be felt immediately.

Only 30 per cent of American drivers cruise under the limit on cross-country interstates, according to a recently completed report ordered by President Carter. In accepting the report, The Monitor says the White House sets in motion the following controls against lead-footed college cruisers:

States which are lax in enforcement of 55 m.p.h. speed limits—or those that are stringent—will be punished or rewarded through small amounts of the $7 billion of annual U.S. highway aid.

States prone to a high number of speeders will be asked by the US Department on Transportation (D.O.T.), to divert $30 million in already-authorized safety funds towards beefing up police radar patrols next year. Congress will be asked to approve $30-$50 million a year specifically for the patrols beginning in 1980.

Increased advertising, examples set by drivers complying with the law, and speeches by public officials will try to rally public support for the 55 m.p.h. speed limit.



States ranked

The DOT report ranks states on how well they are complying with the limit. The 10 worst are Wyoming, Connecticut, North Dakota, Maine, New Mexico, Texas, Georgia, Arizona, Utah, and Nevada. The 10 best for the first half of 1977 were New York, New Jersey, Colorado, Louisiana, Idaho, Hawaii, Virginia, Oregon, Minnesota, and Idaho.

According to officials, the number of vehicles going over 60 m.p.h. has been cut in half nationwide since the law went into effect in January, 1974. This trend contributes to about half of the 21 per cent drop in fatalities since the Arab oil embargo. The number of speeding tickets during the same period has nearly doubled.

Average speeds are climbing again, forcing Carter to call for action. So far in 1977, only 10 states have an average speed below 55 m.p.h., compared to 16 in 1976.

If the 85 per cent compliance is achieved, US oil usage would be cut by 2 per cent by 1985, or one-fifth of Carter's goal of a 10 per cent reduction by 1985. Williams roadtrippers might do well to heed the 1976 campaign slogan: "It's a law you can live with." It may take you an hour and a half to get to Skidmore driving under the "Double-Nickel" but you may save more than just gas nickels in the [illegible].

Julian Bond, Georgian state senator, spoke at Chapin October 28. For a closer look at the content of his speech, see the Viewpoint, page 5.

School year change is hypothetical

by Christine Ross

Clarifying recent concern over possible cutback or elimination of Winter Study, Committee on Educational Policy Chairman Gordon Winston explained that the controversy stems from discussions about modifying the school year which are still at a "purely hypothetical" stage.

"The question was raised whether it makes sense for Williams to have a significantly longer school year than other institutions." He continued, "We're curious about the costs and benefits of having a longer school year than most colleges we're competing with."

Winston pointed out, however, that the CEP has no jurisdiction in this matter. His committee can only consider the follow-up question: if we shorten the year, how best can we do it?

"The question of modifying the school year has simply been raised for discussion," he emphasized. "No decisions have been made one way or the other."

However, he asserted that the costs of a longer school year "should not be ignored," as they affect the faculty, the College and the students. Energy bills, loss of free time and loss of a substantial earning period for students are just a few of the costs of maintaining the school year at its present length. These costs should be explored and weighed against their corresponding benefits in order to determine whether the College calendar should be modified.

Winston emphasized that the length of the school year, and not Winter Study, is under scrutiny. Illustrating this point, he cited a CEP study of last year which gave overwhelming support to WSP as an educationally profitable way to spend a month, given the length of the school year.

Winter Study Committee Chairman William Grant backed this assertion with an assessment of faculty opinion on WSP. "A certain sizeable faction feels it is extremely worthwhile, another sizeable faction has never been very happy with WSP and never will be, and there is a residual who go along with it because it's there." Grant explained, "In the context of the overall Williams curriculum, Winter Study provides a balance."

However, if the year is shortened, a decision which Winston feels would be reached only after a considerable period of study, survey and debate, then the CEP would be asked to recommend various modifications in the calendar. Winston said he feels that in this case, WSP would probably face alteration. He explained, "It seems unlikely that Winter Study would be protected while we cut two weeks off each semester."

If WSP is cut back, Grant said he fears that the quality of the program will suffer. "The present WSP works, but is a very delicately balanced piece of machinery. Any major alteration would destroy this balance, and would eventually lead to its demise."

Drama seminars offered

The Arts department of the Record in conjunction with Professors Graver and Carr of the English Department is offering two brief seminars in the art of writing a drama review. The seminars will include two groups of five students each.

One group will meet with Arthur J. Carr to discuss Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. The other group will meet with Lawrence Graver to discuss Beckett's Waiting for Godot. Each group will meet twice—once before the first production of the play (before November 9 or 10) and once on the Friday November 11 (after the first performance).

The goal of the first meeting is to discuss the nature of critical drama review and its application to the specific play to be reviewed. The students will attend the first performance of the play and will participate in a follow-up discussion. Each participant is expected to write a review; one review from each group will be published. The idea of the program is to increase student understanding and appreciation of the art of drama reviewing as well as giving each student the opportunity to write a critical review.

Green Mountain Race Track may close

Green Mountain Racetrack, in Pownal, Vermont, may close after the season which ended Sunday, according to track officials. Timothy Rooney, a spokesman for the family which owns the track, described the past season as "terrible" and described track losses as "a substantial amount of money."

The track is the only pari-mutual racetrack in Vermont and is owned by the Arthur Rooney family of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. The Rooneys also operate racetracks in Florida, New York and Pennsylvania, in addition to owning the Pittsburgh Steelers of the National Football League.

Sexist Ad

To the editor:

So, The Dean of Beer Suggests All Students Improve Their Reading, Writing, and Punting? Well, Williams Women suggests that The Record have more respect for the women on campus than to run such blatantly sexist advertisements as the Mohawk Beverage Beer spread in the October 21 issue. That ad was an insult to the intelligence of everyone on this campus, but was especially insulting to women. If this is the means The Record chooses to obtain its monies, then perhaps a cutback in the number of issues would not be a bad thing. What woman wants to be subjected to further instances of sexism and exploitation?

We recommend that The Record take a stance on this political issue which is in keeping with the newspaper of a supposedly intelligent, cultured and aware student body.

Williams Women

Passions

To the editor:

Having taken a furtive glance at the new display in the lobby of Sawyer, I now see the truth of that old definition of a library: a place for those who burn with a passion for knowledge. Without too much difficulty I can now envision this scene between a lover and his lass: "What a glorious night! The moon is veiled by clouds, the stars are so close you could embrace them, and the playful breeze sets a man's fancy to notions of love—shall we study at Sawyer?" Actually, it's inconceivable what they're teaching in library science these days.

Bakke & pre-meds

To the editor:

I do not wish to write a letter concerning the intricacies of the Bakke case. Regardless of how the Supreme Court decision goes, it will have major impact on admissions practices of all professional schools. Some of the consequences of the decision may be beneficial and some may be deleterious to the society as a whole. I do, however, want to take exception to the views on the Bakke case expressed by two members of the freshman class, views which appear to be held by a substantial number of premedical students.

The statement that "qualification for medical school should be determined solely by grades, test scores and practical background," is based on the fallacious assumption that the best students make the best doctors. The grading and testing process is unequal of itself. There are wide variations in level of difficulty and in evaluation procedures among courses at this college. There are even greater variations from college to college.

The MCAT examination is the sole attempt at putting all applicants on an equal footing. It is a short answer examination akin to college boards and has not been found to correlate with medical school performance in the past, as it has little in common with diagnostic ability and clinical insight. Finally, "practical experience" usually means working in a laboratory or hospital during the summer, an opportunity which is far more accessible to the offspring of physicians. Such students also benefit unequally from letters of recommendation written by their parental contacts in the medical field.

One should look at the question of admissions in a different light. In any applicant pool to medical school there are far more academically qualified students applying than can be admitted. Naturally some level of academic competence should be required. Generally undergraduate record and motivation are the best indicators of success in the academic aspects of medical education which are the focus of the first 18-24 months of the medical curriculum. The remainder of medical training, i.e. last 2-2-½ years of medical school and 3-5 years of residency, takes place at bedside and in the clinic. It is there that other factors such as emotional stability, powers of observation, insight, intuition, judgment, ability to relate to others, humility, compassion and self-awareness coupled with an ability to use basic medical knowledge distinguish the best physicians from the body mechanics.

The study by the AMA, which indicated that 85 per cent of minority admissions students do not return to urban centers for private practice, is cited by the authors of the Bakke letter as proof of the fact that minority admissions have not produced desired results. On the contrary, there is a surplus of physicians in private urban specialty practices (more psychiatrists in Boston than in all of Great Britain, for instance) and a dearth of primary care physicians in rural settings and in public service.

Only one-third of Americans have medical insurance and adequate resources to pay for routine care; approximately one-third are Medicaid eligible and the remaining one-third have very minimal coverage and resources or no coverage at all. It does no good for a doctor, minority or otherwise, to set up a private practice in an inner city ghetto or an impoverished rural area where no one can afford to use his-her services. Although Blacks have a far higher rate of high blood pressure and heart attacks than Whites, a cardiologist in private practice charging the going rate of $50 per visit cannot make a living in Harlem but can on the upper Eastside!

If a physician wants to help to make medical care available to minorities, he-she should join a neighborhood health center, a store-front clinic, the staff of a university medical center, of a city hospital, a health maintenance organization, or the Public Health Service at comparatively modest salary. Apparently that is what 85 per cent of minority students do, and it is precisely what is needed until we as a nation are willing to address the problem more broadly with some form of guaranteed health coverage for all our people.

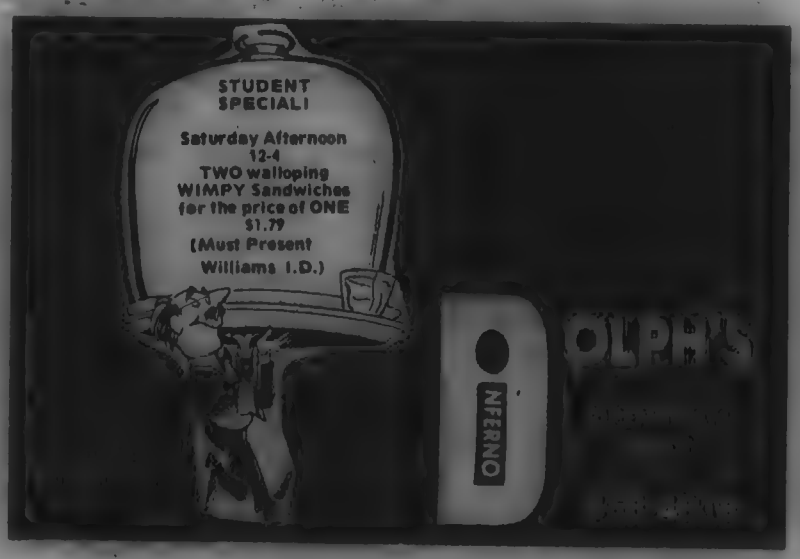
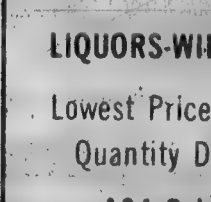
Sports-yellow tone



To the editor:



Even as a loyal Eph fan, I have to protest Tim Layden's October 21 preview of the Tufts football game. His yellow journalism displayed an arrogant condescension that is intolerable. The tone of the article, including quotes from Coach Odell, was offensive. No one will deny the fine quality of a Williams education, but this hardly entitles a Williams reporter to deride another college with low blows and cheap shots. Whatever happened to the Shakespearean and Melvillean tradition of elevating the stature of the opponent to glorify the hero's struggle?

Viewpoint: Bond debates racial problems, goals

The Problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the color line—the relation of the darker to the lighter races of men in Asia and Africans in America and the islands of the sea.
The Souls of Black Folk
W. E. Du Bois

by Charles F. Sanders

Julian Bond came to Williamstown last Monday night and gave the community a speech that had deep implications. In his usual style of deliverance, Bond was direct, subtle, and captivating. He spoke of current and past events in a light that many of us have never seen or turn away from.

Bond talked about the gains that blacks and other minorities had made in the 1950's and 1960's: the freedom to sit and ride where they wish, the right to vote, and the right to attend integrated schools. He emphasized that blacks were given the equality and rights that were naturally accorded to all Americans when our democratic nation was conceived, except then blacks were not considered Americans but as either property or three-fifths of a man. Bond then discussed how the gains made either do not exist now or have taken adverse forms. The Vietnam War was one catalyst in that it absorbed money that might have gone to programs beneficial to minorities such as the Community Action Program or to the Office of Equal Opportunity. With the last of Vietnam came eight years of "callousness in the Capitol and carelessness to the people," the Republican era in the White House. In this era, Bond said we had a "30 per cent national pullback in social services," elimination and cutbacks in areas like Model Cities and CAP programs, and student loans.

Despite the fact that we now have a Democratic administration in the White House, Bond seems to feel that the aggressive state of blacks and all of America is going to continue. Bond criticized Carter for waiting until the fall of his first year to attempt to think seriously about an "urban policy"; his inability to come up with a solid, viable welfare program; and for not showing any "direction" in helping to solve these problem areas.

Bond was justified in his criticism of the Carter administration, especially when taking into account the way Carter attained office. Bond cited the facts that 91 per cent of the black electorate voted for Carter, giving him a margin of victory, in thirteen states which "accounted for 210 of 270 electoral votes needed to win." The people and regions most instrumental in electing Carter are receiving the least service from him. However, I feel that people may have misinterpreted Bond's statement that "Black Americans achieved the height of their political maturity," by electing Carter himself. It was the solidarity and the instrumental role of Black American's voting power that promoted Bond's statement.

Bond also addressed the Bakke case saying the case could enable "friend and foe to get together for legal action" to curtail the black people's chances of advancement. Bond feels there are probably "racially motivated quota systems" in the admissions process but only as a result of a "racially motivated" society. He feels the Bakke issue is not one of affirmative action but a "racial one".

Finding his speech, Bond stated what he feels is needed to solve our ever-present problems:

1. an income and wealth redistribution
2. real full employment and a negative income tax
3. a complete, viable educational system
4. free or low-cost health care financed by the U.S. Treasury, not private insurance companies
5. governmental ownership of vital services.

Despite Bond's optimism, certain statements cannot be looked favorably upon such as: "blacks are integrated by law, segregated by fact;" "blacks have seen opposite ends of the seesaw since Lincoln's 1863 Emancipation Proclamation", and blacks are the "permanent underclass." Bond said that situations will change through "time, thought and organization," but just how long will it take, will it be for the better, and is it worth it?

In his criticisms of the civil and human rights movements of the 60's, Bond seemed to be analyzing the situation from a distance. Whatever the shortcomings of these movements, Bond is also personally responsible and accountable. His activities have involved him too deep into these sensitive areas, and now is not the time for him to become disengaged.

Bond also left us thinking, "What lies in the future for this prominent state Senator from Georgia?" He lost the bid to become Executive Director of the NAACP. Running for the mayoralty of Atlanta would be political suicide until Maynard Jackson steps down. What is possible is Bond's running for U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young's former congressional seat, and maybe afterwards seeking to live in a little white house in the heart of Washington, D.C. At this time we must realize that Julian Bond is a politician first, one that America needs, and a leader second.

Firemen answer 100 calls every year

by John Setear

"I want to be a fireman." To what many children respond to the patronizing question, "And what do you want to be when you grow up, dear?" Although many of us have changed our answer by now, those who still entertain thoughts of heroic deeds will be happy to know there exists a volunteer fire department in Williamstown.

Located on Water Street, the department possesses four trucks, ranging in year of make from 1949 to a decade later. A 100-ft. aerial ladder truck will soon join the force. The department is supported by a tax assessment of $2.00 per $1,000 real estate value.

The Williamstown Fire Department consists of one full-time employee, Mr. Gordon Noble, and 35 volunteers who are paid by the hour. "I answer the phone, drive the first truck, and try to keep the place clean," Noble said. Chief McGowan, head of the department for twenty-seven years, said that the number of men volunteering has declined in recent years.

"We used to have a waiting list of people who wanted to join," he said. "But as times change, people change as well," he continued, "and some young fellows aren't so interested anymore."

One "young fellow" who is interested feels that firefighting is a rewarding pursuit. "I enjoy it, I really do," said Bronson Fargo '79. Although he has been injured several times, Fargo manages to retain his perspective. When asked to compare the Williams department and others he had worked for, Fargo replied, "Every other fire station I've been in has had a beer machine."

Getting men from their jobs or beds to the fire requires a communications system of suitable reliability. Besides using radios, there is a horn—which can be heard whenever one is trying to sleep before an exam—to summon the firefighters. There are about 100 alarm calls each year, with actual fires occurring in about 80 cases.

One might think that the number of men responding to each call would be subject to wide variation, but McGowan did not feel it was a serious problem. "The turnout is better at night or on weekends when people aren't at their regular jobs," he said, "but we usually get 75 per cent of the men out on a good day."

The fire station itself is small but clean, with the trucks gleaming their proverbial red. (There is no tail-wagging dalmation, however.) Gazing calmly at the rows of jackets and helmets and boots neatly lined up against the wall, it is difficult to imagine the noise and confusion surrounding an actual alarm.

It is even harder to reconcile the image of a small-town department with the TV-inspired images of continuously busy urban firemen. But whether in a "village beautiful" or the big city, firefighting is dangerous.

"I don't think anyone's been badly hurt in the last eight or ten years," said McGowan. "I hope it never happens," he continued, "but you never know in this business."

Music in the Round

Trio featured at Thompson

by Vernon Fritch

The Third Concert of Music in the Round's 1977-78 chamber music series will feature post-Romantic Era compositions by Johannes Brahms, Bela Bartok, and Dimitri Shostakovich. It is scheduled for Friday evening, November 4, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Brahms composed his Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Opus 115, in the summer of 1891. It is the last of the 24 chamber music works. Brahms wrote over a period of more than forty years.

The Clarinet Quintet (made up of one clarinet, two violins, one viola and one violoncello) contains four movements: 1, Allegro, 2, Adagio, 3, Andantino and Presto, and 4, Theme and Variations plus Coda. The two sections of the third movement relate to each other thematically, although in contrasting tempos. The fourth movement consists of an initial theme and its development through five symmetrically balanced variations. The Coda combines the main themes of the first and fourth movements, thus giving the entire composition a cyclic finality.

Although Brahms intended the clarinet to function as one of five equal individuals in the Quintet, he made full use of the technical and tonal possibilities of the woodwind instrument. In his book Chamber Music, Homer Ulrich describes Brahms' Opus 115 as "exquisitely retrained" and "noble, yet lyrically melodius".

Violinists Julius and Lisa Hegyi, Violist Susan St. Amour, Cellist Douglas Moore and Clarinetist Susan Hohenberg, will combine to render the Quintet.

Bela Bartok's Violin and Piano Sonata No. 1 was composed in 1921. Although designated as being in C sharp minor, it roams freely through tonalities and dissonances which are hard to place in any one key. In the second of three movements, Bartok combined C natural in the violin with a simultaneous C Sharp tonality in the piano, F sharp in one instrument with F natural in the other, and so on.

The first movement possesses a sonata-allegro form, although it is less distinct than those of the Classicists like Mozart and early Beethoven. The middle movement is ternary in structure, while the finale incorporates a rondo. There is little exchange of thematic material between violin and piano during the progress of the work. Bartok was more intent on producing interesting new, and often dissonant sonorities, than on concerning himself with details of harmonic progression. Julius and Lisa Hegyi will perform this Sonata on violin and piano, respectively.

Dimitri Shostakovich's second work for violin, violoncello and piano, is also a 20th century work. Shostakovich composed the E Minor Piano Trio, Opus 67, in memory of a deceased friend, musicologist Ivan Sollerinsky. The Trio's early foreboding gloom reflects the still-raging World War II, but resolves into a noble, grand finale. Punctuated by occasional sharp dissonances and tonality outside of any single key signature, the Trio as a whole is more stable and harmonically consonant than the above-mentioned Bartok Sonata. The Trio's four movements are: 1, Andante Moderato, 2, Scherzo, 3, Largo, and 4, Allegretto. Hegyi, Moore and Joseph (pianist) will render the E minor Trio.

The Williams Trio, Douglas Moore, cello, Charles Joseph, piano, and Julius Hegyi, violin, will play in the Music in the Round chamber music concert on Friday, November 4, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel, Williamstown.

Coffeehouse

This Saturday evening from 9-12 Williams Coffeehouse presents John Danduran and Chris Kleeman playing traditional, original and funky favorites. Also appearing with them will be Michelle Cutsforth. As always, admission is free.

Dakan to give song recital

TERRY DAKAN, a special student at Williams, will give a free, public song recital on Monday, November 7, at 4:30 p.m. in the lounge of Weston Language Center. She will be assisted at the piano by Stephen Dankner, Assistant Professor in the Williams Music Department, which is sponsoring the event.

The program will contain selections by Brahms, Verdi, Brel, Meredith Willson, Comden & Green, Leonard Bernstein, Jule Styne, and Bob Merrill, as well as social satire pieces whose origins are obscure. This "very mixed bag" is an attempt to tie together the wide variety of musical styles Dakan has worked with in the past years.

Dakan comes to Williams from Wauwatosa, Wisconsin via New York City, where she worked for ten years as a singer-comedienne. In television she was featured on the Merv Griffin, Garry Moore, and Ed Sullivan shows and, for a season, as lead comedienne on the David Frost Revue. Most recently, she starred in the television movie "Luv Boat."

In theatre Dakan followed the musical comedy vein. Some of the roles she played in stock and regional theatre were Agnes Gooch in "Mame," Winifred in "Once Upon a Mattress," Ella in "The Bells are Ringing," and Polly Peachum in "Threepenny Opera." On Broadway, she stood by and went on for Mimi Hines in the starring role of "Funny Girl." She explored political and social satire as a member of the revue cast of Julius Monk's "Four in Hand" and has been in one movie, "Up the Sandbox." Finally, adds Dakan, "Least memorable but most lucrative were over forty television commercials, selling everything from toilet bowl cleaner to McDonald's Hamburgers."

Brooks forces humor in 'Saddles'

Blazing Saddles will be shown tonight in Bronfman Auditorium at 7 and 9:30. Admission is $1.

by Dan Frazier

No one will walk away from Blazing Saddles muttering okays all the way to Colonial. When faced with the sheer brazen effrontery of a cutup like Mel Brooks, only two responses are possible: crazed, helpless cackling or a mildly amused disapprobation—both embarrassing.

All movies ask a certain commitment of us. That's in the nature of artifice—the audiences acceptance of the artist's premises. But to realize a return on the investment of $1 and two hours, we must first swallow the outrageous condition given that Mel Brooks' is a Comic Genius. If you can buy this, you'll not only enjoy yourself but probably laugh yourself silly, and feel silly for being taken in.

But that's not too hard, even for an audience of finely honed critical minds. Behind every frame, there's the presence of Mel Brooks groping for the jugular: "This is funny, so laugh, you goy schmuck, LAUGH!!"

The first five minutes promise a well-aimed satire of the John Ford Monument Valley Western (already a self-caricature, on the order of Billy Carter). After Frankie Laine's cliche-ridden, whiplash-punctuated theme song, a gang of black railroad workers are goaded into a "good ol' fashioned nigger work song," they glide into slickly harmonized Cole Porter. From then it's all downhill.

The unsteady plot, concerning a modern dude (Cleavon Little) as an Old West sheriff, promises racial humor that's never delivered. Never mind that, Little's too nice a guy in the first place—Brooks obviously has other things in mind. His movie quickly disintegrates into a sloppy pastiche of old vaudeville gags, old burlesque routines, old assortion-of-Jewishness jokes, and even old Groucho bits that don't work. It's like we're overhearing the comics' convention breaking up at every gag in the book: "217.936." It's not supposed to be funny, just strident.

We're also embarrassed for the actors fed into this comedy of chaos, especially for Madaline Kahn, whose loopy Marlene Dietrich act outclasses Brooks' intentions. Only Gene Wilder escapes. In a film overcharged with breakneck manic intensity, his dreamy, bemused gunslinger seems played at half speed; reflective, wondering how his manager got him involved in such a mess.

And why shouldn't he? He shares with us the knowledge that Blazing Saddles is doomed to collapse under its awesome absurdist pretensions. For Brooks, irreverence is its own reward. We're supposed to chuckle and chuck lovingly over his dirty-minded-little-boy antics, because he's so darned cute, whatever he does. He even puts himself in the film's cast; Pauline Kael dubbed him its 'mascot'.

Mel Brooks' talents are diametrically opposed to those of a director. We love him for the wild irresponsible zaniness of The Critics, his records, and TV appearances. But that's the problem—he enjoys himself so much that he destroys his own material. He's too busy laughing at himself.

Some time ago, Diderot spoke of an obvious but often ignored aspect of performance: the performer must be able to look at his material objectively if he wants to move his audience. A work of genius will result when Mel Brooks finally catches on.

Clark hosts Hatch collection

"One Hundred American Drawings from the John Davis Hatch Collection," which has been exhibited in England, France, and Ireland for the past two years, makes its first American debut in an exhibition which opened Tuesday at the Clark Art Institute. The drawings range in date from 1760 to 1910.

Included in the earliest Pre-Revolutionary period are works by Copley, Benjamin West, and John Greenwood. Copley's original drawing for the painting The Death of the Earl of Chatham in the Tate Gallery, London, is in the exhibition, as is West's study for his painting George III Assuming Royal Power in 1761.

Thomas Sully's original small observations of General Lafayette, made in 1825 for the full-length portrait in City Hall, Philadelphia, are also shown. Of the four Winslow Homer examples, one is a drawing of the 1870s from the painting Breezing Up; two are from the Civil War period; and one is of his rural New England. Thomas Cole, represented in the selection by four items, has a superb small round drawing of The Cross in the Wilderness.

The chronological survey ends with a free-line study of the Head of Jean by George Bellows used for his painting Elinor, Jean and Anne in the Albright-Knox Gallery in Buffalo, and a brilliant early self-portrait by Marsden Hartley.

John Davis Hatch, museum administrator and American art historian, first began collecting drawings by American artists in 1929. In 1936 his collection was shown in a pioneering exhibit at the Phillips Memorial Gallery in Washington, D.C. and it travelled thereafter under the American Federation of Arts for three years for showing in museums throughout the United States.

In 1965 the distinguished Rembrandt scholar Jakob Rosenberg, with S. Lane Faison, Jr., then Professor of Art at Williams, selected forty-six drawings to form an exhibit 150 Years of American Drawings which was circulated to four major institutions. Ten years later Winslow Ames of the University of Rhode Island selected forty-three drawings from Hatch's collection to make up a group entitled American Face and Figure as an exhibit planned to tour New England State Universities. The examples for this Bicentennial survey of one hundred drawings were selected by John Wilmerding, then at Dartmouth College.

The exhibition will remain on view at the Institute through January 15.

A Gentleman by John Singleton Copley is in the exhibition which opened Tuesday at the Clark.

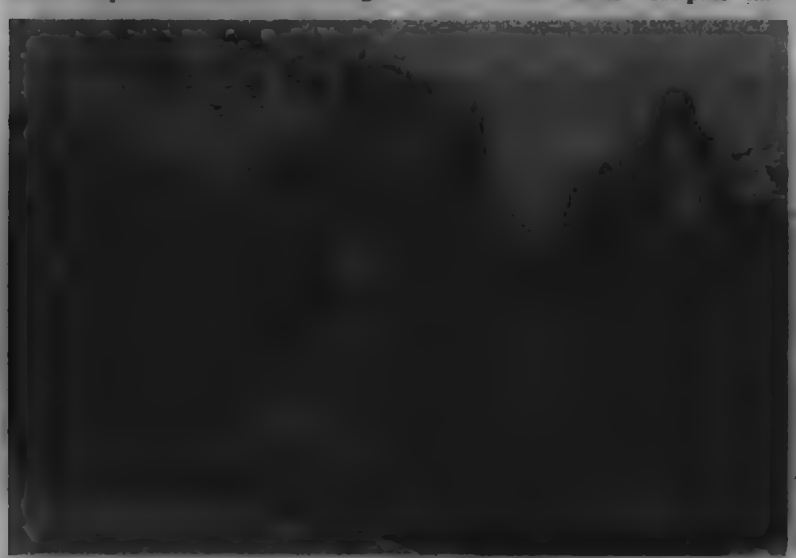
Kalapana will be appearing with Cheap Trick at Chapin Hall on Friday, November 11. Tickets are $3 in advance, $5 at the door, and go on sale Monday at Baxter Hall. Due to limited seating, only Williams students and their guests will be admitted to this Homecoming event.



On the south shore of the Big Island of Hawaii, there is a beach known as Kalapana. It is a black sand beach and is unique for that reason. Through sun, wind, and the constant washing of waves, the beach has maintained its unique identity for thousands of years. Now there is a new Kalapana.

What is unusual about the new Kalapana is that its music comes out of Hawaii, but not in the traditional style. Don Ho they're not; Kalapana is as contemporary as a quad sound system. Kalapana is versatile in a wide range of musical styles; their music utilizes lush four-part harmonies over jazz-rock-acoustic instrumentation. As the influential music trade magazine Cashbox has written, Kalapana "may sound like Hall & Oates, the L.A. Express, or America, but they still manage to inject their own individual personality. The front line harmonizes beautifully and the band has no difficulty delivering their material which runs the gamut from electric to acoustic with tinges of jazz and pop."

Since forming in 1974, Kalapana has quickly become the most popular group in Hawaii's entertainment history. All three of their albums have topped the charts, and the demand for live appearances has been overwhelming. In June of 1976, Kalapana sold out three nights at the Waikiki Shell, breaking box-office records set by Elton John and the Rolling Stones. Six months later, they grossed over $300,000 in a single appearance at the Aloha Stadium in Honolulu.

Kalapana has also become a major attraction in California. They've sold out dates in Santa Monica and Berkeley, and at the University of Southern California and U.C. Irvine. Last night, Kalapana packed Royce Hall on the UCLA campus.

Kalapana's Williams appearance on November 11 marks their East Coast concert debut. The band is receiving co-headline status, and will be performing a full-length set.

Kalapana will appear with Cheap Trick at Chapin Homecoming weekend on Friday, Nov. 11.

Wesleyan gridders look for first win over Odell half, yet the win showed signs of an Eph recovery, just in time for the Little Three.

Wesleyan, you see, cannot win the Little Three and as Hamden Hall's season records say, this is a whole new ballgame and Williams has a clean slate. The Eph offense rolled up 455 yards against Union, moving with equal effectiveness on the ground and through the air.

Bill Whelan threw for a strategic 180 yards and three touchdowns, and the Eph coaches must be wondering what that senior would be like if he hadn't missed nearly two full seasons with injuries. Fullback Nuzzolese netted 83 yards and three touchdowns and tri-captain Scott Harrington returned to the lineup to pick up 97 yards and his first score of the season.

"We're getting better," said Odell, "Harrington really added a spice to our offense." On the dark side of the ledger, soph Dave Massucco, who caught a 46-yard scoring pass from Whelan and rushed for 71 yards, has a sprained ankle and will not start. Greg Collins will go in Massucco's place.

Steve Rogers has a charley horse at one tackle spot and may be replaced by Mike Curran. The rest of an offensive line which played a superb game against Union will remain intact. Offensive-player-of-the-week Joe Maguire is the center, flanked by any two of Ken Schoetz, Jay Skerry and Brian Fales with frosh Bob VanDore continuing an outstanding relief job at the other tackle spot.

Ken Hollingsworth and Todd Dickerson combined for nine catches and will start at the receiver spots. Herb McCormick reinjured a hamstring this week. "If desire is enough," says Odell, "he'll play," but he lists the tri-captain as doubtful.

Sophomore Russ Gee and senior Mike Masi are the men on center stage Saturday, playing the crucial defensive end positions and trying to contain the Cards' outside speed. Tri-captain Pete Tuttle, Brian Benedict, and Colin Hart are the front three, with Dan Towle ready in the bullpen.

John Thiel picked off a Union pass and played battering ram for 21 yards and a touchdown, and will join fellow junior Phil Shuman at the linebacker spots. Greg McAleenan, Mark Gerry (a pretty TD-saving deflection) Long Ellis (his first career interception) and Andy Krakauer round out the defense.

Two weeks ago, Wesleyan and Amherst went at each other like a couple of alley cats. "We're gonna play with a lot of emotion," says Odell, "it'll be an adrenaline game." All that "electricity" Curt Gowdy, Jim McKay, and Brent Mussberger are always talking about is already there.

keeper Doug Orr and the referee allowed the score. Williams erupted in disbelief. "No, the ref didn't blow his whistle," quipped Berkshire Eagle reporter Mike Meserole. "But he really did blow the call."

Williams rallied after this incident and began to rain soccer balls on Crimson netminder Freddie Herold. With 1:25 left in the first half fast-improving Greg Hartman cut the gap to 2-1 with a 12-yard toeball. At 29:58 of the second half Hartman tied the game on an amazing 28-yard screamer that skimmed off the stomach of a Harvard fullback, off the crossbar and into the goal. Two minutes later Purple trailer Henry Osborne put the Ephs on top, 3-2.

With fans roaring and darkness descending it seemed as if the Purple had the Crimson whipped for the third consecutive year, but a supreme effort by Harvard's Nelson knotted the score with 12:47 left. As goalie Orr punched away one head-high shot, Nelson leaped into the ball and headed it back over Orr and into the net. "A great, courageous goal" said Williams mentor Vennell. The two schools called it a 3-3 draw when neither could score in two twilight overtime sessions.

Williams was typically slow out of the blocks in Saturday's rugged match against Springfield, and fell behind six minutes into the battle when Hong Kong native Joe Yung pushed home a shot from seven yards out. Only after 20 minutes of the half had elapsed did the Ephs keep the ball on the ground against the bigger Chiefs, but even then some wild shooting killed several picturebook scoring opportunities.

Supported by Jay Loeffler's strong goalwork, Williams iced the game in the second half on goals by Ted Rouse, Hartman, and Perry Nelson. Vennell bestowed praise on the play of his reserves, citing Dave Barra in particular for a "super job" of filling in for the sidelined Osborne.

5-1 Cardinals gun for Ephs

by Tim Layden

There's a funny story unfolding down in Middletown, Connecticut. Head football Coach Bill MacDermott is rumored to have ignored thoughts that the loss of four-year quarterback Brad Vanacore and the entire Cardinal secondary would wreck his building process and turn the '76 5-3 Cards into a loser, and that the 1977 Wesleyan squad is 5-1?!

Oh, and here's another little piece of gossip out of card-town (just call me Rona Barrett). Wesleyan, 4-2 and gunning for their first Little Three title since 1970 before losing to Williams 34-7 (34-7?) last November, feels that the Ephs and the ever-scheming Bob Odell caught them with their drawers down and simply pulled off a lucky win.

Had enough? Okay, here's some more juicy little potpourri. Wesleyan is one of two teams (Union being the other) which has never beaten Odell, and the Cards have come close enough the last three tries to contemplate pulling their beaks out. Trailing 21-16 early in the fourth quarter in '74, a couple of late TD tosses to Bob Murphy '76 killed the Redbirds. In '75, Dave Parker '76 hauled in a 13-yard scoring toss from Don Wallace to kill a young and hungry Cardinal eleven. And last year, ah, last year.

Odell, with an injury-riddled Williams squad, saw himself potentially outclassed by the Redbirds. He instituted a double split end offense and Wallace tossed some 43 passes, four for touchdowns and the big win. Vanacore was the losing pitcher for the fourth time and MacDermott now stands at 0-4 versus Odell.

All history lessons aside, the 1977 Wesleyan Cardinals are much, much better than anyone expected. "This will be the best Wesleyan team we've faced at Williams," says a respectful Odell, "it should be a real enthusiastic game." Wesleyan was a heavy underdog to Amherst two weeks ago and lost only 16-14, in a game, according to Odell "Wesleyan should've won."

John Papa, a placekicker and punter for the Birds the past three seasons, quarterbacks MacDermott's charges, and does an adequate job. His main task is getting the ball to a pair of very talented running backs, Dennis Robinson and Bob Latessa.

Robinson, according to Odell, "is the fastest player we've come up against this year." The swift junior broke a 55-yard punt return against the Ephs two autumns ago, and likes to run wide behind the crisp blocking of classmate Latessa. "Wesleyan is a team with a lot of speed," says Odell, which is somewhat akin to saying that Woody Hayes likes to establish a ground game.

Defensively, a pair of economy-sized linebackers, Matt Hoey and Neil Fitzgerald, make up for their lack of size by hitting wildly and covering huge chunks of ground. All-American defensive end John McVicar "is an ornery son of a gun" according to Odell. After watching McVicar pummel Gus Nuzzolese in the end zone about a half hour after a score last fall, one feels that the 6-4, 220-pounder is from another time: the museum era.

After a pair of sub-par performances at home against Bowdoin and Tufts, the Williams Ephmen got just what the doctor ordered last Saturday in Schenectady, N.Y., two teaspoons of Union Dutchmen and plenty of offense and defense. The 45-22 romp could have been 63-14 if fumble-itis hadn't set in in the second

Williams' red-hot soccer ensemble fueled its midseason revival last week with a comeback tie against Harvard (3-3) and a knock-down triumph over Springfield (3-1). The decisions extended the team's streak of undefeated play to four games and improved the 1977 ledger to 3-4-1 with five games left. (Wednesday, U-Conn snapped the streak with a 3-2 victory in overtime.)

Harvard hypersoph Lee Nelson (brother of Purple wing Perry) put on a spectacular display of offensive soccer in Tuesday's Crimson thriller, bagging his eighth, ninth, and tenth goals on the year to neutralize three Williams markers. Playing an "English style" game of hitting long and then running after the ball, Harvard gained control of the early action when the Ephbootefs were slow in asserting their own short game amidst these tactics. At 21:15 Nelson tallied his first goal off a feed from Columbian freshperson Alberto Villar.

Controversy exploded when Nelson scored off a corner kick 15 minutes later. Soccer rulebooks require corner kicks to be preceded by a whistle from each referee, but it appeared that only one had sounded when Harvard wing Matty Boyer let his fly. The Ephbooters, half motionless, watched as Nelson took a what-the-hell shot off Boyer's premature release. The ball squirmed through the arms of Purple

Once a year, the North Adams field hockey team crosses town determined to defy the odds and defeat traditional rival Williams College. Four years of losses and a history of superior Williams squads has not discouraged the perennially psyched state squad. This year North Adams came within one goal of grabbing that coveted first win. Defensive play designed to block the sure-shooting Williams line was successful until sophomore Monica Grady overcame the crowded conditions, gunning in two goals to clinch the 2-1 victory for the hosts.

North Adams came out fighting, determined to avenge last year's five goal shut-out. Williams usual well-tuned halfback-forward scoring machine endured some mechanical difficulties throughout most of the first half as bunching NA players were caught in the sweeping momentum of the Ephs line. After 25 minutes of play which saw thwarted corners, blocked up drives and a "hit the post" near miss for Williams, Monica Grady finally tallied for the frustrated Ephs. Grady's first goal was just what the fighting NA squad needed. Within three minutes the Staters put one past goalie Mimi Dumouchel.

The second half saw Williams spread out its passing attack looking for a hole in the tiring NA defense. Halfbacks Leslie Milne and Sue Wright struggled to score but it was Grady who managed to get on the right end of a centering pass for the host's second tally. The Ephs went on to dominate the rest of the game as the NA goalie kicked out repeated shots on goal.

After scoring on its only shot of the first half North Adams was unable to maintain that percentage, as netminder Dumouchel picked off four second half attempts.

Harriers take 3rd at Easterns

Four Williams runners were selected to the All East College Cross Country Team as the Ephmen ran to a third place finish at the 24-team Eastern Championships Saturday. A powerful Bates College team won the large scale meet with 79 points followed by last year's winner Brandeis in second at 92 points and the Ephs who were close behind with 106.

"I've seen a lot of them", commented coach Tony Plansky about 46 years worth of Williams cross country teams, "but this is the best group I've ever had." Indeed, Saturday's third place finish is the best Eastern performance ever for a Williams team.

Senior Frank Carr led the purple wave with a medal-winning 11th place performance among the field of 170 New England athletes. Carr chopped 40 seconds off his previous best time at Franklin Park and shattered the 25 minute barrier with a 24:43 clocking.

A trio of Williams harriers placed 20th, 21st and 22nd giving Plansky a quartet of All-East selectees and an eleven point margin over the fourth place Southern Conn. squad. Tom Schreck clocked 24:59 for the five mile grass and macadam course while Mike Behrman ran the best race of his Williams career in 25:01 and Joe Kolb capped off the scoring punch with a time of 25:02.

Team captain Dan Sullivan ran his last collegiate race at Franklin Park in a personal best 25:17 for the number 34 spot and Garrick Leonard crossed the line in 53rd place, as he also recorded a personal best of 25:39. Freshman Phil Darrow rounded out the seven-man Eph contingent with an excellent time of 25:49 for 60th place.

The junior varsity runners also had a profitable day in Boston, as Larry Wu's 26:24 twelfth place performance led the group to a fourth place finish overall. Freshman John McCammond followed Wu in 15th place at 26:34 while Hans Geisecke toured the five mile course in 26:58 for the number 26 position. Steve St. Clair entered the finish chute in 31st place just eight seconds over the 27 minute mark and Pat Dobson followed six places later at 27:21, while Buddy Bell and Jon Miller recorded times of 27:51 and 28:18 respectively.

Dartmouth edges netwomen

by Evan Bash

Before the Williams and Dartmouth women's tennis teams took to the courts last Thursday in Hanover, a ceremony was held to present the hosts and their star player with trophies commemorating their respective New England Tournament team and individual championships. Naturally, this ceremony was not very popular with the Ephs, last year's champs, who went on to show their disapproval of the Big Green's entertainment by giving the champs a real scare before falling 6-3. Williams' best (and last) performance of the year left them with a fine 8-4 record and pleasant dreams for the next few seasons as half of this season's starters were freshman or sophomores.

If the presentations or the fact that it was their last match didn't get coach Curt Tong's crew fired up, then Becky Chase's heroics certainly did. Chase, playing at No. one singles for the first time this year, pulled off a remarkable upset as she dominated Pam Barnholzer, the New England singles champ, in a 6-3, 6-2 victory. Laura Goebel followed with a strong performance for a tough 6-3, 4-6, 6-4 win, but, despite some fine play, the Ephs were unable to win another singles match.

Captain Laura Carson, playing the last match of her strong college career, dropped a 7-5, 6-3 decision at No. two singles and Trudie ten Broeke was overwhelmed 6-2, 6-0. In a result unbefitting the good year she's had, Ann Morris fell 6-3, 6-4 at No. four, while, in one of the day's pivotal encounters, Mary Simpson's valiant effort was not enough in a 6-2, 1-6, 6-4 loss.

Two doubles victories secured Dartmouth's win. Amy Demorest and Sally Kruse lost Williams' second close, three set match, as their good play met with solid resistance in a 3-6, 6-1, 6-3 defeat. Teamed together for the first time, Amy Sterling and Sherry Willcox won 6-2, 6-4, Kristan Dale and Mary Tom Higgs lost for the first time this year, 6-2, 7-5.

Nuzzolese named athlete of week

Gus Nuzzolese, sophomore fullback on the varsity football team has been chosen as the Record Athlete of the Week after a superb three-touchdown performance against Union Saturday. The powerful sophomore rushed for 83 yards, scored two six-pointers on the ground and added another TD with a grab of a Bill Whelan pass. Nuzzolese's contribution of 18 points led the Ephmen to a 45-22 slaughter of the Dutchmen and evened the squad's record at 3-3.

Honorable Mention—Frank Carr, senior on the men's cross country team, receives an honorable mention this week following his medal-winning eleventh place effort in the Eastern Intercollegiate championships Saturday in Boston. Carr was the first Williams finisher in the 170 runner field and he averaged just over 4:57 per mile for a 24:43 five mile clocking—the second fastest ever by an Ephman on the Franklin Park course. The senior harrier was selected to the All East team in pacing the Ephs to a third place finish in the 24-team meet.

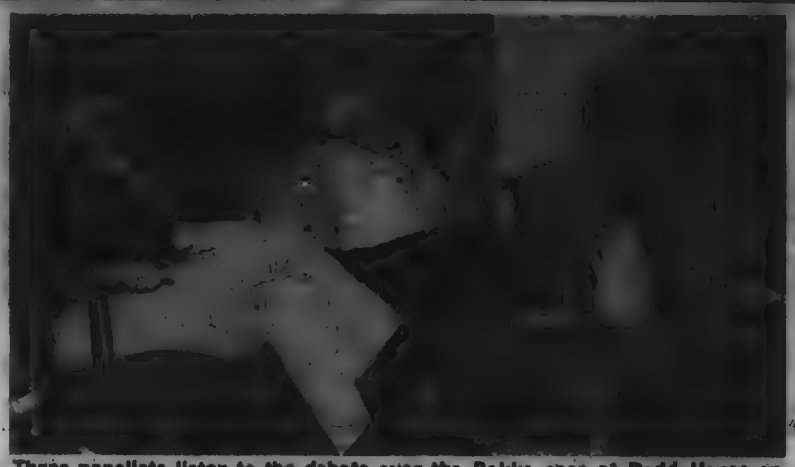
Problems thwart guide

by Ray DeMeo

"The Course Guide needn't create an adversary relationship between students and faculty," according to College Council President Tom Herwitz. "But it won't work if it treats courses and teachers like consumer products." Since its inception two years ago, the Course Guide committee has worked to produce what its chairman Don Toumey calls "a valid guide, that provides an objective measure of how students feel about their courses." Toumey conceded, however, that "there are some people who really think that the guide is detrimental to the Williams experience."

The Course Guide Committee's most recent move has come in the interest of improving student response to the course guide questionnaire. Faculty members received letters Wednesday requesting that they allow students to fill out a portion of the questionnaire during the class period at the end of the semester. According to the letter, the new procedure "would lead to a near 100 per cent response rate" from students, and consequently make the published guide more "useful to teachers and students alike." CEP Chairman Gordon Winston agrees with the idea "in principle," but pointed out that there might be a "problem with time," since faculty customarily hand out their own course evaluation questionnaires at the end of the semester. Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley recognized "the students right to make the request," but added, that the decision to distribute the guide "should be up to the individual faculty member."



In the interests of avoiding "conflict between students and faculty" the committee has decided to exempt courses taught by first year teachers from review in the guide. Toumey stressed the need for allowing new faculty "a process of acclimation," and added, "they shouldn't have to have the course guide looking over their shoulders." Oakley supported the measure as a means of allowing new teachers to "develop their own style."

In its letter to the faculty, the Course Guide Committee stressed its concern "for insuring that the guide does not detract from the unique faculty-student relationship here at Williams." However, George Goethals, former CEP chairman and last year's faculty representative to the College Council, claims that "public course evaluations can do real damage." "They make the faculty uptight, and there is a heavy cost in terms of openness and trust." Oakley shares some of Goethals' reservations, pointing out that the evaluation process "may contribute to a polarization" of students and faculty. Referring to the 20 per cent response rate obtained on the last Course Guide Questionnaire, he added, "student participation seems to indicate a lack of interest in the guide."

Tom Herwitz sees "a lack of interest and understanding" as the major factor hindering the success of the course guide. "We've got to get more student participation in order to make the thing worthwhile, or the faculty will hesitate to accept it," he stressed. Herwitz proposed that faculty members be allowed to write their own course descriptions in addition to student evaluations in the Guide. "The Course Guide can be expanded to become a good, interesting and helpful thing for both students and faculty," he said.

Council vice-president Peter Friesen called the present course guide format "a flood of bound data that tends to overwhelm rather than interest." He proposed to allow questionnaires for different departments to be distributed separately and dealt with on an individual basis. He proposed that the guide examine individual professors' backgrounds, including recently published articles, syllabi and class formats. Under this system, Friesen claims, "less dynamic professors" would have an opportunity to be represented in the guide.

While stressing a need for "sensitivity for faculty concerns," in the course guide. Friesen added, "a faculty member should be a public creature." He conceded, however, that "if the assessments made are rash and not well-planned, it could well damage faculty-student relations." Tom Herwitz states, "It's going to take a period of nurturing before this thing can gain full acceptance with either students or faculty." He added, however, that "students are going to have to take the initiative on this thing, even if some faculty disagree."

Smith speculates on pool of early decision applicants and Barron's rating

Director of Admissions Philip Smith, said he expects an increase in the number of Early Decision applications, due November 15.

For the past ten years, the College has accepted just over 30 per cent of the incoming class through the early decision process. This year the College will accept slightly fewer. By this method, Smith explained, the College will be able "to respond to the strength of the pool" next spring. Signs of an increase are the number of Williamstown interviews this fall, and the requests for applications.

Smith also said that the College will have its Barron's Guide selectivity rating reviewed for next fall. The ratings are changed every two years, and are based strictly on College Board scores. Williams fell last time from "most highly selective" to "highly selective," with Math-Verbal averages of 660/625-630, below the 650/650 border.

Smith criticized the arbitrary nature of the rating, explaining that much more is involved in the selectivity of a college than just board scores. Accepting less than 20 per cent of its applicants last year, Williams is one of the most selective colleges in the country. In addition, some colleges rated more selective than Williams by Barron's have lower board scores, "if you believe what the N.Y. Times prints about Stanford," Smith said.

Smith noted that the Williams's board score averages have declined slightly, along with the national averages, but added that "it's nothing major."

ADA solicits petition signatures

by Sue Luciano

By the end of this month Common Cause must have a minimum of 55,000 signatures in order to get financial disclosure ethics legislation for state and local officials on the Massachusetts ballot next year. Without these signatures, it will be postponed indefinitely.

Julia McNamee '80 of the Williams chapter of Americans for Democratic Action said the organization hopes to gather approximately 1,000 signatures in the Williamstown and Pittsfield area. On election day groups of students will go into Pittsfield to canvass. For the next two weekends students will canvass in shopping centers and outside churches.

McNamee said that this petition campaign is important because it gives students a chance to get involved in the political process rather than just talk, as tends to happen in college political organizations. It would also limit gifts from lobbyists to legislators and create an ethics commission for the state. Massachusetts is one of only 11 states in the country without ethics legislation of some kind.

If Common Cause is successful in its initiative drive, Massachusetts citizens will vote next November on a bill containing provisions for full financial disclosure for all elected state and county official and top appointed officials.

Bomo wins at Amherst trivia

by Tom Soybel

To all those near and dear to Trivia, let it be known that on Saturday, November 5, a small but hearty band of Williams gamesters crossed into the Valley of Amherst and there matched wits (or lack thereof) with their Brethren Across the Mountains. Let it also be known that these Brave Lads, from the team known as BOMO, did triumph over said Brethren in the Second Semi-Annual Amherst Trivia Quiz. Displaying great gusto in the field of importantly meaningless studies.

Premier BOMO Mot Gardner led a representative squad from his renowned Williams team that included both long time trivia diehards as well as rookies culled from the freshman class, and with the support of some Amherst sympathizers, this ambitious party of sixteen gave the large Amherst dorm teams a run for their money. Starting from the second hour, the BOMO's led the competition all through the six hour contest and finished in first place by a margin of seven (143-136) points over the runner up teams James Plus Four, the defending champion, and Avalon.

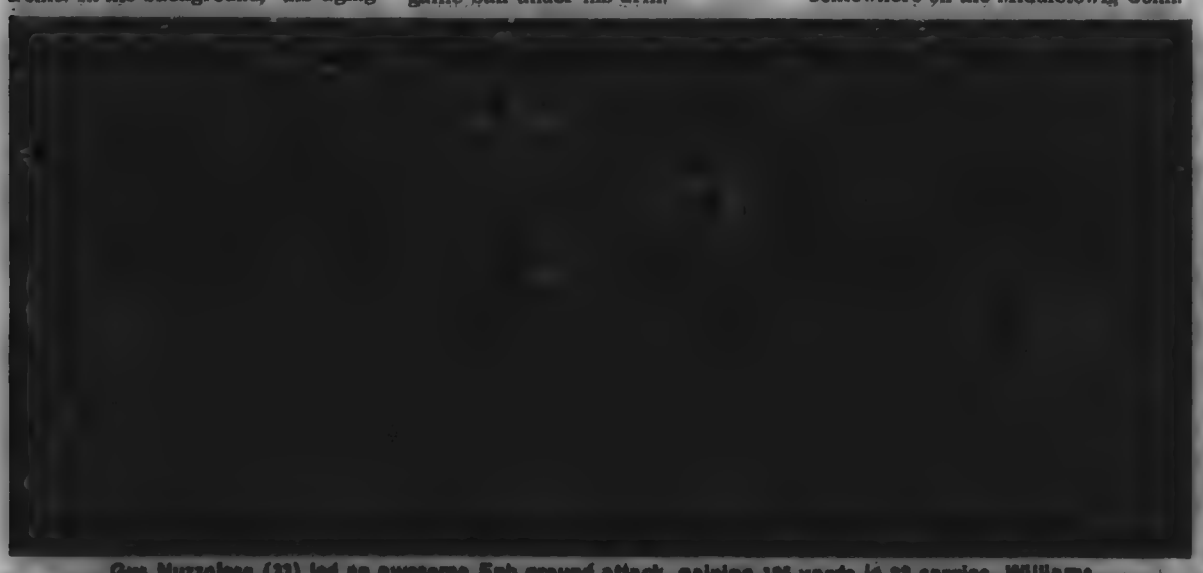
Along the road to victory the BOMO's had to leap such hurdles as: "Who are the six members of the Paper Chase study group?", and "What are the eight vegetables in V-8 Juice?", in addition to contemplating Jay Berwanger's place in the Trivia Hall of Fame. Numerous calls back to Berkshire County were necessary throughout the evening, including appeals for help from Price Chopper of North Adams and Williams' own James MacGregor Burns, who helped BOMO grapple with Convention '72 trivialities. In vivid displays of last minute pigment, the BOMO's also consulted Bradlee International Airport and the University of Massachusetts radio station.

In keeping with the idea that Trivia is its own reward, the generous BOMO's left their first place prize (a half keg of beer and seven large cheese pizzas) behind with their Amherst hosts and compatriots. Amherst Trivia nuts Dave Darrow and Lou Bloomfield, who ran the professional and competitive contest, expressed their appreciation for BOMO's inspired gamesmanship, but also said at the close of the contest, "We hope you guys don't come down here and clean us out again next year."

Williams whips Wesleyan: Jeffs next

by Tim Layden

For fans of Williams College football, the scene at the conclusion of last Saturday's Little Three opener against Wesleyan was beautifully ironic. In the background, the aging Wesleyan field house, with the words "Waste Williams '77" painted on the roof. In the foreground, Eph Head Coach Bob Odell jogs off the field with an ear-to-ear-grin on his face and the game ball under his arm.



"This was a very, very, satisfying win," said Odell of his 12th Little Three triumph in 13 tries. It was the Ephs' seventh win over Wesleyan in as many tries under Odell, and somewhere on the Middletown, Conn. campus, there must be a bunch of senior football players about ready to hire a witch doctor—perhaps a little voodoo will someday remove the "Williams hex."

A year ago, Wesleyan rolled into Billsville 4-2 and heavy favorites to cop their first Little Three crown since 1970, and Odell threw an unfamiliar double slot formation at the Cards, trouncing them 34-7.

Saturday's upset (the Cards were 13-point favorites according to peerless Boston Globe prognosticator Jeff Sagarin) was a second straight tribute to the pre-game planning of Odell. Expecting the Cards to prep for Bill Whelan's aerial arsenal, Odell sent his charges out in a full house "three yards and a cloud of dust" offense and rolled up 239 ground yards (Woody would be proud).

"We did well over at Union with the straight T," explained Odell, "so we decided to go with it against them, since we knew they'd be ready for our passing attack." The Eph attack forced Wesleyan's unorthodox scrambling defense, and particularly Interesting questions are raised by the CC finance committee's recommendation that $1,122 of this year's Student Activity Tax (SAT) funds be set aside to establish a capital fund for future WCFM capital expenditures. The logic of the decision, according to one committee member, is that by having students set aside such an amount each year, after several years the radio station will be able to replace some of its aging equipment—particularly the station control board. Apparently the finance committee feels that spreading the costs of such equipment over several years is better than making one large expenditure in any given year.

We applaud the committee's efforts to plan ahead but we hope the committee has examined the implications of its action. In effect, the committee is allocating SAT funds from the present student body to a project which will benefit future student bodies. SAT funds over the next few years will be held aside to make a capital investment which will benefit many future Williams students but not those who are actually paying for that investment. One could argue that there is no reason why present students should be using SAT funds to subsidize the activities of future students.

Of course, there's some truth to the notion that some previous group of students at the College has subsidized the existing student body. The present student body, for instance, has benefitted from a WCFM control board which it did not help pay for.

Few would contest the need for replacing aging WCFM equipment and such institutions as the Outing Club truck. The point is that the burden for replacing such equipment should not keep falling on those lucky students who just happen to be around when the equipment wears out. The Council should attempt to set up a capital fund which doesn't involve intertemporal subsidies. Each year, the Council could set aside an amount which would just cover the depreciation on capital goods such as the WCFM control board and the Outing Club truck.

Perhaps the finance committee's suggestion—that the next several classes of Williams students buy a WCFM control board for future classes—is a necessary evil at this point because no money has been allocated in previous years to cover depreciation expenses. Nevertheless, we urge the Council to take actions which will correct this situation in the future by establishing a permanent depreciation fund.

Letters: blazing on with Bakke

on Saddles review

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the review (?) on the movie Blazing Saddles, written (?) by Don Frazier. I feel it necessary to stipulate beforehand that I do not normally do such things. If someone writes a lousy review of a movie, I ignore it. What's more, I don't feel myself to be anywhere near the expert I would need to be in order to comment on the cinema at large.

In this case, however, an exception must be made. Mr. Frazier has not merely tried to cram his inane opinions of theatre down our throats; he has attempted to insult a comic movie. In my opinion, the consequences are considerable.

We at Williams are hard put with our studies, and the quality of work we should be striving toward keeps us in a serious mood most of the time. In short, people don't get too much chance to just sit back and laugh around here. It is very seldom that we are given the opportunity to relax and enjoy a funny movie instead of pulling an all-nighter for Classics, while suffering from caffeine withdrawal symptoms. On Friday night (Nov. 4th), we finally had such a chance.

So along comes Mr. Frazier, a magna cum laude among Devil's advocates everywhere. He tells us to give it up, that this movie leaves us but two very unattractive possibilities. He goes on to suggest that the show is a nightmare of complicated sub-plots and double-meanings. Utilizing all the Ivy League idiocy at his disposal, he seems to conclude that Saddles is not really a truly funny movie, but in reality a very badly made serious movie.

Mr. Frazier, where do you go to school? Blazing Saddles has nothing to do with "racial humor", the "Comic Genius" of Mel Brooks, or "dirty-minded-little-boy-antics". Blazing Saddles is a funny movie. Period. It's purpose is to make you laugh, and Brooks has thrown in the kitchen sink to accomplish this. Look, life is tough enough without some critic (?) with nothing to do throwing [illegible] at us. When it's time to laugh, laugh.

Bakke: Round II

To the editor:

In their recent letter to the Record concerning the case of Bakke vs. the University of California, Messrs. Schwartz and Sugarman claim that "many of the minority students admitted were unequivocally unqualified" and that this is "clearly" discriminatory against "the more qualified white applicant who is not admitted because of the color of his skin." Such statements reflect misconceptions about the medical school admission process, and should not be allowed to pass unchallenged.

The essence of Bakke's argument is that he is "better qualified" than the minority students, because of a higher GAP and MCAT score. Schwartz and Sugarman (as well as the California Supreme Court) do not question this premise, but has Bakke in fact shown that he is better qualified? Consider:

1. There is absolutely no proven correlation between GPA's and MCAT scores and subsequent performance. A large study of 1088 students over 14 years at the UCSF School of Medicine concluded that there is no relationship between those scores and performance in medical school, and comparisons between test scores and later performance as a physician have resulted in similar conclusions.
2. The best indicator of future performance as a physician is the medical student's performance in third- and fourth-year clinical clerkships.
3. A 1975 study at the U.C.-San Diego School of Medicine indicated that minority students admitted under their special admissions program performed as well as their classmates during clinical clerkships.

If the Supreme Court accepts Bakke's argument, medical schools will have no choice but to rely increasingly on "objective" factors such as GPA's and MCAT scores. There is no question that objective tests are inherently biased against minorities, but beyond that, they tend to work against the humane, empathetic, and broadly-educated applicant. Public criticism of the medical profession rightly focuses on the lack of such qualities, and an increased emphasis on "objective factors" in the admissions process will hardly strengthen the profession. Instead, it will likely result in a profession that is increasingly inept at applying its vast resources and knowledge to the medical problems of individual human beings.

Finally, Schwartz and Sugarman assert that many of the minority students admitted were "unequivocally unqualified". Such a statement implies that the problem is clear-cut: "unqualified" applicants are being accepted and "qualified" applicants rejected, solely because of race. In fact, the great majority of the applicant pool—black and white, accepted and rejected—is highly qualified, in the sense of being intellectually capable of succeeding in medical school. The problem is not one of "qualified" versus "unqualified", but rather of society's allocation of the scarce resource of medical education. The high level of public subsidy for medical education gives society, through the university, the right and duty to admit a class that will best fulfill society's goals. Certainly one of these goals should be to provide medical services to minority communities. It seems logical on the part of the university to assume that capable but disadvantaged minority students, because of their life experience as members of a minority group, are best qualified to help society meet this important goal. In the words of legal scholar Charles Lawrence, "Bakke does not have an equal protection argument; he was not excluded because of the color of his skin, but because there were others who could do the job better."

Sincerely,
Thomas J. Gates '76

Campus panel debates the Bakke case

Perkins '78 in presenting facts and opinions on the implications of the Bakke case for Williams and the country.

"A quota can never be benign from a constitutional point of view if it deprives an individual of a constitutional right," said Jacobsohn, commenting on the legal aspects of the case. Quotas established on the basis of race alone are illegal, he argued, because race is an arbitrary criterion glossing over other differences between individuals.

Considerations of social need like those embodied in affirmative action programs can be carried out legally, he said, by taking race as one factor of many. "Objective meritocratic qualifications need not be all that is considered," he added.

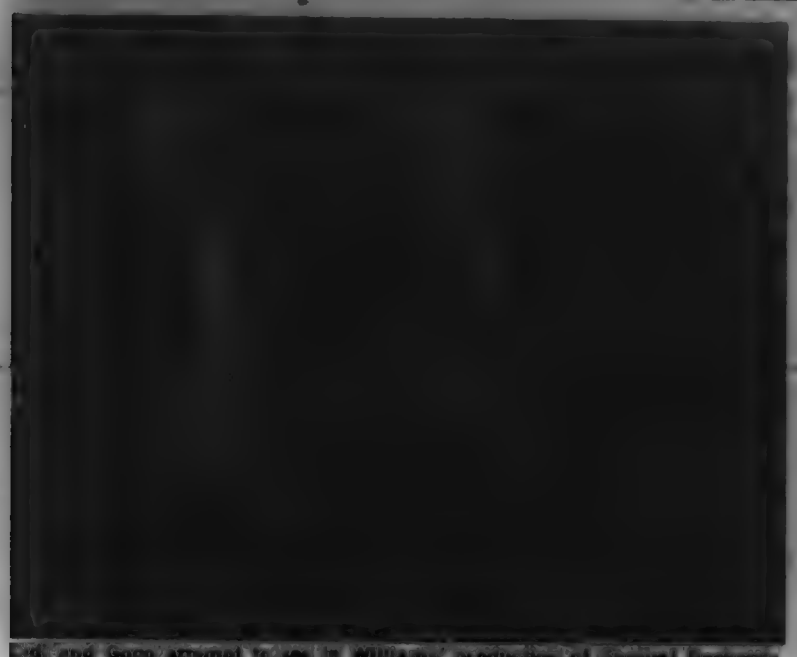
Perkins said the Bakke case reflected American ideology and social structure. He criticized the ideal of "equality of opportunity" as requiring equality of condition before providing equitable treatment to all members of society, a prerequisite he said is lacking for disadvantaged Americans.

The quota system, Perkins claimed, tends to propagate, not alleviate, the class system in American society. It tends to stigmatize those admitted under it as inferior to students admitted on merit alone. A quota system's foundation in race tends to further minimize its usefulness.

The emphasis in the Bakke case on test scores and grade point averages as reflections of ability was the focus of Smith's concern in the discussion. "I think it would be absolutely enervating to an institution to have to depend only on scores," he said.

Smith cited a correlation between test scores and parental income by which dependence on test scores alone would restrict admission to more competitive colleges and universities the privilege of children from wealthier families, closing out those from disadvantaged backgrounds.

Williams has no quotas, Smith said, but admitted the College uses "targets" in filling positions. The targets are set for non-white ethnic groups and women to obtain a "critical mass" of individuals necessary for the functioning of a group.



Smith also speculated on the effect a Supreme Court ruling in favor of Bakke might have on graduate admissions policies. Applications by minority students to competitive schools—already dropping—would fall further, he said, and admissions boards would be more cautious in assessing minority applications.

Grabois objected to quota systems on the basis of its arbitrariness, charging that any quota can be too low if more qualified applicants apply under it than are accepted, or too high if it causes unqualified applicants to gain acceptance.

Discussion after the panel's presentation centered around the social implications that Perkins raised. A central criticism of quota systems was their emphasis on race, in effect discriminating against disadvantaged whites in favor of wealthy blacks in some cases and defeating the goals of the system.

Godot, comedy share themes

by Don Frazier

Wednesday through Thursday of the next two weeks, Williamstheatre presents a repertory program, Reflections/Routines, juxtaposing Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors and Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot.

Directors Gregory Boyd and Jean-Bernard Bucky envision their productions as "a duet, a completion of each within the other, an exploration into expressions of the comic vision in drama." As Bucky continued, "We're doing these plays in repertory in the hope that they will reflect common themes and forms. These could be seen as informed by archaic comic roots deep within the nature of comedy onstage."

One theme shared by the texts is that of a dual human nature. Shakespeare found this element in the classical farce from which he derived Comedy of Errors, he elaborated its already complex plot by adding a second pair of twins to the Antipholus duo. The resulting confusion weaves an intricate web of mistaken identities into a harmonious conclusion of personal relationships; and a deepened understanding of life follows each character's encounter with the irrational.

Waiting for Godot contrasts Vladimir against Estragon, and then both against the couple Lucky and Pozzo. Bucky perceives these relationships as complementary, for "taken by himself, each character is somehow incomplete, not-whole. But together they constitute multifaceted indentities."

Both comedies provide ample opportunity for the broadest sort of knockabout farce—in fact, they must be played that way if their playwrights' and directors' conceptions are to bear fruit. The comic action in Comedy of Errors, however, is not mere double-take-and-pratfall. Beneath the surface impact, Shakespeare's comedy can illuminate deeper reaches of the human situation and condition. Antipholus yearns to find himself; his desire pervades the entire play, and powers its characters' search for self even through that senseless and irrational void described by Derek Traversi as "the comic nightmare."

Blatant stage-comedy works in quite a different way for Waiting for Godot. An existential theme hardly required bleak treatment—this play is overripe with the conventions of slapstick, vaudeville and music hall routines. Yet, the "low" comedy of action and language attains the tragic resonance of metaphysical irony. For Bucky, Godot is "happening inside Comedy, a Comedy-turned inside-out, reflecting upon itself within another framework." Boyd adds, "two different orders of reality are played against each other. Godot is played on the abandoned set of Comedy, where one order of reality has already been undermined."

In plays thus conceived, pain shatters preconceptions. In Comedy of Errors, the Antipholus twins thrash wildly in a world made senseless, and are finally freed to see themselves more clearly in relation to that world. But in Godot, the only preconceptions are those held by the audience. The play mocks our most basic assumptions of consistency in time, space, and memory.

Bucky warns us of the literary approach to Godot taken by critics responding to the play's significance as dramatic literature. Rather he says, its evolution should consist of its values as they exist solely in the performance. "There's a great deal of 'received wisdom' about the play, all of which we must clean out of our heads before we can begin to accept the work on its own merits—you know, the tramps lost in the blasted heath. The text itself, however, doesn't say anything at all about this. Look at the first page: "A country road. A tree." That's all. We don't even know if they are tramps or PhD.'."

The directors have been working closely, coordinating their productions around central points of reference. Their plays have evolved symbiotically. "What's important," Bucky reflects, "Is to scrupulously avoid being tied to concrete notions of what the final product should look like. Instead, retain the artistic conception, the idea behind what you're doing. If you always keep it in mind, it will pervade all aspects of the production process, and the final product will take care of itself."

Two harpsichord program

V. Hill and P. Mattson enliven Baroque

by John Libertine

Last Thursday evening, Griffin Hall Concerts moved to St. John's Episcopal Church to present a concert of music for two harpsichords by Polly Mattson and Victor Hill. Though the repertoire for two harpsichords is quite small because of the logistical problems in the Baroque period, the few pieces available are rich and varied. As played by Hill and Mattson, they are beautiful.

The concert began with a short sonata by Pasquini. Pasquini wrote only the outlines of his melodies in his original scores; thus, Hill and Mattson presented their own lively arrangement. The work was well played, but it was so short that it took a few moments for the audience to realize that the piece was over.

Several works on the program were rescored from their original because of the lack of original pieces. One such piece was the Bach Concerto in C minor, minus the strings originally included. As Hill said, "This is a low-budget series."

To end the first part of the program, Hill and Mattson played Hill's own arrangement of one of Handel's Water Music suites. They treated the piece as a keyboard work, ornamenting freely. The effect was delightful.

After the intermission, Hill and Mattson returned to play pieces by Rameau and Couperin. Each played a solo piece in the Couperin, in which the beginning allemande is one of the few works scored for two harpsichords.

Hill and Mattson ended the program as all programs should be ended—with a bang. According to Hill, the Bach Concerto in C major is "the jewel of the repertoire." He also called it a "trapeze act, with each player dove-tailing into the other." The piece, as Hill pointed out, may be "abysmally difficult to play," but they played it beautifully and the audience was most receptive. As an encore, Hill and Mattson played the Sinfonia from Handel's Solomon, popularly known as The Arrival of the Queen of Sheba.

In addition to playing, Hill prefaced each work with a capsule history of the work and its composer. Not only does it add to the informal air of the concert, but it is a great method of imparting abscure knowledge to an interested audience. A Griffin Hall Concert is an enjoyable and enriching way of spending an evening.

Cheap Trick cancels, concert bill to change

Cheap Trick, originally scheduled to appear along with Kalapana in Friday's Homecoming concert, has been forced to postpone their Williams appearance, according to ACEC Chairman Steve Case. Case was informed of the band's cancellation late Friday afternoon, and immediately began negotiations to replace the group. "Ironically," he told the Record, "a group we tried to get all along now looks like it may be available." An official announcement will be made tomorrow by way of flyers distributed to Baxter mailboxes.

The featured attraction, Kalapana, will still appear. Kalapana, Hawaii's premiere contemporary rock group, is one of the few band's working today which can blend rowdy rock 'n' roll with soft acoustic ballads.

Case is aware that some students are skeptical about Kalapana. "They're saying, 'Last year we had J. Geils—who is Kalapana?' But I'm positive that anyone who goes to the show will love it. Kalapana is an extraordinary live band, and they're very psyched to play for Homecoming. They know what people want, and they're going to deliver."

Cheap Trick's cancellation resulted from a commitment to perform on the nationally-televised "Don Kirschner's Rock Concert." The band's record company had booked them to appear on the show, which is viewed by 25 million people, and filming was set for Thursday evening in Los Angeles. Despite the efforts of the group's managers and the ACEC, there was, according to Case, "absolutely no way we could change the filming date, and absolutely no way we could get the band's equipment from L.A. to Williamstown in time for the show."

Cheap Trick was reportedly upset about the decision to postpone, as it was the first cancellation in the band's history. Cheap Trick has agreed to perform at Williams in mid-January prior to embarking on a European tour.

Tickets for the Kalapana concert go on sale tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. in Baxter Hall, and are $3.00 in advance.

Even cowgirls . . .

by Marcus Smith
Even Cowgirls Get The Blues
By Tom Robbins
Bantam Books 1976

After five years as arts editor for a Seattle newspaper, Tom Robbins called in "well," never again to return to his desk. Now, after two novels, Another Roadside Attraction and Even Cowgirls Get The Blues, he is fast becoming another cult figure for the America's quirky "new fiction," joining the ranks of such authors as Pynchon, Barthelme, Kozinski and Barth.

Even Cowgirls Get The Blues, Robbins' second novel, published in April of 1976, is plain and simply a joy to read. Amusing but revealing, sordonic but insightful, laughable but sombre, Cowgirls is reminiscent of Pynchon's Gravity's Rainbow of a few years ago with respect to its episodic structure and intricate interwoven patterns. In fact, there is even a blurb by Pynchon himself to preface Cowgirls, and if you're not acquainted with the now almost legendary hermitic existence of Mr. Pynchon, let's just say that it's like Howard Hughes showing for the Super Bowl.

Says a friend to Pynchon of Cowgirls, "I'm reading it slow. I don't want it to end." High praise indeed, and very appropriate. Cowgirls is indeed the sort of book one wants to read slowly, carefully. From the "Single Cell preface" ("For its expertise as a passenger, as well as for its near-perfect resolution of sexual tension, the amoeba . . . is hereby proclaimed the official mascot of Even Cowgirls Get the Blues") to its concluding "Special Bonus Parable" (a jar of vinegar, "the emblem of life," tastes "sour" to Confucius, "bitter" to Buddah, "Yuk" to Jesus, but "sweet" to the novel's protagonist), this is a novel written with meticulous care. Friends of Robbins report in fact that the author may spend a whole day perfecting a single paragraph.

And such care has payed off. At times Cowgirls reads like a compendium of astute, whimsical, and brooding observations about the way we live ample enough to fill, or at least make a good start for, a quote book. Right from the start, for instance, Robbins intriguingly posits: "It is questionable . . . whether success is an adequate response to life. Success can eliminate as many options as failure." Or, to give another of many glowing sentences, this one provided by "Dr. Robbins", a renegade psychiatrist, when advising a patient desiring to overcome his irresponsibility: "The man who considers himself 'responsible' has not honestly examined his motives."

And this is what author Robbins does in Cowgirls. He examines motives, poses questions, about the individual, about the quality of his life which the rules of society often determine. Chink, licentious sage and mystic, warns us, "survival isn't important. What matters is how you survive."

But lest you too soon conclude that Cowgirls is another homely book of wisdom for the masses, another articulate Kung Fu episode, let it be understood that Robbins is a zany, frivolously funny, and grimly ironic storyteller. Sissy Hankshaw, the novel's protagonist, is a small town girl of beauty and independence who possesses as God's gift enormous thumbs, thumbs which make her a freak, an outcast, and an infamous hitchhiker. From Virginia to Manhattan to the Badlands, Sissy hitchhikes, lives, and learns. Freedom is her creed. "There's just one thing in life better than happiness and that's freedom," she says at one point.

Closest to her are The Countess, a homosexual feminine hygiene magnate (Sissy models as The Countess' "Yoni Yum-Dew Girl"); Bonanza Jellybean, forewoman of Rubber Rose, "the only all-girl ranch in the West" (set up by The Countess as "sort of a tribute to the women of America who have cooperated in eliminating their order"); Julian Mohawk, asthmatic Indian, Yale graduate, and "Peter Maxish" water colourist, contracted for The Countess' latest ad campaign; Chink, with whom Sissy shares knowledge (and herself); and Dr. Robbins, who also is attracted to Sissy's vitality and freshness. In short, if this book bores you, go back to the den and watch Monday night football.

Through it all, Sissy shines. Unlike the likes of a Dean Moriorti (On The Road) or real life Ken Kesey (The Electric Cool Aid Acid Test), Sissy is a wanderer who, as perhaps only a woman can, intuits her purpose ("I'm not looking for anything. I've found something . . . Hitchhiking.") Sissy though finds more than this, for her freedom is a freedom of responsibility, sensitivity, and selflessness. Her decision to marry Julian Mohawk epitomizes this. "All of a sudden there was somebody who needed me. For the first time in my life, I was needed. It was a powerful attraction." So explains Sissy, a woman who has overcome her "thumb handicap" and become an emblem for individuality, sanity, and compassion. As she tells The Countess:

"It's the people who have been deformed by society that I feel sorry for, for we can live with nature's experiments, and if they aren't too vile turn them to our advantage. But social deformity is sneaky and invisible; it makes people into monsters—or mice."

Sissy's "deformity," moreover, is put to clever use by Robbins, as he again and again illustrates how the thumb (the "normal"-sized one, that is) has been "the corner stone of civilization," that which distinguishes man from the primates, and thereby sets us up perfectly for Chink's vision of what might have been: "A tribe of Big Thumbs would relate to the environment in very special ways. It would have to rely on its wits and senses. It would have to live with the animals—and plants—as virtual equals. It's extremely pleasant to me to think about a tribe of physical eccentrics living peacefully with animals and plants, learning their languages, and perhaps paying them the respect they deserve."

You've heard it before, but take a look around you, and maybe, just maybe you could stand to hear it again in an imaginative, suspecting way. And if you have the time, read Cowgirls. Perhaps you'll even come to Dr. Robbins' conclusion: "I believe in everything; nothing is sacred—I believe in nothing; everything is sacred."

In 1973 Professor Jay Pasachoff journeyed to Kenya to observe a solar eclipse. In October, he travelled by ship to the mid-Pacific to conduct experiments during the eclipse.

Solar scientists return

by Helen Prakelt

Prof. Jay M. Pasachoff, Director of Hopkins Observatory, has returned to Williamstown after travelling to the mid-Pacific by ship to conduct experiments during the total eclipse October 12.

"We had a very exciting time, although it was touch and go about clear weather" Pasachoff said. A tropical storm in the East Pacific produced three days of cloudy weather prior to the eclipse. A meteorologist on board kept close communication with the satellite center in California and received hourly photographs from the GOES satellite. They predicted that holes would appear in a certain place in the clouds, so the ship changed direction and travelled at full speed to get to that place before the eclipse started. The ship arrived two hours before the eclipse to find that there was indeed a hole in the clouds.

The group had clear observing for the beginning of the eclipse: the instruments worked well and they received high quality data. But thirty seconds into the total phase, clouds began to drift into the hole and the experiments stopped soon afterward.

Pasachoff said that by that time they had most of the data that they wanted. "We subsequently learned that the ground based locations in South America in the zone of totality had cloudy weather and had not seen the eclipse. The 1,709 passengers aboard the two ships and the 100 crew members were the only people in the world to observe it."

The Williams College experiments involved spectra so they did not require long exposure to the eclipse. But the experiments run by the Williams expedition's colleagues from Los Alamos, California did not fare as well because they needed the entire two minutes and 37 seconds to complete their sequence of observations. All the results will be published jointly.

Seniors Dan Bruns, Gavin Watson and Steward Read were all vital to the operation of the experiments. Bruns and Watson are working now to reduce the data for their senior theses.

"Before I left, I started to arrange for a special sequence of photos of the progress of the solar eclipse across the earth to be taken by the GOES satellite," Pasachoff added. Arrangements were finished by the National Science Foundation Eclipse coordination on the morning of the eclipse. The photos will arrive at Williams soon, and will be available to the students.

The first attempt to experiment on a solar eclipse from aboard ship was a success, and trips are planned for future solar eclipses in 1979 and 1980. As Pasachoff claimed, "Once you've seen an eclipse, you always want to come back for another."

Geno joins the Baxter kitchen staff
Krafty cook offers a burger 'delight'

by Julie Bermant

Have you ever noticed that Baxter Hall cook with the outlandish but fun, brightly-colored outfits? Well, there's more than appearance that sets Everett Geno apart from the crowds. Late August, he was recognized as one of fifty-four finalists in the nationwide Kraft Creative Cheeseburger Contest.

The only restrictions the contestants had to follow were that the recipes made were to be for a dish of twelve in the form of a burger, using any kind of meat along with some Kraft products. Geno's creation, "Apple and Spice, Pork Delight," consisted of a pork patty with a slice of apple sprinkled with cinnamon on top, over which was a piece of Kraft cheese and some miracle whip—all inside a regular hamburger bun.

Geno's initial success has encouraged him to participate in another contest sponsored by the Pineapple Growers of Hawaii. The prizes include a week's trip to Hawaii for all thirty-six finalists as well as $5,000 for second prize winners and $10,000 for first prize winners. Contestants may enter recipes under three different categories: salads, main dishes, and desserts. Finalists will be chosen for their achievements in only one of the categories. Geno says he has already entered two dessert recipes and is now working on a main dish. The contest ends in December but results will probably not be known until late spring.

Geno started working in the food business as a dishwasher, but after being trained for three years by the head chef of the Springs Restaurant in New Ashford, Mass., the Massachusetts Department of Labor certified him as a chef. He continued working at the Springs for two years, six days a week and extra on holidays. Desiring more time to be with his wife and to develop outside interests such as painting, he sought a less demanding job. Geno has been at Williams for a year and a half and even though he had to accept a significant decrease in his salary, he has been satisfied with the new balance between work and leisure time.

Geno has been painting seriously for the last five years, working with pen and ink, acrylics, and oils. He thinks about what he paints every day even when he can't find time to paint. One of his most recent accomplishments was the completion of a 10' by 4' mural of Williamstown which will be displayed in the Williamstown Savings Bank. The mural shows a view of the town from Blair Road and partly included the church steeples and the smoking stack from the heating plant. He prefers painting what he sees as realistically as possible. Commercial art such as greeting cards and book illustrations also interests him and despite bad luck in his first attempts to enter this field, he continues to persist in trying.

His artistic talents are shown in the outfits he designs and which his wife sews. Last year his costume consisted of white hats with embroidered vegetables, but they soon proved to be unexciting. His latest style resembles a Russian cossack attire, complete with a 5 inch high cylindrical hat and a vest with two rectangular panels that fall over the thighs and two color-coordinated pockets. His collection includes matching hats and pockets in orange, blue, and green, with a red one in the making. You can't miss Geno when you go through the Baxter line, so be sure to congratulate him on his Kraft contest victory.

It's back to basics time at Southern Vermont College

by John Lindsay

It's back to the basics at Southern Vermont College. South of Rte. 9 and west of Rte. 7 in Bennington, SVC is tucked away on the wooded slope of Mount Anthony. Thomas Gee, president for just over a year, has controlled the school's soaring fees and completely revised its curriculum, emphasizing a "core" of basic courses.

A large tudor mansion has been the home of SVC since it was purchased from the Order of the Holy Cross and St. Joseph's College in 1974. The residence was part of the estate of Edward Everett, who in 1920 owned the world's largest private apple orchard, now Southern Vermont Dartmouth.

Patterned after the English-Norman mansions of the 14th century, the ivy-covered building has been entirely renovated. Classrooms occupy the 10 master bedrooms on the second floor. The third floor works as a dorm for 45 women. They sunbathe on the roof with a view of the Dome and the Bennington Battle Monument.

Men boarders live in the former Monument Inn, bought in 1973. There are 450 students attending the private college, many of them day students from the Bennington area.

Looking like the descendant of the Kennedy "Camelot" that he is, President Gee sat back in his winged chair and described his philosophy of education. He said current economic conditions have taken their toll on today's students. Their main interest is in acquiring their first job, and they want a program with career orientation. But Gee added that the definition of career orientation has changed. "Now it's to prepare students for a lifetime of work, as opposed to preparation for a job."

Bee insisted that students should be prepared to change fields several times during their work life because of the changing world and because most students do not end up doing what they studied in school.

"The notion that a career college education differs from a liberal education is no longer valid," he said. He said he feels that technical schools and liberal schools will start to look alike, since neither provides the necessary tools for today's changing job market.

Students, Gee said, are not entirely happy with the changes he has made in the curriculum. To them he says: "We will give you what you want, but we will also give you what we think you need."

That, of course, is a turnaround for college administrators. During the student revolt of the late '60's, Gee argues that the students gained too much control, and he said declining enrollments in the last few years have led colleges to take a marketplace approach to students and education. Some courses listed in catalogues are designed to make college "fun" and make students "happy" with their college experience.

Student apathy and a reverse swing of the pendulum has been based, according to Gee, "on the notion that college skills won't get you a job, that they aren't relevant to getting a job."

Southern Vermont College, Gee said, is attempting to rekindle student interest by "making a college education more exciting and relevant, while at the same time insisting on a broad general education."

Under Gee's plan, each of the college's four bachelor degree programs—accounting, management, human services and environmental sciences—will have a core of courses representing the three R's. 25 per cent of the program consists of courses in math, English, history, sociology and philosophy. In associate degree programs, basic courses amount to 33 per cent of the curriculum.

SVC's biggest program is management, in which a student can choose an emphasis in business administration, environmental studies, communication, criminal justice or health services. Gee said this enabled SVC to strenthen the management core courses without having to develop an entire health management or communication management department, for example.

The core courses of philosophy, sociology, history and English will also be made more relevant to careers, according to Gee. English, for instance, may concentrate on report writing. "If you're a manager and you can't write a report, you will never advance," Gee said.

Gee said that aside from the philosophical reasons for the new curriculum at SVC, the evidence that students are not as well prepared for college as in the past has been the main impetus for the return to basics.

Judging from the number of frizbees flying in the flagstone courtyard, the college experience can still be "fun" in spite of a return to basics.

Cardinals stifle soccer

by Mark Pogue

Williams' hopes for its first undisputed Little Three Soccer Championship since 1971 were quietly shelved for another year on Saturday after the Purple fell to Wesleyan, 1-0. The Cardinals' shutout—the fourth against the Ephs this year—raises their record to 7-3-1; Williams sinks to 3-6-1.

It was nother case of missed opportunities. The Ephmen outshot Wesleyan, 22-16, but were again done in by failing to make their good scoring chances pay off. Six different Ephs took 13 shots on goal in the second half alone, for example, but Cardinal keeper Dan Brugioni was rarely forced to leave his feet in saving them. "The shots we really hit well," remarked Coach Jeffrey Vennell when it was over, "we hit wide."

Fast and furious first-half action produced several deep breaks into each team's backfield, but with Jay Loeffler in goal Williams easily held its own. At the 17:54 mark, though, confusion arose as a Cardinal chip wafted across the penalty area. Loeffler and Bill Kaster both went up for the ball but lost out when Cardinal forward Stan Hamilton took a son-of-blubber leap and outheaded everyone. The ball looped into the goal and the score was 1-0.

Senior co-captain Henry Osborne—"the best player on the field," in Vennell's mind—worked tirelessly in the second half to give Williams control of the midfield. As the Ephs' defense stiffened action gradually drifted toward the Cardinal goal, but wave after Purple wave came crashing to nought when shots went everywhere but in. When time ran out it was still 1-0.

The Purple booters journied to Boston this afternoon for a 3:00 make-up match with the Jumbos of Tufts. The remainder of the week will be devoted entirely to preparation for the second soccer season—Williams versus Amherst at Cole Field on Saturday. Williams soccer has not tasted victory against the Lord Jeffs (in regular-season play) since 1969.

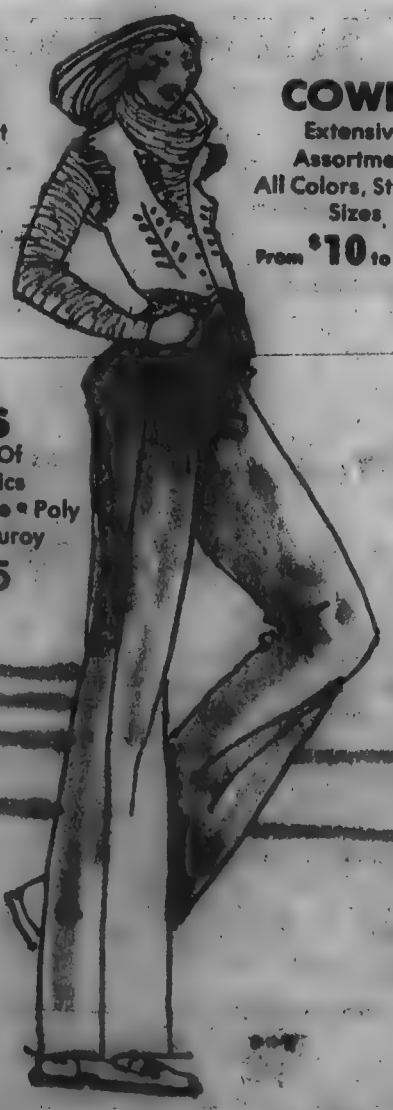
respectively. Freshman Lisa Kirschner ran to a fine time of 19:42 and finished eighth between two Wesleyan runners and Lisa Greene (25:05) and Trish Beckwith (25:10) rounded out the championship squad in tenth and eleventh.

The men's varsity won its eighth straight title as the Ephs scored 25 points with Amherst in second at 46 and Wesleyan taking third with 66 points. The tri-meet marked the close of the regular season for the Purple harriers who finished with a perfect 12-0 record. The victory gave veteran coach Tony Plansky his 18th Little Three title and his second undefeated season in the last three years.

Senior Frank Carr was the individual winner in the contest as his 24:42 clocking matched the second fastest time ever on the 4.9 mile Wesleyan course. Carr led from start to finish in the race and crossed the line with a comfortable 50 yard lead over runner-up Spence Smith of Wesleyan.



A trio of Williams runners provided the real scoring punch as Tom Schreck, Dan Sullivan and Garrick Leonard placed fourth through sixth. Schreck and team captain Sullivan both slipped under the 25 minute barrier with times of 24:58 and 24:59 respectively, while Leonard followed with a 25:09 performance. Sophomore Mike Behrman capped off the purple scoring with a ninth place effort at [illegible].

Rounding out the varsity pack were: Steve St. Clair 18th place (25:35), Jon Miller 24th (27:40), Dan Riley 26th (27:42) and Bud Bell 27th [illegible].

Plansky's undefeated harriers will run their last race of the season at the NCAA Division III Championships Saturday in Cleveland.

wildman (that's his position, not an editorialization) John McVicar to play a balanced line.

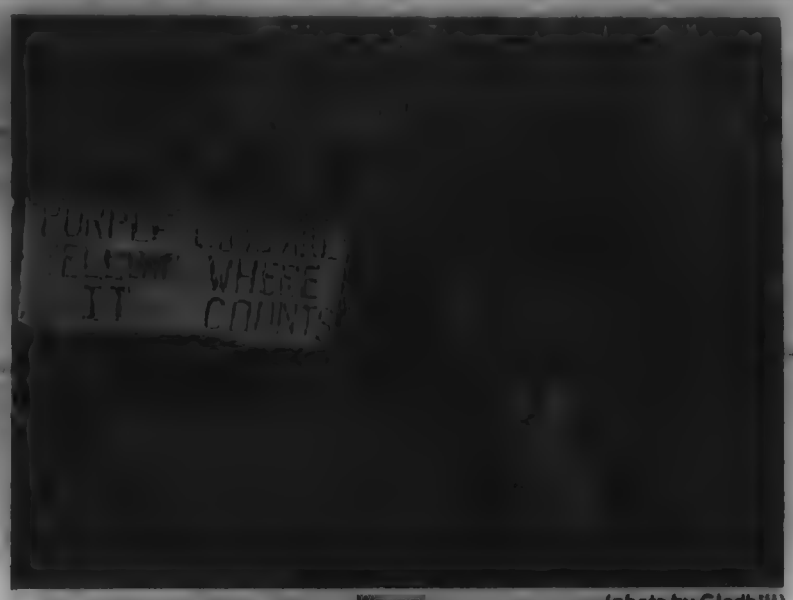
Junior linebacker John Thiel, who has rebounded spectacularly from a shaky middle three games of the year with two fine performances in row, pilfered a John Papa pass in the first quarter to set up the first score.

Greg Collins turned a power play to the outside and outran the Wesleyan secondary to the flag for a 6-0 lead, with Ken Hollingsworth adding the PAT. The play was designed to go inside behind Kenny Schoetz and Bob VanDore, but the speedy Collins took what the Cards gave him, and waved goodbye to the Redbirds' secondary.

The stunned Wesleyan crowd (homecoming, as usual) of 6,500 watched as the teams traded punts through the remainder of the half, with the Ephs taking their 7-0 lead into the dressing room at intermission. While Wesleyan's indescribably annoying 6-4 costumed Cardinal entertained the masses with numerous squawks and repeated wing-flapping, Coach Bill MacDermott made some adjustments to get his team back into the game.

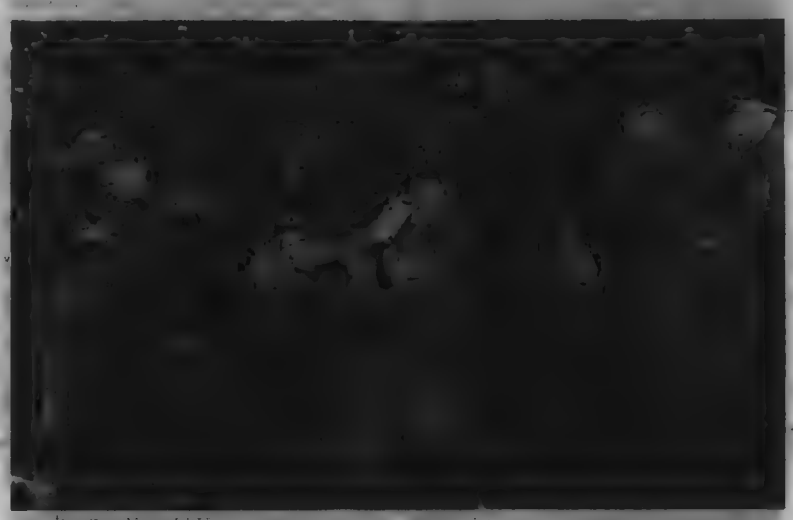
Cardinal speedster Dennis Robinson had picked up just 19 yards in the first half, and another 190 back and forth from machine to machine, MacDermott benched the junior, and, to counteract the Eph pursuit, began running Bob Latessa straight up the middle and tossing outs to tight end Paul Nelson. The result was a sustained drive and a tie game on a 5-yard toss to Nelson. Papa, who does everything but sell programs for the Cards, added the tying extra point.

The single Wesleyan scoring drive, however, was the only defensive lapse for Williams all afternoon. The front line of Colin Hart, Brian Benedict, and Pete Tuttle, jammed up the line of scrimmage for much of game. Theil's interception was his third of the year, while Phil Shuman's steal was his second.



Williams took over the ball with just under four minutes remaining in the third quarter and launched a game-winning drive which serves as a splendid commentary on the Williams-Wesleyan series of the past seven years. The Cards seem to have outstanding personnel and good coaching, yet they cannot win big games. The winning score came on a clutch, methodical 67-yard drive, using up some seven minutes of clock.

Gus Nuzzolese, who had his finest day at Williams with 135 yards on 23 carries, twice dived over the top of the heap, Mel Farr style, for fourth-down first downs, and Scott Harrington scooted around the right side and inside the flag for the winning score. Hollingsworth's PAT attempt was wide to the right, but of no importance to the final outcome.



Greg McAleenan took matters into his own hands in the closing minutes, stifling one Wesleyan chance by depositing a punt on the Cards' three, with Tom Peterson smothering the ball before it rolled in. After the hosts had fought out to their own 26, Papa tried to throw deep to Tim Fitzgerald, but McAleenan, performing without a net, stole the ball from Fitzgerald's pocket, sealing the victory.

Kudos are in order for the Williams special teams, who held Wesleyan without a big gainer, which had been the Cards' specialty in previous games. Kurt Anderson and Brian Fales, a couple of 170-pound heavyweights who had been benched for much of the season after starting in '76, both played substantially and well. And of course, Bill Whelan, who called his own game, according to Odell, "did a helluva job."

So with all of Wesleyan's glittering early-season romps, their fine 5-1 record, and talk of the spoiler role, it will all come down to Williams-Amherst next Saturday on Weston Field. Amherst prepped for the meeting by trouncing Trinity 49-14 and are looking for their first outright title since 1968. With the prospects for a super football game such as they are, the 9,000 or so folks Weston Field is alleged to seat should be comfortable by about noon. Perhaps the Lord whats-their-names could be taught the "Williams Hex."

Cross country captures three Little Three titles

by Frank Carr

Williams brought three Little Three titles back from Wesleyan Wednesday, as the cross country runners crushed their traditional rivals. Three Little Three titles? Of course!

The junior varsity runners started off the festivities by capturing the first two individual places and the team title, the women followed with a third through sixth place sweep for a 19 point margin over runner-up Wesleyan and the men's varsity brought the warm afternoon to a climax in winning its eighth straight Little Three crown.

Despite a wrong turn by a group of J.V.'ers, Williams took the first race of the day with 35 points followed by Amherst with 40 and Wesleyan with 47. Freshmen Phil Darrow and Cam Virrill finished 1-2, clocking 16:20 and 16:56 respectively for the 3.2 mile course. Pat Dobson (17:11), Rusty Anderson (17:28) and Basil Briggs (18:05) added 7th, 11th and 14th for the winning 35 point total.

Erik Oline (18:08) and Dave Breuer (18:25) were the sixth and seventh finishers for the Ephmen in 15th and 16th place overall. John McCammond, Hans Geisecke and Ned Collins ended up running an extra six-tenths of a mile after getting lost earlier and crossed the finish line in 21st, 22nd and 23rd.

Coach Bud Fisher's women trampled the host Cardinals 24-43 while Amherst was unable to field a full squad. Marina Buckley of Amherst set a 3.2 mile course of 17:57 in capturing the individual title, but the depth of the Ephs gave them a clear victory in the team race.

Michelle Cutsforth and Cyane Gresham led the women with a tie for third at 18:29, while Lisa Capaldini and Marty Epstein followed in 5th and 6th with clockings of 19:03 and 19:13

Men's tennis sees action in ECAC

by Evan Bash

Although the women grabbed all the tennis headlines this fall, the men's tennis team was in action, too, venturing to the ECAC tournament at Princeton early in October and dominating play in the recently completed all-college singles and mixed doubles championships.

Coach Sean Sloane, back to guide the men after a two year absence from Williams to earn a masters degree, put the Ephs through daily practices, even though the team has no matches until the spring. The daily workouts served to organize a line-up and prepare for the ECAC's. Sloane eventually took a group of seven to the tournament which featured Princeton, Yale and Columbia, the best teams in the East.

With such a strong field, Williams found the first round singles play tough, as the squad's six representatives were upended. Martin Goldberg came the closest to victory, losing to the tourney's No. two seed after being ahead 5-2 in the third set. Goldberg, the only player to win a set from this seed up to the finals, then went on to capture the consolation tournament for first round, "A" division losers. Evan Bash also found the consolations to his liking as he conquered the field in the "C" division. Jim Parsons, Dan O'Connell, Peter Friesen and Mitch Reiss were the Ephs' other four singles entrants.

Williams scored its only first round victory of the tournament in the "C" doubles division, where Dean Gianakos, brought along as a doubles specialist, proved his worth as he teamed with Bash for a win. All was for naught, however, as the duo was soundly defeated by the division winners in the next round. Goldberg proved his dominance of the consolations as he took his second title, combining with Parsons to sweep the "A". O'Connell and Friesen lost a close first round match against a good team, then went on to the "B" consolation finals. All in all, the Ephs were satisfied by this performance and are eagerly awaiting what could be an outstanding spring season.

Play was true to form in the college singles championship as it was dominated by team members. In the finals, Goldberg won his third consecutive Rockwood Tennis Cup title, beating Parsons 6-4, 6-1.

There was some exciting action in the mixed doubles draw, with Becky Chase and Goldberg topping the field. They downed Laura Carson and Parsons 6-4, 6-4 in the finals to secure the Harry F. Wolf Memorial championship.

Women's soccer devastates foe: 7-0-1

The women's soccer club, under coach Judy Zimicki, wound up its 1977 season with a 4-1 victory over Smith on October 27 for an impressive 7-0-1 record.

The season began with a tight game against Yale on the Williams J.V. field. Nancy Osborne scored the single goal of the game in the fourth quarter to defeat the former Eastern champs 1-0.

The Ephwomen went on to whip Mount Holyoke 4-1 the next week, firing 22 shots on goal to Holyoke's 5. Betsy Roessel scored in the first quarter and Sara Reynolds, Maggie O'Brien and Melissa Mechem each kicked one into the net in the second half. The club then travelled to Vassar and won 2-1. Scoring against the pink and gray were Laurie Jones and Sara Reynolds.

Two days later Reynolds scored again in a game against Castleton State. Alex Pagon and Alex Smith tallied three times between them to give the purple booters a 4-0 victory.

In an away game at Middlebury, which many members of the club considered to be the most important game of the season, the Ephwomen fought a grueling battle and topped the Panthers 1-0. Laurie Jones provided the lone goal in the club's fifth victory.

In the next contest the club rolled over Tufts 7-1, sending off 40 shots on goal to their opponents' 4. Julie Ernst, Reynolds, Pagon and Allison Djerf provided the points while goalie Boop Tabell stood idle much of the game.

The purple finally met its match against Harvard's Crimson as the contest ended in a 1-1 tie. Betsy Roessel scored the goal for the Ephs in the third quarter and the Harvard squad replied with a score in the final period. The game went into double overtime but neither team was able to break the tie.

The game against Smith, which had been postponed twice due to rain, was the final match for Zimicki's booters. Osborne and Pagon each scored once while Reynolds added two points to finish the season as the team's leading scorer.

During the course of the season, the squad scored a total of 24 goals, while a strong defense held the opponents to a mere eight points.

Laurie Jones maneuvers through the Harvard defenders, as Carrie Redlich follows behind. The two squads battled to a 1-1 tie, the only blemish on the otherwise perfect 7-0-1 record the women booters compiled this season.

Mermaids edge Mount Holyoke and Wellesley

Although a number would have preferred to swim their races in the infirmary, the women's swim team nipped a strong Mount Holyoke club at Holyoke Friday, 99-87. Wellesley, the third team in the meet trailed with 54.

Williams led throughout the meet, but only secured the team win in the final event, the 200 free relay. Freshmen Molly Murphy and Linda Reed teamed up with the less-than-healthy duo of Keron Walker and co-captain Nina Murphy for a 1:48 effort, less than a second slower than the current college record.

Senior Sue Tuttle, swimming in her first meet of the season, not only managed a fast breastroke leg for the prevailing medley relay team of N. Murphy, Tuttle, Joanna Monroe, and Reed, but also copped the 50 and 100 breaststroke in uncomfortably close but rather exciting races. Reed took a first in the 50 free and a second in the 100 yard event.

Nina Murphy avenged a second place in the 50 back and held onto a slim lead to squeak by two Holyoke swimmers in the 100 yard backstroke. Besides her leg of the free relay, Keron Walker swam and won the 100 i.m., and 50 fly, although under protest.

Once again, freshman Katherine Pearsall was victorious in the distance freestyle event, after a close loss to a Mt. Holyoke freestyler in the 200. Senior Carol Buck kept up her reputation in the i.m. and fly events, finishing with a second and two thirds.

Williams will face UMass for the first time under dual meet circumstances one week from Wednesday, Nov. 16, at 7:00 p.m. With the recovery of most of the team, the meet should be among the exciting aquatic events ever scheduled in Muir pool.

Shelton lectures on the dual nature of nuclear energy

"The fact that there haven't been any nuclear accidents in the past few years shouldn't make you feel that there can't be any," said Professor Jay Shelton. "You can't know with enough certainty that nuclear power is going to be safe."

Shelton voiced these views in a lecture Tuesday night, sponsored by Perry House, entitled "Nuclear Power: Pros and Cons." He compared nuclear power with various other sources of energy, most notably solar power and fossil fuels (i.e. coal and oil).

Rating nuclear power against fossil fuels as an energy source, Shelton pointed out that the known environmental hazards of the latter are "tremendous." In defense of nuclear energy, he stated that if radioactive emissions from reactors worldwide were to reach the maximum limit currently allowed by the Atomic Energy Commission, average human life expectancy might decline by "a matter of hours to days," which he described as "a trivial insult." He added, however, that the potential hazards of a major nuclear accident would be great, pointing out that a typical reactor contains a level of radioactivity equivalent to that of "a thousand small nuclear bombs." Shelton also stated that unlike fossil fuel pollutants, radioactivity will remain in the environment for long periods of time.

Shelton foresaw radioactive waste disposal problems as another potential danger of nuclear power. He noted the impossibility of maintaining an "absolutely safe" storage system for wastes. He estimated that if all the radioactive waste currently under storage were to be accidentally released at a uniform level worldwide, average human life expectancy might decline by seven years for a period of 10,000 years.

While emphasizing that "the people involved in the nuclear industry are terribly conscientious," Shelton cited a number of "unknowable dangers" involved with nuclear power, including the possibility of accidents caused by natural disasters or through sabotage. He referred to nuclear "blackmail" as "a very serious problem." He also pointed out that breeder reactors, which have not yet been developed for commercial use, are "much more complicated and dangerous" than ordinary reactors.

After examining the potential environmental hazards of the three major potential energy sources, Shelton concluded that solar energy was "the best option for the future."

On Tuesday Nov. 15 at 7:00 p.m., the Perry House Lecture Series continues with Earl McFarland, Professor of Economics, speaking on economic development in the Third World.

Council approves 9 more budgets

The College Council approved 1977-78 budget appropriations Tuesday for nine campus organizations: the Williams Action Coalition, Americans for Democratic Action, Williams Independents, Williams Gay Support Organization, Williams Republicans, Williams Women, Lecture Committee, Waterpolo Club and Men's Volleyball Club.

By a vote of 12-10, the CC approved the WGSO budget of $975. The increased size of its budget sparked considerable debate although the allocation had been cut $225. Harry Kelly, Chairman of the Finance Committee, defended the Committee's grant saying, "the WGSO lecture program has been very successful in the past." The speakers it has chosen have generally attracted large audiences.

A nearly unanimous council vote denied the WAC sixty per cent of its originally requested allocation. The Finance Committee reduced the Action Coalition's speakers budget to $500 from $1200.

The ADA, "a lobbying self-education group," will receive $370. The budgets of both the ADA and the Williams Republicans, which received $330, include $300 for speakers and lecturers. The Council designated $875 for the budget of Williams Women, another public issues group.

In a 17-9 decision, the CC chose to approve a Water polo allocation of $376 with no subsidy for meals at away matches. Brian McDermott strongly opposed this move saying, "food is an essential for the team unlike the refreshments served by other clubs. Waterpolo players should not be taxed for the meals they miss."

According to John Simpson of the Finance Committee, "It is a policy of the committee not to pay for food." Kelly admitted that this policy, however, "has not always been enforced in the past." He went on to say that "it is technically the Food Service's responsibility to provide these funds, not Council's."

The Lecture Committee will receive $8500 this year. By Finance Committee stipulation, $5500 is to be used "for ventures initiated by other groups, i.e., faculty, departments, and student organizations." The Council also voted to give the Williams Independents $40.

Don Toumey charged that the Finance Committee "feels it has to cut" budget requests for each organization. Simpson explained that the committee "started with a zero-based budget and then added only those funds that could be justified." According to Kelly, "inevitably something of the arbitrary will be present in every decision we make."

Budget decreases 'CFM' program diversity

According to WCFM Program Director David Breuer, the cuts in funding proposed by the Finance Committee will hurt the radio station's capacity to provide diversified programming.

The Finance Committee pared approximately $1500 from the radio station's initial request of $10,000, proposing instead an annual budget of $8350. According to WCFM President Peter Green however, that figure is grossly inadequate. "We're going to require everything we asked for," Green said, "in order to maintain our present operations."

Green spoke of the need to replace stolen and aging equipment. The $10,000, he said, is not intended for capital expenses. Rather, as he explained, "it is necessary for the upkeep of our technical equipment."

Specifically, the Finance Committee cut two sets of headphones, one microphone boom, travelling expenses for the sports broadcasters, a phonolog, money for back-ordering of a large number of record albums, and the allocation for the station phone bill.

As Breuer explained, microphones seem to present a formidable problem. Without the headsets for the sports-casters, the station must dispatch the microphone it normally uses for production. Consequently, as Breuer observed, there has been a deterioration in the quality of that microphone and furthermore, as Green noted, the now commonplace situation of having three sports-casters huddled over one microphone at the away games cannot continue.

Another problem concerns the need for a microphone boom at the station news desk.

Green supported however the committee's idea for an ongoing depreciation fund which would provide for a new board for the station every ten years.

Lamb '71 becomes No. Adams mayor

Richard Lamb '71 won election to the position of mayor of North Adams Tuesday. Lamb, president of Lamb Paper Co. in North Adams, won by more than a 1050 vote margin out of a total vote exceeding 7100.

WCFM held elections for positions on its Board of Directors last Wednesday night.

Steve Jackson, former Business Manager of WCFM, was elected Station President on a platform of increasing station funds through appealing to new sources. John Svoboda was elected Station Manager.

Larry Sisson was elected Program Director and promised to increase WCFM's quality. Joe Avellar was re-elected News Director with Gregg Neville.

Also elected were:

Peter Stark - Production Director

Ed Mills - Student Engineer

Jeff Brinker, Dave Bennett - Sports Directors

Bill Beckett - Music Director

Tom Cox and Steve Case - Music Staff

Curt Denhart - Personnel Director

Steve Yavner - Public Relations Director

Tom Helde - Classical Music Director

Don Perry - Business Manager

These positions will become effective January 1st.

Town panel discusses social life

"Our uses of leisure time are a perfect example of the marvelous intertwining of a small college and a small town," Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad stated at Tuesday's panel discussion, "Social Life: Music, Pull Tabs and Pizza."

Last in a series of Williams Independents' panel discussions entitled, "Down From the Ivory Tower: Williamstown and the College," Tuesday's discussion focused on the College's relationship with the town in regard to the diverse social activities offered by both groups.

Panel members and the audience, which included a smattering of Williamstown residents, contributed views on the positive and negative aspects of this relationship and suggested ways to improve social events and alleviate problems between the College and town which arises from social activities.

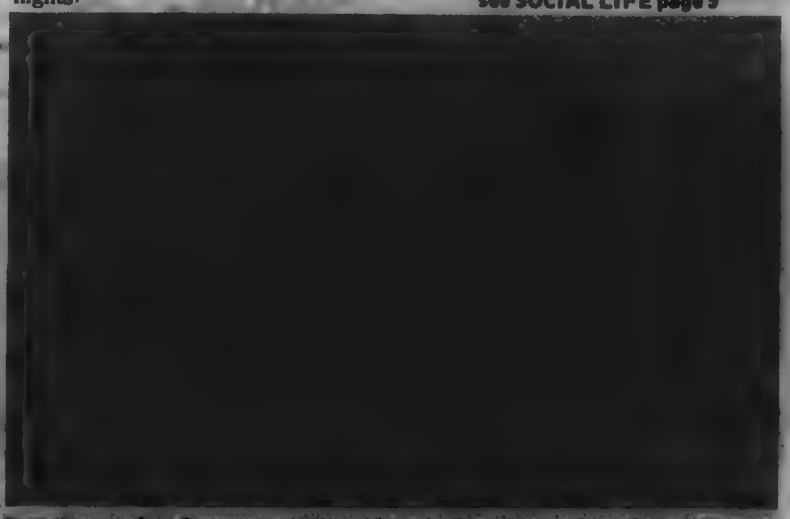
Roosenraad, presenting a general overview of the College-town relationship, said, "The nature of the College and the town are fundamentally intertwined." Williamstown provides the College with many services, including bookstores, food establishments and bars, while the College provides the town with activities, facilities and patronage in return.

On-campus activities received extensive discussion—since, as Roosenraad explained, "The social scene on campus has become competitive, but has become diverse, since Williams opened to women. Before, the number of students who stayed on campus during weekends could not support a wide range of social activities."

House activities

House activities compose a major portion of the social events, and the expansion of social activities have contributed to making the house social chairman's duties more difficult, according to Prospect House Social Chairman Tom Kondel '78. "You must plan ahead to avoid the conflict of several parties on one weekend, and come up with crazy gimmicks, like the Star Wars party, to draw students to your party." Another problem he cited was advertising an admission price for a party, to which another house may respond by sponsoring a party the same night, but charging one dollar less.

"We need more communication between houses to stop these problems. We shouldn't have them on a campus this size." Panel moderator Mike Lissack '80, president of Williams Independents, then commented that a group composed of the social chairmen of each house will form a committee over Winter Study to solve the problem of coordinating the social activities of these 15 autonomous institutions.



Other problems resulting from house activities include noise, vandalism, and a drain on business at the Log while houses sponsor parties. Lissack explained that noise and vandalism are not too severe, as each house's by-laws provide that everything be shut off by 1:00 a.m. on Friday and 2:00 a.m. on Saturday nights.

An alternative to campus parties which provokes some controversy among townspeople is the Log. Manager Claudia Lindsey '77, explained that the Log is "a place to gather in an informal atmosphere any night of the week," and thus, is "a valuable asset to college life." However, its situation in a commercial and residential area creates tensions with members of the community.

"We do have a problem with rowdiness, but it is, to a certain extent, exaggerated." Explaining that students are well informed of the problem, and they have arranged to have security outside the Log at closing time, she stated, "The problem has been dealt with as well as we can."

One town resident asked why the college bar could not be located on campus. Roosenraad explained that in addition to there being no other available building, "If the Spring St. area had an environment totally out of character with a college pub atmosphere, we would not have located it there. But the street is still commercial, even at 3 and 4 a.m."

Dearth of NET lines impede long-distance calls past 11pm

Students who make their long distance phone calls after 11 p.m. will continue to be frustrated by the lack of open outside lines for some time, according to College Business Manager Shane Riorden.

Riorden said that he spoke to a representative of the New England Telephone and Telegraph Company after a Williams switchboard operator called his attention to students' continued complaints. According to the NET&T office in Pittsfield, a survey was recently made of the telephone traffic in Williamstown and North Adams during low-rate long distance time slots. The results of the study indicated a definite need for more long distance trunks, or wires, in the area.

"The problem is not one with the college centrex system," Riorden said. "The extra lines would be installed by the phone company, at its cost. In that case, it's anybody's guess as to when the improvements will be made."

Riorden speculated that the low rates late in the evening probably account for the sudden jamming of lines, but said that he "had no idea what would suddenly make the problem crop up this year" as opposed to previously.

Fast for social consciousness

by Mary McCord

The Williams Hunger Action Project in conjunction with Oxfam-America, is calling for the members of the Williams community to abstain from solid food on Friday November 18 in support of the nationwide "Fast for a World Harvest." This call is made with the belief that the most enduring form of raised social consciousness is constituted by an active, intelligent change in personal lifestyle—a change based on the kind of critical awareness and human empathy that this fast attempts to dramatize.

What is an appropriate response to the fact that hundereds of thousands of people, both in the United States and overseas, can not afford enough food to sustain a normal healthy life? The answer is not at all clear, but it is clear that 1,800 Williams students not eating for one day and sending the money saved to development projects is not by itself going to make major changes in the way either rich or poor people live.

So why fast?

First, we feel that the money raised will not be insignificant. Food services will give a $2.20 refund for each student who agrees to fast. Half of this money will be sent through Oxfam to projects in the Third World which are assisting small farmers and landless peasants address what the local population feels are its most pressing needs. The cause of hunger is complex, and, as Oxfam recognizes, any lasting solution will require more than just giving food to hungry children. The other half of the money raised will go to the Eastern Farmworkers association (EFWA). EFWA is an organization of unemployed and low-income people, mostly farm-workers, in Suffolk County, Long Island. They are working to improve the living conditions of their members through a number of benefits programs, including a free health clinic, free legal advice, and emergency food and clothing projects.

The second reason for the fast is that we feel an appropriate response requires more from us than just sending our money to others and asking them to deal with the problem while we continue life as usual. The way we live our lives is not independent of how others live theirs. The complex economic, political and social forces which sustain our lifestyles, also sustain the kind of poverty which deprives millions of people of an adequate diet. In calling for a "raised social consciousness" we do not mean to dictate conclusions, but we are insisting that as members of the Williams College community we come to terms with the broader implications of the lifestyle we lead here, and will lead after we leave here. We hope that this fast will begin the kind of critical discussion and reflection that are the foundation of any lasting change.

Sign up tables for the fast will be set up at major dining halls during dinner Friday Nov. 11, dinner Sunday Nov. 13, and lunch and dinner Monday Nov. 14 and Tuesday Nov. 15th. All pledges must be in by 7:30 p.m. Tuesday. There will also be an envelope for pledges outside the student activities office in Baxter.

There will also be a panel discussion at 6 p.m. on Friday in Dodd House Living Room, on what kind of long term involvement is effective, and possible for us to participate in.

Letters: sexist sallies, balance re Bakke

Bakke: Quality vs Category

To the editor:

Despite the fact that Mr. Gates attends medical school, he enjoys cutting down its admission process because it selects unqualified candidates who in his opinion qualify on "objective" criteria. Perhaps he should rethink his medical career and let another "more qualified" student become a doctor.

The only point that I can agree on is that minority students are not "unequivocably unqualified," as we hastily indicated, but that they are lesser qualified. He skirts around the race problem entirely by attacking current admissions procedures. Who is he fooling? Maybe the admissions process should not be based on scores and grades only, but nowhere in his response does he name a medical school which uses other criteria for their white applicant pool. Only minority students are entitled to this privilege and that's a denial of 14th Amendment protection.

Take a look at the issue from the medical schools view. They would be taking a major risk to suddenly shift to a system in which all students were evaluated primarily on non-traditional standards. How is a college supposed to select the entire applicant group out of a hodge-podge of Russian Lit. majors who emptied bed-pans and a collection of social science majors who can't stand the unequal distribution of doctors? There have to be some minimum standards of medical aptitude but drawing the line will create the same problem all over. And what happens to the serious white student who scores well on the MCAT, gets good grades and seriously wants to study medicine? Should he be excluded from the profession because he doesn't have a glowing personality? What if he can't impress an interviewer that he doesn't care about success, but that he only wants to help welfare patients? What if he had the potential to discover a cure for cancer? Would this be a fair admissions process from a social point of view?

Then Mr. Gates has the nerve to claim that Bakke is unqualified on the basis of Mr. Gates' own standards. I am inclined to agree with many of the points he lists; unfortunately, they are irrelevant to the Constitutional issue at hand. Only the standards of the U.C. Davis School of Medicine are important and, on the basis of those, Bakke was as or better qualified than many of the students admitted under the special admissions program. Gates toots legal scholar Charles Lawrence's argument that Bakke was not excluded, but that others "could do the job better." What and who this refers to is unclear. If anything, it may go against much of what Gates claims. Let us assume, as Gates does, that all those admitted to Davis' Medical School are highly qualified. Why then does the medical school have to have a separate admissions program? There are only two answers. Either they are not as qualified, in which case Bakke does have a legitimate Constitutional claim, or the percentage of most-highly qualified students is out of proportion to that of black and white populations. I doubt that as this self-appointed judge of human potential, Mr. Lawrence, indicates, the students were able to do the job better. If the proportions are out of line, then it is a case of high-school and college preparation. This becomes an entirely different issue. With the increased Federal aid to colleges and secondary schools, those percentages have steadily come into line. The critical question becomes: why can't we just wait? I realize that there are social ills in our inner cities, but why should we ameliorate them with artificial means? We have cheapened the struggle of minorities to "make it" by artificially elevating them to a point of equality. When and where does this end? How will minorities react to the dismantling of special admissions programs when they are able to stand on their own feet? Will that falling out create more of a violent reaction then the current problems facing medical schools?

It is interesting to note that immigrants who lived in worse conditions than in our inner cities today never rioted for special programs. They worked within the system. Perhaps the programs and promises of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society elevated expectations to the point that minorities are no longer willing to wait and work within the system. Have we institutionalized a system where the best and brightest don't succeed in order to keep minorities at bay? I am not advocating an application of Social Darwinism, but let's be honest with ourselves for a change. Gates claims that current admissions procedures and standards are creating an undesirable "batch" of doctors. Doesn't he realize that special admissions programs will toughen-up the competition for whites even more, as fewer spaces are available? Is this the type of process that he favors? I sincerely doubt it, but his defense of special programs only exacerbates what he terms as an intolerable situation.

Whites who see themselves as fit to achieve and are continually denied their chance will react just as violently as blacks in the sixties who saw no opportunity for improvement. Perhaps we should move to a balanced system before it's too late. If the political process continues to neglect and abuse the white middle-class, this is certainly a facet, then the resulting clamor will create a greater crisis than any denial of admissions to minorities ever was.

Respectfully,
Robert M. Schwartz

Blind to sexism

To the editor:

To you, the cream of the crop, the educated, the enlightened and aware of the Williams community, whose exceptional backgrounds or outstanding performance has allowed you to make it one more step on your path to success:

Please explain to me how you can be so incorrigibly blind. Somehow I prefer the adjective blind to misogynous simply because I bull-headedly insist in believing in the advancement or educability of people at large. I am beginning to believe that that is my mistake, not my feminist or radical tendencies which I have so often been told were impractical, irrational, or simply meaningless.

Do you realize what you are implying when you sing your rugby songs about gang-bangs or fucking corpses? When you merely laugh at a woman selling beer with silicone breasts and hot-pants? When you throw a blown-up mannekin (womannekin?) with blood on her underwear into the reserve room? Can you see nothing beyond the immediacy of your security and conformity with your peers in a small, isolated, "liberal arts college in the Berkshires" to the symbolism and greater meaning of your actions in the world at large?

I am increasingly amazed—or is alarmed a better word—with how little it takes to be considered radical here. It has been brought to my attention that Williams Women is often misconstrued as being a lesbian organization. Suppose this were true—considering above-mentioned incidences and attitudes what do you see as the rational alternative? Don't you consider it a little sad that in an enlightened community such as this WGSO finds it necessary to keep their meetings confidential? How many of you are offended by or nervously giggle at the Peer Health Counseling display at the library? Why is feminism or activism a dirty word to so many of you?

At one time I considered myself open-minded. However, it becomes increasingly apparent to me that there is a certain lack of introspection, prevalent on this campus, that I find totally incomprehensible. Asking people to change may be a bit presumptuous, but could you at least try to look at and listen to yourselves?

With hope and trepidation,
Judy Nitchie '79

Event deplored

To the editor:

I would like to make public my protest to a disgusting display that took place on Monday night in the library. A group of sophomore boys entered the reserve room and sang a song about road tripping and screwing women, referring to "dumb Holyoke women" among other things. Not only were the words to the song crass and lewd, but these boys carried a blown up woman doll dressed in underwear stained with blood. They threw this woman down the steps of the reserve room as a crowd gathered below. Some people applauded when they finished.

Later when I confronted one student who ran up the stairs to accompany his "friends", he said, "come on, it was my entry." I am sick and tired of drunken boys singing obscene songs about women's reproductive organs and screwing women under the guise of male comradery and entry unity. Williams College is almost 50 per cent women now and such a performance is an unconscionable affront to the women here. In addition, it was offensive to the men who do not want to be associated with that perverse image of maleness. I am tired of laughing at actions that degrade us all.

Yard by yard we fight our way

Sincerely,
Valerie A. Andersen '78

Disgusting Display

To the editor:

We would like to express our disgust with the incident that occurred last Monday night, November 7, in the reserve room of Sawyer library. It concerned several male members of the student body who, together, totally insulted and offended the women of this campus. Through the vulgar use of an obscenely dressed inflatable doll, and the degrading references made to the female anatomy, they typified the lack of respect that Williams women receive on this campus. It is obvious that no level of communication and understanding will be achieved until we all have the common decency to respect one another. Such incidents not only serve to destroy the unity of the College, but infringe upon our rights as human beings. Therefore, the demeaning nature of public vulgarities and insults directed towards Williams women should not be tolerated.

Very sincerely,
Deb Martindale

Petitions protest

Record editors suppress ad

The Record editorial board voted Wednesday night to cancel the third Schlitz Beer "Dean of Beer" advertisement. The Record printed advertisements featuring a woman named Siglinda Steinfuller on October 25 and November 4 and was scheduled to run a third advertisement November 18.

Editor-in-chief Scott Fenn announced that "The editorial board tonight agreed that it would not run the last in a series of three Schlitz beer advertisements on the basis of the fact that a sizeable number of students and faculty on this campus were offended by the ad and felt it was demeaning to women.

"In addition the editorial board agreed to hold an open meeting in the future in which Record ad policy could be discussed."

Two members of the board and the advertising manager met with two members of Williams Women Monday night to discuss the ad. The Record stated that the editorial board would meet at dinner Wednesday to decide how to deal with the ads. At that meeting the board did not reach a consensus whether the third ad should be printed or cancelled, but instructed the advertising manager to seek an alternative Schlitz beer ad for the November 18 issue.

The editor-in-chief and the managing editors returned to the newspaper office to find it occupied by approximately fifty students waiting to hear the board's decision. When Fenn announced that the paper would not reach a decision on the ad until the advertising manager had looked into alternatives, the group remained, demanding that the editorial board ban the ad they deemed sexist.

The group presented the editor-in-chief with a series of petitions signed by students and faculty opposing the ad. Valerie Anderson '78 handed Fenn a mimeographed statement including two demands: that the Record "not print the third in the series of 'Dean of Beers' ads and do not accept this ad again," and that the paper state an advertising policy to all prospective advertisers claiming that the Record will "not accept ads of a sexist nature."

After discussing sexism and the rights of a minority for about 45 minutes, the editorial board left the office to confer.

When they returned, Fenn announced the decision to suppress the ad and to discuss ad policy in an open meeting.

Homecoming Concert

Kalapana, Stanky Brown perform

Kalapana, Hawaii's premiere contemporary rock band, will be the featured attraction in tonight's Homecoming concert at Chapin Hall. Tickets will be available at the door starting at 7:15, and are $3.00 for Williams students and their guests. Doors open at 7:30, and the concert will begin at 8:00.

Kalapana's appearance marks their official East Coast concert debut. The group has broken box office records in Hawaii set by Elton John and the Rolling Stones, and have also become a major West Coast attraction (last Thursday, they sold at Royce Hall at UCLA at $6.50 at seat.) Kalapana has been receiving considerable airplay in the Northeast (WWOM-FM in Albany featured the group on Monday night), and radio stations in both Massachusetts and New York have contacted the ACEC and are sending representatives to cover the event.

Also appearing is the Stanky Brown Group, a six-piece rock 'n roll band which has recently completed tours with Kansas, Renaissance, New Riders, and the Doobie Brothers. WNEW, New York's largest radio station, recently selected Stanky Brown as one of the three most popular new bands. The group has two albums under their belt, with a third scheduled to be recorded soon.

Ironically, the ACEC had contacted Stanky Brown weeks ago, before Cheap Trick was even considered. Treasure was originally announced as Trick's replacement, but when it was learned that Stanky Brown was available after all, they were, according to ACEC Chairman Steve Case, "signed within minutes."

According to Case, "A lot of students seem to be under the illusion that this is a cheap concert for us to stage, and that we're out to make money." Case explained that for—"sound & lights alone, this production cost $1000. Even if we sell out, we'll lose money on the concert."

As a result of the Cheap Trick postponement," Case added, "public opinion of the ACEC has reached an all-time low. After this concert, I think you'll find that it will hit an all-time high. The people who attend are going to love it, and the people who don't are going to regret it. Either way we'll come out ahead."

Tonight at Clark

Marlotti gives concert

American pianist Vincent Marlotti has played to standing ovations from enthusiastic audiences in Europe, South America, Canada, and the United States. He will perform at the Clark Art Institute tonight at 8:30. The program will range from the classical composers to the romantics, and from a Bach prelude and fugue as transcribed by Franz Liszt to Samuel Barber's Sonata for Piano. Schubert's Impromptu in E-flat major and two preludes by Gabriel Faure are on the program as well. The famous Appassionata Sonata in F-minor by Beethoven will be a feature presentation; Chopin's Ballade in F-minor is also included.

Vincent Marlotti, presently on the faculty of the Hartt College of Music in Connecticut, studied with the renowned French pedagogue Isadore Philippe and the Russian virtuoso Simon Barere. Later studies were at the Mannes College of Music in New York, where he subsequently taught.

Admission to this evening's concert at the Clark will be $1 for students and $2 for the general public.

Local sculptor's show opens

This afternoon, "George Rickey: Drawings for Sculpture" opened at the Williams College Museum of Art with a reception for the artist. The exhibition is comprised of thirty-five drawings and four sculptures by this internationally-known kinetic sculptor (from the Williamstown area).

The drawings included in the exhibition were made by the artist as studies for his kinetic work. They range from rapid sketches to carefully detailed technical "working" drawings, from notations of ideas to be explored in sculpture to calculated plans for the execution of a commissioned work.

In the catalogue written by Lucinda A. Barnes, a graduate art student at Clark Art Institute, the nature of Rickey's drawings and their relation to his kinetic sculpture is discussed. "As studies which explore esthetic problems and work out technical considerations, Rickey's drawings for sculpture enable one to see ideas come to the surface, develop, undergo modifications, and be transformed into finished works. The drawings offer within a limited space a unique opportunity to see the evolution and scope of his work in sculpture, while they simultaneously document the process through which the works were created."

A collection of drawings by a renowned sculptor is a rare sort of exhibition and provides the unusual opportunity for the viewer to share in the artist's progressing vision of his work. The Rickey exhibition extends through December 11.

Clark presents Laughton films

Charles Laughton's most famous screen characterizations will be featured in a series of five successive Tuesday-evening films to be presented from November 8 to December 6 at the Clark Art Institute. The films illustrate Laughton's amazing performance range, his acting ability, and his versatility, and range in date from 1935 (Ruggles of Red Gap) to 1957 (Witness for the Prosecution). Admission will be $1. A complete schedule of the films follows:

Nov. 8 at 7:30 Ruggles of Red Gap (1935; 90 min.) Directed by Leo McCarey, with Mary Boland, Charles Ruggles, and Zasu Pitts. Laughton, who won a New York Film Critics Award for Best Actor for this performance, plays a ramrod butler in the Old West in this knockabout comedy.

Nov. 15 at 7:30 Rembrandt (1936; 84 min.) Directed by Alexander Korda, with Elsa Lanchester and Gertrude Lawrence. Laughton is impressive in this realistic biography of the Dutch master.

Nov. 22 at 7:30 Hunchback of Notre Dame (1939; 115 min.) Directed by William Dieterle, with Maureen O'Hara, Cedric Harwicke, Edmond O'Brien. Laughton, playing the hunchbacked bell-ringer in medieval Paris, turns in a heart-wrenching performance in this dramatization of the Victor Hugo classic.

Nov. 29 at 7:30 Witness for the Prosecution (1957; 114 min.) Directed by Billy Wilder, with Marlene Dietrich, Tyrone Power, and Elsa Lanchester. This is an effective London courtroom drama based on an Agatha Christie story, with Laughton as the defense attorney.

Dec. 6 at 7:30 The Private Life of Henry VIII (1933; 98 min.) Directed by Alexander Korda, with Elsa Lanchester, Merle Oberon. Laughton's wonderfully robust Henry won him an Academy Award for this performance.

Charles Laughton in "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," to be screened Tuesday, November 22, at 7:30, at the Clark Art Institute.

First books of American authors exhibit at Chapin

A showing of first books by American authors is featured in an exhibit which runs through December 9 at the Chapin Library on the Williams College Campus.

Twenty-six authors, including William Cullen Bryant, Stephen Crane, T. S. Elliot, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Mark Twain and Walt Whitman are represented by their earliest separate publications. Another nine authors will be represented by their first books. According to Robert L. Volz, Custodian of the Chapin Library, earliest separate publications and first books are quite rare since they were written before an author had established a literary reputation. Publishing costs of first books, for example, may well have been covered by the author himself or by friends and family.

The exhibition has been prepared as a tribute to the late John S. Van E. Kone '28, a leading rare book dealer in New York City.

The exhibition is free and open to the public.

Rescue team searches for students

By David Sorkin

In recent weeks, several Williams students have mysteriously disappeared into the confines of Sawyer Library, and reliable sources believe that they may still be there.

In an attempt to recover these young men and women, The Williams Record, has dispatched a rescue expedition. This expedition, which hopes to continue long enough to be accepted as a student initiated Winter Study Project, is now conducting a book-to-book search in the reading room. Although many of the pith helmet-clad searchers, snooping around with magnifying glasses and pickaxes, have been mistaken for librarians or overly zealous members of the honor and discipline committee, their quest continues unabated.

No one knows exactly what has happened to the missing students but several theories prevail. One holds that these students accidentally entered emergency exit corridors and were too embarrassed to use the phones to call security. Biology and psychology professors were called in and testified that with a few candy bars and a deck of playing cards such students could hold out for weeks, but this explanation remains tenuous at best.

Others have been propounding the view that some freshmen, sitting in the bi-level carrels for the first time, were overcome by claustrophobia and became unable to move. This reaction, reminiscent of being in a spaceship for the first time, has been well documented by researchers who report unexplained cravings for Tang among students in the reading room. Unfortunately, aerial reconnaissance flights by college U2's have turned up no missing students, although several thermonuclear missiles were found in the political science section.

Investigators are, thus, coming to the conclusion that the students may be in Sawyer, as one security man reported, "for purposes of or relating to study." This presents many unforesees difficulties. A simple rescue may no longer be possible, and students may have to be convinced to come out. Last week, for instance, loud speaker trucks rumbled through the fourth floor blaring constant reminders that fall break did not apply to one's posterior. This tactic snapped the concentration of several of the more prominent students, including Harry "Stacks" Shack, head of the All College Study Committee, and Bob "Biblio" Brown, captain of the Metaphysics Team.

Nevertheless, many have not been found, and there is much that the student in the street can do to help. If, for instance, the layman spots someone wedged between volumes II and III of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, emergency action may be necessary. Mouth-to-book resuscitation is usually unsuccessful, only causing the victim to become more obdurate. A sympathetic opening such as, "I hear that Gibbon is at the Log tonight," or "Et tu, Brute?" is much more appropriate.

Once a rapport has been established, the student may be coaxed down from his carrel or desk. At this point, a good idea might be to feed him some apple sauce or chicken soup. Under no circumstances should the student be brought to Baxter Hall. This has been known to produce a condition resembling one death among those whose natural resistance to such dishes as Spanish rice or pork cutlet has broken down. Other actions that can be taken to free the MIS's (Missing in Sawyer) include writing to your congressman, buying bumper stickers, and boycotting grapes.

There is also the hope (ed. note: the article ends here, remaining uncompleted since the author's mysterious disappearance in Sawyer on November 1. Any information concerning the whereabouts of the author or any of the missing should be sent to:

Town-student panel debates effects of community on College social life

Unlike any other town establishments, she explained, "the Log is a business and a service and we often extend ourselves beyond what a sensible business would undertake."

Finally, Roosenraad commented, "On the few occasions when there has been an inappropriate interaction with patrons of the Log and neighbors, college security and the town police have tried to make an immediate response."

Coffee House

"One of the most relaxing atmospheres you can find on campus," the Coffee House provides free live professional entertainment on most Saturday nights, according to Coffee House co-manager Paul Goren '80. Students have the opportunity to perform before a live audience as the warm-up acts before the show. All performers, including students, are paid through the Coffee House's budget from the College Council.

ACEC

Steve Case, ACEC chairman, explained that ACEC attempts to accommodate all musical tastes by scheduling more concerts with different types of music. Although, because of their limited budget, this forces them to book primarily new groups, Case feels that this does not detract from the quality of the concert. "People consider groups they haven't heard of as 'not good'" he explained. "But these groups try harder to put on a good concert because they aren't well known."

However, Chapin Hall's capacity is the ACEC's "main problem." Since it seats only 1,000, Case said, "It limits the groups you can get."

In addition to these on-campus activities, the college community directly interacts with the town community through activities sponsored by town residents.

Church option

Rev. Robert Moore of the United Methodist Church described the ways that students involve themselves in "activities beyond services." Students teach Sunday school, lead church youth programs, sing in choirs and belong to several religious and religiously affiliated organizations.

Rev. Moore summed up the college-community interaction in religious affairs with, "Churches provide the opportunity to participate in religious activities beyond services, and students contribute to all of them."

Town Businesses

The managers of two business establishments on Spring St. emphasized the importance of student patronage. Pizza parlor manager Constantine Anagnos bought his second establishment because "there wasn't enough space in Colonial Pizza to satisfy the weekend crowds." Images Cinema manager Black McClenachan stated emphatically, "we couldn't exist without the College." However, the theater does not cater to the college community at the exclusion of town residents. "We are flexible enough to take care of most peoples' tastes."

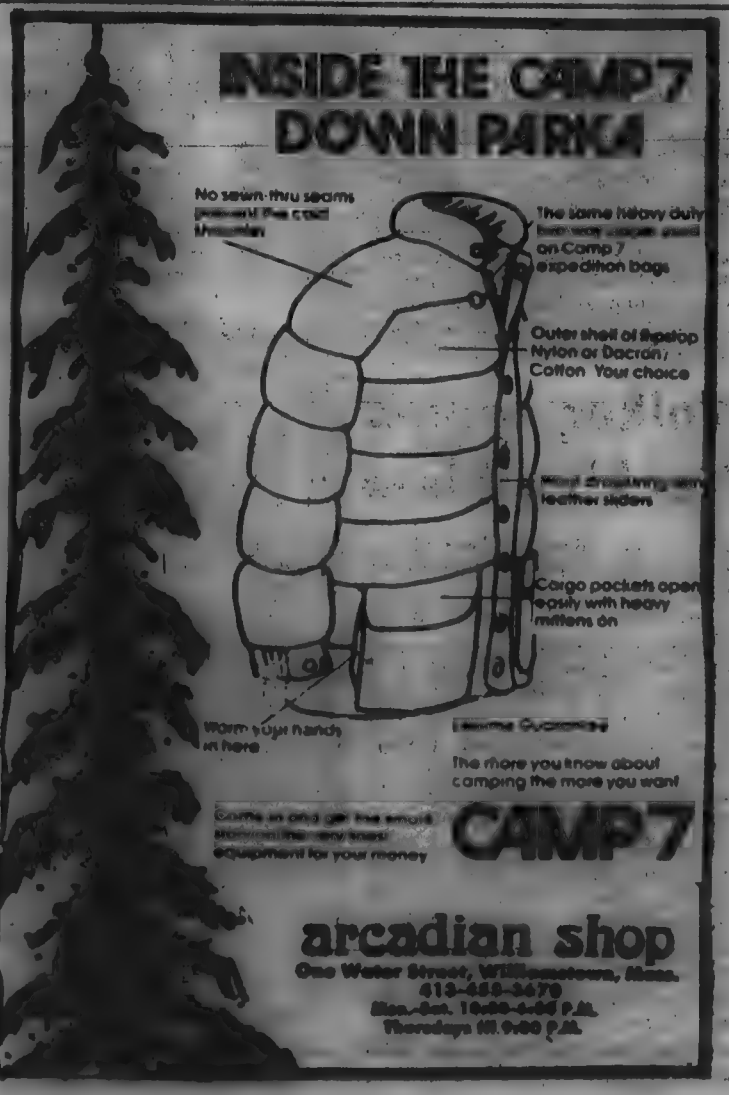
before and will play the right guard spot. Joe Maguire, Kenny Schoetz, Bob VanDore, and Steve Rogers, along with tight ends Todd Eckerson and Kurt Anderson will open the holes for the Purple backs.

The job of containing Newman will fall principally in the hands of defensive ends Mike Masi and Russ Gee, along with the terrible trio of Pete Tuttle, Brian Benedict, and Colin Hart. John Thiel and Phil Shuman, with six interceptions between them, will back the defensive front wall.

Greg Wallenda, er, McAleenan, and Mark Gerry are the Purple corners, with Andy Krakauer at rover, and Long Ellis at safety.



The whole season has come down to 1:30 on Weston Field, mutterings of "there's no tomorrow," or "this is for the whole ball of wax" are unnecessary.

GOAL POST LAW Chapter 266 Section 104-A (Mass. General Laws) states: "Whoever willfully and without right destroys, injures or removes a goal post on a football field shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty nor more than two-hundred dollars."

Gridders meet favored Jeffs

by Tim Layden

For anyone who is truly fed right up to here with all that talk about Williams-Amherst, traditional rivalries, the Little Three, and all the that other stuff; and for anyone who's plum sick of hearing just how important one little 'ole football game is—well, there's only one place for you to be Saturday, and it ain't hovering over a bottle of Pepto-Bismol to rid yourself of gridiron indigestion—it's down on the bleachers of Weston Field.

This Saturday at 1:30, the lean and hungry (actually not so lean) Amherst Lord Jeffs roll into Williamstown looking for their first outright Little Three championship since 1966, and their first win in Williamstown since just slightly after the day James Phinney Baxter got his first driver's license. If you've never liked the savagery and violence (or the pageantry and color) of college football, tomorrow is the time to learn. For about the sixth time in Coach Don Odell's seven years at Williams, the Ephs enter the Amherst game decided underdogs. Amherst is a fine 5-1-1 on the season, while the Purple Cows are 4-3. Everyone, except of course, "the experts", knows that only two inches of goal post and two yards of turf separate Williams from 6-1, but after Saturday, 5-3 would taste just as good.

"We're smartin' from this year, and we're smartin' from last year at Amherst," says Odell, "and now we're lying in the weeds waiting for them." Amherst struggled to a 2-5 mark before THE GAME last fall, but put it all together for a 16-0 shutout of a Williams team emotionally drained from a 34-7 rout of favored Wesleyan.

"We're in a better position than we were last year," remarks Odell, "I think we beat Wesleyan too easily last fall. This year we played good, solid football against them, and our attitude heading into Amherst is much better."

The Lord Jeff eleven Williams will be facing tomorrow afternoon is one of the best in recent years. The only blemishes on their record are a tie with A.I.C. (14-14) and a close loss to Springfield (9-6). Since Tufts has already cornered the market on "Jumbo," Amherst will have to settle for "Hippo," but no matter how you slice it, the '77 Jeffs are big.

Williams chief scout Bernie Lincalis Amherst signal-caller Mike Newman. "the best quarterback Williams has faced all year," and indeed the slippery senior not only has a fine arm and good speed, but stays in the pocket about as often as T.C.U. beats Texas, and moves in ice, mud, and snow like a waterbug. He's the biggest problem we've got," says Odell, "without him they'd be nowhere near as dangerous."

Newman's favorite target is a 6-7 giraffe in Purple stripes named Bill Swiacki, a marvelous athlete who has helped beat Williams in football, basektball, and baseball. Two years ago Scott Perry (who?) toyed with the sophomore Swiacki. Greg McAleenan will try to do the same tomorrow, against a veteran Swiacki.

Steve Hurwitz and converted quarterback Mark Manning are Newman's other receivers, with the Jeff ground game centering around Bill Sternberg and Mark Newton. The Jeffs are a passing team which relies on the big play and an early lead; Williams' objective Saturday is to prevent both, and put the pressure on Amherst's as yet untested intestinal fortitude (e.g.-guts).

In Mike Healy, Amherst has a thunderfooted field goal kicker who has knocked home four three-pointers from outside the 40, and this is a big edge. His 47-yarder beat Wesleyan, 16-14. "We just can't give them good field position," comments Odell, "our special teams have to play well." If Wesleyan is an indication, that should be no problem. The Cards had no punt returns, and averaged only 7 yards on kickoff returns.

Linebackers Doug Moses and Sean Clancy (a prospect as a defensive back) key the Amherst defense. At 180 pounds, defensive end Ralph Knode is the smallest Jeff defender. "I don't know how he got in there," says Lamb, "I think they carry him onto the field at the start of the game." The Lord Jeffs gamble on defense, and have been pretty successful, with numerous stunts and blitzes.

The Williams full house was 33's (Nuzzolese) over 8's (Collins) last weekend, and quarterback Bill Whelan and Odell plan to use it some more this week. Nuzzolese and Collins will be joined by Scott Harrington and, if he's healthy, Dave Massucco in the backfield. Herb McCormick and Ken Hollingsworth have caught 24 and 12 passes, respectively and are Whelan's favorite outside targets.

Sophomore Jay Skerry injured a knee Tuesday and will miss the game. Senior Brian Fales has been here

Jumbo victory psyches soccermen

by Mark Pogue

Mr. Jeff Vennell is no stranger to the summits of Fame and Glory. In his seven-year reign as soccer coach at Williams Vennell has turned out an undefeated team (1971). He has coached an All-American player (John Buehler '73). He has captured the Eastern College Athletic Conference soccer championship (1972).

But there's still a yawning open space on the top of Vennell's dresser, and the trophy that belongs here will read "We Defeated Amherst!". Jeff Vennell, you see, has never beaten the Lord Jeffs in a regular season game. Williams, believe it or not, has beaten its rival only once (1970) since the turn of the decade, twice (1969,70) since the year of the Superball (1965), and 14 times since the annual series began 56 years ago. Today soccer is the only sport in which Amherst regularly whips its Northern founder, and it is largely for this reason that tomorrow's game on Cole Field means so much to Vennell and his players. The Ephmen want to win it. Bad.

Williams picked up some important emotional momentum on Tuesday by erasing the Tufts Jumbos, 4-0. Ankle-deep floodwaters forced the teams to play on a mammoth 65,000 sq. ft. alternate playing field, but the increased romping room only emphasized the Ephbooters' superior speed and ball skills. At 30:55 trailer Henry Osborne converted a penalty kick to put the Jums down one. Fifteen minutes later Greg Hartman made it 2-0 when his knee-high fastball caught Tufts goalie John Rosiana toppling helplessly into the mud.

In the second half Tufts regrouped and began to knock on Williams' door, but sophomore goalminder Doug Orr came up with three clutch saves to preserve the lead. "Orr didn't make a mistake all day," Vennell synopsized. "His judgment in knowing when to hold the line and when to come out was excellent." The score went to 3-0, meanwhile, when John Friborg cut off a Tufts goal kick and redirected it into the Tufts net. With 9:09 left in the game Greg Hartman became the second-leading single-season soccer scorer in Williams history when he walloped home his ninth goal of the year. With a four-goal bulge Vennell cleared his bench and thoughts were turned to tomorrow's showdown.

Amherst comes to Williamstown with a 2-6-1 record, but years of experience show that numbers mean nothing in the year-end game of games. The Lord Jeffs were 0-8-1 last year before stunning the Ephs with a victory in double overtime. This year they play the same short, controlled game as Williams does, and will not hesitate to fire on goal from 25 yards and out. "Man for man it's very even, although we might have better individual skills at midfield," says Vennell. Co-captain Phil Thornton, whose ICBM from the wing killed Williams in 1975, will spearhead the Jeffs' four-forward offense; in the backfield co-captain Phil Scott, who's friendly when he's out of bounds, will be busy helping defend freshman Larkin Glazebrook's net.

The Ephmen will open in their normal 4-2-4 alignment, and they will be ready to play. "It's gonna be an intense game, but we're gonna be psyched," predicts fullback Bruce Camilleri. "Amherst has dominated this too long. Fri and I would really like to win this," says halfback Ted Rouse. "If we can convert our opportunities," ventures Vennell's oft-disappointed Voice of Experience more cautiously, "we can win. And it's always nice to beat your rival."

It's always nice—especially after a six year drought. And if Jeff Vennell and his Ephmen could possibly need one more incentive for winning tomorrow's soccer game, let the record show that the next goal Amherst scores will be its 100th against Williams since 1921.

Purple polomen face Jeffs tonight

The Williams Water Polo Team closes out the fall season with a game tonight against Amherst. Kicking off Homecoming, the Ephs are looking to avenge an 8-6 loss suffered earlier this year at Amherst. Water Polo action starts at 6:30 in Muir Pool, an exciting way to begin a great weekend.

Layden: 'The Walk Back to Cole Field House'

by Tim Layden

The logic of the situation is unmistakable. How Jeff Sagarin of the Boston Globe could make Williams 10-point to underdogs to Amherst is beyond me. After all, haven't all of Williams football victories come on homecoming Saturdays? And isn't this weekend homecoming in the Purple Valley? Face it, Williams does not lose homecoming games.

The Ephs are 0-3 at home this year, but none of those was against Amherst. No, Bob Odell hasn't gone running to George Steinbrenner or some equally illustrious alumnus and asked for gold jerseys (ala Notre Dame) and the Ephmen aren't even going to wear white. Saturday afternoon is a time to take it to an Amherst team which has been on easy street all year, and show them what life is like in the ghetto.

Rumor has it that four of Amherst's five wins came so easily and were out of reach so early that the Jeffs were scheduling classes for Saturday afternoons after 3:00. The Amherst offense still thinks "catch-up ball" is some sort of new and exciting food fight.

No, seriously, just because Coach Jim Ostendarp was seen cowering under a bench in the closing minutes of his team's 16-14 squeaker over Wesleyan with his hands cupped in front of his face saying "tell me when it's over," doesn't mean that they aren't a gutty fourth-quarter team.

Actually, the point of all this is that 1977 has been, in terms of wins and losses, a very successful year for Amherst. They've won five, lost just one, and tied one. Yet, they were very lucky to beat Wesleyan (a blocked field goal in the final two minutes), if the A.I.C. 14-14 tie had lasted another quarter they'd have lost badly, and the Springfield loss was a flukey mud bath, in which the rain may have saved the Lord Jeffs from a more severe defeat. If Williams keeps the invaders from the East from jumping out early, it'll come down to who has the bigger heart, and Williams has been pumping gallons of adrenalin all autumn long.

There were rumors that A.B.C. wanted to put Williams-Amherst on the tube as a regional telecast. There were rumors that Amherst nixed the deal for "philosophical" reasons, which is hunky-dory. I don't know if the thought of seeing Colin Hart roll his eyes back on regional television is terribly exciting, anyway. But, I wonder what the Amherst players think? I know what the Williams players think of the rumor, and it ain't too nice.

Senior offensive guard Brian Fales recalls something Carmen Palladino '76 once said: "everybody wants to win the last game of his life." Well, for at least eleven Williams seniors, Saturday's is the last game of their lives. It's been three years since Williams-Amherst was for the outright championship of the Little Three, and it's been nine years since Amherst beat Williams here on Weston Field.

Oh, and there's another pretty good reason why the Purple Cows have to win tomorrow. Whenever a Williams team beats Amherst here, the players walk to Cole Field House to shower, change, and celebrate. What happens if Williams loses? Well, nobody really knows what to do, so Williams naturally has to win, or else call someone from the class of '68 and ask them what to do.

So, it's pretty obvious that the players have all the inspiration they need to win the Little Three tomorrow afternoon. All that's left is for about 1,900 or so other folks to do their part toward making sure all those homecoming parties are victory celebrations. Wesleyan had a bonfire; Massachusetts doesn't allow such mischief. They had buttons printed up, it's too late for all that. How about this: we'll settle for about 1,500 or more Williams students arriving at Weston Field at about 12:30, going NUTS when the Ephs hit the turf.

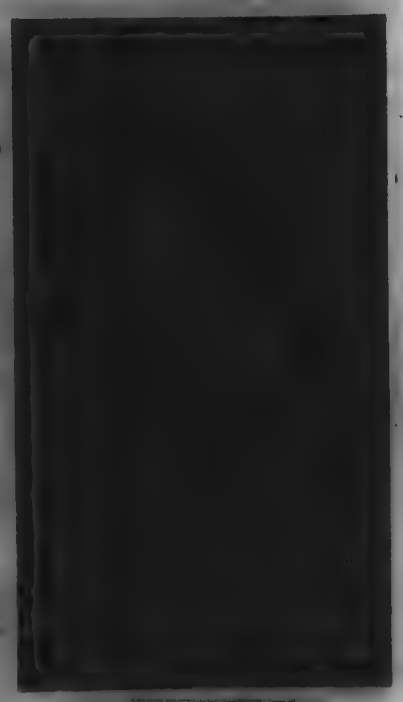
Sailors race for trophies

The week-end before Fall Break, the sailing team competed in the Smith Trophy at M.I.T. and placed 7th overall out of 20 schools. George Wilbanks and Ann Flocken placed 1st in A division. Rob Craig and Ann Maine placed 15th in B division. M.I.T., Coast Guard, and Tufts filled the top three places overall.

The weekend of fall break, the team competed for the Schell Trophy, the most prestigious regatta of the fall. The competition was tough and the team did not fair as well as hoped, finishing 13th overall out of 14 schools. Jeb Boucher and Lisa Greene got a slow start Sat., but improved Sun. to finish 10th in A division. John Hammel and alternate George Wilbanks with crew Mark Robinson got blown the wrong way, finishing 13th in B division.

With the fall racing finished, the team eagerly anticipates a winning spring season. A few team members plan to bring their own boats to school in hopes of some practice when the lakes thaw out in late March or April.

Ephs travel to Nationals



Tomorrow the undefeated varsity cross country team will close out its season at the NCAA Division III Championships in Cleveland. Seniors Frank Carr, Joe Kolb and Dan Sullivan, junior Tom Schreck and sophomores Mike Behrman and Garrick Leonard will be battling teams from Maine (Bates) to California (Occidental) in this large scale meet.

Coach Tony Plansky is quite certain the squad can top its 1975 19th place finish and secure a position among the best ten teams in the country. The toughest eastern competition for the Ephmen will be provided by Brandeis and arch rival Bates, while a host of midwestern schools, including North Central and Tri-State, will give the purple harriers some new faces to challenge.

Walker named Week's athlete

This week's Record Athlete of the Week is sophomore swimmer Keron Walker who placed first in three events last Friday against Mount Holyoke and Wellesley. Walker won the 100 yd. individual medley in 1:05.3, took the 50 yd. fly in a time of 28.8 and clocked a swift 25.2 split on the winning 200 yard freestyle relay. With the aid of her three firsts, the Eph mermaids racked up 99 points to top Holyoke with 87 points and Wellesley with 54.

HONORABLE MENTION—Sophomore soccer goalie Doug Orr received honorable mention for his 4-0 shutout of the Tufts Jumbos Tuesday. In three starts this season Orr has shut out Tufts and Bowdoin (2-0) and tied Harvard (3-3). "Doug didn't make a single mistake in the Tufts game," said Coach Jeff Vennell.

Dukakis ripostes on abortion, local economic development

by Nancy Richman

"This is a special event for me," began Governor Michael Dukakis at the opening of Friday evening's town meeting at Drury High School in North Adams. "We've been holding these town meetings for almost two years now," Dukakis continued, "and this is the first area that we've had an opportunity to come back to."

Dukakis responded to questions from the audience about a number of the important issues confronting the state and the northern Berkshire area today.

One issue of major concern was the possibility of the economic revitalization of the area. Dukakis spoke of his administration's efforts to improve the economic climate of the state as a whole and noted that over 200,000 more Massachusetts residents were working today than were working a couple of years ago. Still, Dukakis observed, much work remains to be done.

He spoke of the need for "an aggressive state government" working in conjunction with "good local leadership" in order to seek improvements. Dukakis observed that the state's joint efforts with the city of North Adams had resulted in a "good, comprehensive plan for the revitalization of the downtown area."

The governor noted that his administration is currently involved in similar negotiations concerning downtown Pittsfield. He reported that he personally had recently been in communication with executives from J. C. Penney and Jordan Marsh and that he anticipated that the major department stores would be deciding shortly whether they will establish outlets in this area.

Dukakis also spoke of the need to attract more businesses and industry to the state. As one woman at the meeting observed, "at least in North Adams, it seems as if the only alternatives to employment with the Sprague Electric Company here are the government sponsored CETA (Comprehensive Employment and Training Act) positions."

Area residents also expressed concern about the prospects for the development and improvement of Route 8. Dukakis assured them that "the era of massive multi-billion dollar highway projects is over" and that his administration would strive to develop the more essential arteries of transportation. He noted however that the completion of I-90 was the top interstate priority but stated that he expected that major plans would be formulated for Route 8 during the next year or so. "We're also interested in rail access to this area too," the Governor explained.

The most controversial topic of discussion by far in Friday's meeting concerned the allocation of state funds for abortion. Dukakis had recently vetoed a proposal for pay increases to state employees because attached to the bill was a rider which would have prohibited the use of state money for this purpose.

As Dukakis told a "Pro-life" supporter, "This is indeed a very difficult issue for everyone concerned. But I think that it is essential that we can debate this issue as an issue. I think that those legislators in the State House who feel strongly about this are hurting their cause by tacking it onto other badly needed programs."

Dukakis, however, went on to say that he personally supported the allocation of state funds for abortions. He said that he thought that the original Supreme Court decision which acknowledged a woman's right to decide for herself whether or not she wanted an abortion was a good one.

As Dukakis continued, "I do not understand how we can say to poor women that we're going to have two separate systems. The recent Supreme Court decision, I think, establishes a dual standard and I, in good conscience, would not want to establish that same standard in the Commonwealth."

Dukakis discussed a number of other important issues. He spoke of his opposition to the proposed establishment of casino gambling in the state. Instead, as he explained, "we have to concentrate on doing the kind of basic development job here that literally has not been done for many years." The governor explained that his reluctance to support the establishment of casinos was not inconsistent with his previous support of the state lottery. "I really have to admit," he said, "that I don't believe that there is anything unethical or morally wrong about it. I just believe that the more that you have, the more opportunities there are for 'funny business.'"

Dukakis also expressed his support for the right of state employees to unionize. He spoke about the need for Massachusetts localities to take advantage of the federally funded free breakfast program. He insisted on the importance of adequate citizen input in the allocation process of federal and state funds for human services. He talked about "the legitimate community concern about the pre-release facilities" located throughout the state yet noted their crucial importance as a part of a constructive correctional system. Finally, Dukakis spoke about an ongoing study examining the problems of the present structure of the state's higher education system, noting the need for greater coordination between the state universities, the state colleges, and the community colleges.

by Tim Layden

All the proper omens were there Saturday. It was homecoming, and Williams never loses on homecoming. The varsity soccer team beat the Amherst Lord Jeffs, which they never do. The frosh football team lost to their Amherst counterparts, an occurrence which has preceded a varsity triumph several hours later three times in four years. There was really no way the Eph gridders were to lose on Saturday November 12, 1977.

Expert addresses China WSP

Charles Abrams, chairman of the China Trade Corporation and recently described as "one of the pioneer Americans" in the People's Republic of China, spoke before a group of students in the Spencer House living room. The talk was held in conjunction with the "Williams in China" WSP headed by Prof. John Eusden, Prof. Peter Frost and Michael Lissack '80 and involving a group of 17 students.

Abrams, a businessman who has visited mainland China 19 times, described that country as "structured like the largest corporation in the world." He claimed that his company acts as China's "external marketing arm" in the United States. The China Trade Corporation, which has cultivated trade relations with China for the last five years, markets silk goods, sporting goods and some alcoholic beverages.

According to Abrams, the goal of the Chinese is "to make life better for each other." He explained that the primary aim of the government in 1949 was to establish agricultural self-sufficiency, and afterwards undertake industrial development. Because of this policy, he claimed, "the PRC is only about six years into its industrial boom."

Abrams described the Chinese educational system as the "backbone of the society." He compared Chinese schools to "discipline-oriented" American parochial schools. While he emphasized differences between American and Chinese college life, he declared that the "thoughts and activities" of students in the two countries are "nearly identical."

Regarding China's leasing of the port of Hong Kong to Great Britain, Abrams described the late Mao Tse Tung as "one of the smartest businessmen ever." He speculated that China would probably renew the lease, which expires in 1997, because "the PRC cannot manage Hong Kong as well as the international community is doing now."

Abrams compared the sensation of entering China from Hong Kong to "stepping into another world." He added that since visitors were allowed to walk around freely in Chinese cities, suggesting that the Williams group try to spend "as much free time as possible with the people."

Kevin O'Rourke and Bob Gregory play Vladimir and Estragon in Beckett's "Waiting for Godot," which continues this Wednesday and Friday at the AMT.

Review: Hats off to Godot

by David Olsher

My hat is off to Williamstheatre's outstanding production of Waiting for Godot. Jean-Bernard Bucky's half of the "Reflections-Routines" repertory, currently showing at Adams Memorial Theater, is rich with esoteric signs, echoes and salutes to its sister production Comedy of Errors and to the comic traditions from which productions draw. The beauty of this Godot production is the way it seems to grow out of its words, as though it had always been a part of Samuel Beckett's play.

When Waiting for Godot was first performed in 1953, the play became the subject of much controversy. Large portions of the early audiences walked out after the first act. Some critics maintained that Godot was not a play, because it had no conventional plot. They charged that it was a play in which nothing happened. Almost twenty five years later, Waiting for Godot is widely accepted as one of the greatest and most influential plays of our time.

It is precisely the way in which nothing happens as Estragon and Vladimir bide their time waiting for "mister Godot" to arrive that makes the play what it is. They ramble through the day posing as this, playing at that, quarrelling, always fighting off boredom and despair. Into this discontinuous banter, Beckett threaded echoes of literature and religion, word play, and theatrical routines in rhythms more like musical composition than a play.

Director Bucky and the five actors have created an evening dense with inventive theatrical business, and

by Don Frazier

They forgot the seltzer bottle. They also missed the floppy size 38 shoes, the hand buzzer, and the squirting boutonniere; but little else. A Williamstheatre company directed by Gregory Boyd celebrates the Shakespearean nonsense of Comedy of Errors in the joyful if excessive styles of Mack Sennett, the Marx Brothers, and Hollywood's Golden Age of silent movies. I understate—those sources serve the production as a central motif, but ringmaster Boyd goes much further. He draws on the whole of American comedic tradition to illuminate the essential absurdity pervading Shakespeare's earlier comedies.

Gushy, melodramatic piano accompanies slide-projected titles, and we're back in the nickelodeon in time for the Francis X. Bushman Beau Geste. As the Duke of Syracuse, Eric Kuzmuk cuts a sinister figure of an exotic French Foreign Legion martinet, and condemns Aegeon in rich, rounded Continental tones making Ricardo Montalban sound like an Omaha Rotarian. Craig Elliot performs Aegeon's speech (the longest by W.S.) as Pauline emperiled by an overanxious firing squad. From the onset, we know they aren't going to shoot—we're familiar with that convention, the Dangling Execution—but still, we enjoy watching how the scene works on us anyway. The actors know this, and they milk us for every drop of mock-pathos. Aegeon's long-windedness is played as tear-jerker, as deathbed grandstanding, even to the insistent, concluding couplet after we've already heard quite enough from him.

Viewpoint: Pushing the Press

by Jim Cohen

No newspaper should concede to the demands of a group purely because the group claims it should influence advertising or editorial policies by virtue of an indirect financial input into the paper. For an editorial board to agree to such demands compromises some of the most sacred principles of journalism. For a group to make such demands is an indication they do not understand the role of a newspaper in free society.

A newspaper is not free if it can be required to accept the vision of the world professed by a vested interest group. An editorial board unhampered by vested interests in anything besides journalism is the only group capable of establishing policies. Readers may deem some of these decisions right and other decisions wrong. Readers have the right to comment and criticize in the paper itself. Readers never have the authority to demand.

I made a mistake Wednesday night. When confronted by a mob making demands, I wavered. I did not compromise my own beliefs. I still do not and never will consider the Schlitz ads sexist; as I stated several days before this confrontation, I found the ads slightly offensive to me and very offensive to some members of the community. My decision Wednesday night reflected weighing various rights and responsibilities.

But by making my decision under the circumstances I was confronted with does represent a compromise of my beliefs with the freedom of the press. In retrospect, I should not have remained in the office during the occupation. I should not have listened to or spoken to anybody in that mob until the office had been cleared and the Record layout staff allowed to work unhindered. I hope that my comrades on the editorial board share my hindsight.

The Record is now committed to an open meeting to discuss the advertising policy the newspaper should adopt. I agree that the editorial board should have a statement that it provides to prospective advertisers reserving the right to suppress certain advertisements. I am grateful to the group occupying our office for pointing out this need.

I will submit and support the following statement to be adopted as Record advertising policy.

"The editorial board of the Record reserves the right to suppress any advertisements they consider offensive to portions of the Williams College community."

Please note that I do not spell out what specifically constitutes offensive advertising. I do this for two reasons. First, I do not believe it is possible to compile a list of all offensive elements, and I do not believe the Record should be bound by any list.

More important, though, I am purposely vague in order to secure for this or any future editorial board the right to examine an advertisement without being subjected to mob pressure. An editorial board has a responsibility to listen to any group or any person that contends that an ad is offensive. This opinion should be considered seriously in the deliberations of the board. But I do not want to see the newspaper office occupied by a mob demanding that the journal remove any advertisement that shows a female body because the Record is committed in its advertising policy to suppress "sexist" advertising.

I want this editorial board to affirm, and all members of the College community to accept, the right of an editorial board to act as it sees fit within its own guidelines. If the community is not willing to permit editorial board these freedoms, I recommend that the board cease publication of the Record. No editorial board should have to function, or can function, under such restraints.

Letters: Sex and Sex

Relax

To the editor:

I am very disturbed to see that such an uproar has been caused by two recent incidents on campus, the "silicone-breasted" beer advertisement in the Record and the library incident of Monday night, Nov. 7. The advertisement was designed to sell beer, and to do it in the best way possible. Agreed, it was directed at the male population, but they drink the most beer. Viewing the ad as sexist says something about Williams women, and I am very sorry to say this, but it reflects a very prude attitude. Perhaps those concerned should boycott a certain beer, not an advertisement.

As for the library incident, I can see how such a prank can offend many of the women here, but the fact that it created such a disturbance on campus is disheartening. The days of the practical prank are gone; either a display must conform to certain rules or not occur at all. I am sorry that Miss Anderson was upset by a song that almost won the Purple Key freshman outing last year; most people I've seen enjoyed it. Radical tendencies have virtually disappeared; cries of "sexist" ring the streets. C'mon, women (and I only mean some of you) get off your high chair. Relax, laugh at yourselves once in a while, and don't get so uptight over anything that doesn't conform to your expectations of genteel behavior.

Sincerely, Marcel Oudin

Poet puzzles crowd

by Ann Morris

Richard Howard, a Pulitzer prize winning poet, spoke at Williams Wednesday, and left most of those who heard him with more questions than answers. Both a major contemporary American poet and distinguished translator, Howard is an internationally known Literary figure. His book of poetry, "Untitled Subjects," won him the Pulitzer Prize in 1970, while in 1974, he was nominated for a National Book Award for another book, "Two-Part Inventions." Howard is also known for his critical studies of American poetry, studies from which his Williams lecture, "The Art of Erasure: Post Modernist Poetry," is certainly derived.

Howard both lectured on contemporary poetry and read from his own works. It was his lecture, however, that raised the greatest number of questions. It was concerned with the aesthetic theory of erasure, a popular theory in recent years. That art must first destroy, undo, and erase, before it can truly create provides the basis for the theory. Howard, seeming to advocate this principle, told his audience that art, "like Rodin," must "collaborate with catastrophe," and eliminate the "nothing that is there."

Quoting William Carlos Williams and Wallace Stevens, Howard continued to apply his theory to modern poetry, explaining that for the first time in 3000 years, poetry has the chance to break away from its tradition of resolving, unifying, and clarifying. Now it can become an art of "unmaking" and "undoing." This change would transform poetry into total art, transcending imagination.

Moving to a discussion of prose, Howard became increasingly negative, calling prose nothing more than "Satanic heresy; the impulse of a fallen world." Since it accounts for change and the passage of time, he stated, "prose is not true." Poetry, however, is always true, for it is timeless, needing no chronology. But modern poetry is often not poetry, Howard pointed out; it has become prose. Ironically, he left the definitions of poetry and prose unclear, leaving his audience alone to comprehend unresolved fragments.

If the reader of this article seems confused, he is not alone. Admittedly both students and professors were perplexed by his remarks, and his attitude towards the audience thwarted any questions. Undoubtedly condescending, he appeared to feel that even being in Williamstown was somewhat amusing. Doing his best to assert his own sophistication and his audience's provinciality, he referred to the Cezanne exhibit in New York as if he, like Prometheus, carried the flame which would enlighten the Williamstown hicks. His pompous tone made the audience wonder which floated higher above their heads; his remarks or his ego.

The assortment of references which he repeatedly dragged into his speech seemed to lack either implicit or accountable unity. That his forced intellectualism served to castrate, not to clarify, aesthetic values became the greatest paradox of his lecture. Richard Howard did prove his own adeptness at the art of erasure, as the main points of his speech disappeared behind a facade of arrogance.

Review:

Vaudeville punctuates "Comedy"

bout of mistaken identity proves to the innocent, wide-eyed antiphonus that he is in a "town full of cozenage", aswarm with bizarre 'Mysterious Figures'. A sulking dagger-brandishing Anat and his cohorts lurk about the set, creating an atmosphere of eerie absurdity; at first ridiculous, but edging into real fear and genuine nightmare.

As the Antipholus and Dromio twins, Earl Childs and James Stone switch character as well as costume. Child's transformations are most remarkable, from earnest, moon-struck awe to the insufferable strutting bravado of the swash-buckling bon vivant. With nostrils flaring over a pencil-thin mustache, his Antipholus of Syracuse parodies every arch, twitching matinee idol who ever swung off a balustrade. He's Zorro, Scaramouche, and Valentino; all by way of Maria Montez.

Jim Stone's Dromio of Ephesus comes from the pie-in-face school of vaudeville, but is mostly a one-man Marx festival, with a bowler and an endless supply of carrots. Harpo would be pleased. Stone's wildly stylized gaits, poses, and punch lines make a cartoon of his character—for this play, highly appropriate.

The only people not burlesqued in such fashion are the shrewish wife to Antipholus of Syracuse, Adriana, and her glitzy, cynically chic sister, Luciana. Cecilia Rubino's Adriana comes on like high, ludicrous, tragedy; luxuriating in her woe and her boa. Rubino displays Virtuoso command of Shakespeare's language demonstrated best in her final speech, a feat of vocal dexterity. Adriana's wailing intensity seldom relents; she is a frenzied, frazzle-brained mockery of wifely virtue. Meanwhile, Carolyn McCormack's Luciana poses langorously, a la Jean Harlow—world-weary, wise to all the surrounding foment.

Her consternation when wooed by the Antipholus she wrongly supposes to be her sister's husband is loomed over by Robert Baker's Clown. In a potentially awkward scene, Boyd maintains the production's prevailing conception; we see even normal, tranquil scenes to be incongruous and weird within a larger context of irrationality.

These few gentler moments, however, cannot possibly be as interesting or fun as the increasingly intricate and convoluted scramblings of the Antipholi and Dromios. Finally, amid climactic crescendos of Stephen Dankner's witty score, a Keystone Kops-style chase scene reconciles all, although as Boyd admits, "There's no big epiphany." Once again, a comedic convention hoary with age, a traditional routine, works on us precisely because it reflects, as Bucky points out, "archaic comic roots" and can work only if the audience recognizes them, as we must. They've not been fresh since Pearl Harbor, but we enjoy the self-mockery with which they're delivered. The ironic presentation of comic material loses us down our normal, artificial responses. We laugh at the ancient gags for very much the same reasons we laugh at Waiting for Godot—not because of some vague, intrinsic 'funniness' residing in the text, but because, as Didi says, of the way they're done. In Comedy of Errors, they're done with blatancy, split-second timing, spirited and polished ensemble interaction, and a mastery of language difficult for most undergraduates—qualities recurring in Waiting for Godot. Obvious similarities in both plays' conceptions on comedy undercut the apparent incongruity of the Reflections/ Routines program. Taken together, Comedy of Errors and Waiting for Godot destroy our preconceptions about the nature of comedy and ultimately reveal comedy itself as illusory.

Review:

Godot worth waiting for delicate comedy routines. Vladimir and Estragon, often described as vagabonds or clowns, in this production take on the life of a Metaphysical Marx Brothers or an Existential Laurel and Hardy. They entertain themselves by performing, though at each comic turn they are aware of the emptiness of their efforts.

There is no reality behind the posing and playing of these two comedians. Even their despair is played at and dissolves in an instant. Kevin O'Rourke and Bob Gregory are brilliant not only in the execution of their comic routines, but in their masterful ability to switch on and off as comic ciphers with no tangible character behind them. Artifice interrupts artifice again and again, until the audience is left with nothing to hang its hat on.

John B. Lloyd and Robert E. Berry are strongly disquieting as Pozzo, the dainty Nazi of a vampire and Lucky, his cadaverous performing vallet. Henry Rinehart is appropriately nondescript as the boy. All three characters wander through the empty world of Vladimir and Estragon, clothed in the ruins of civilization, and leaving the two men again alone waiting for "their man" Godot.

The nature of the link between Comedy of Errors and Godot is not clear from seeing one of the two productions alone. Only when you see both with the comic routines shared by the two main characters of Godot and the two main characters of Comedy take on their full meaning.

But the film motif overtly revealed in Comedy can easily be seen in the routines Vladimir and Estragon are constantly going through in Godot, going so far as a fun fight right out of a Western.

A much more essential connection between Comedy and Godot is that—the country road to which Vladimir and Estragon have come is the abandoned set of Comedy. However, in Godot—the audience becomes quite involved in the stage setting. The two characters, Vladimir and Estragon, are in a theater. They discover the audience in front of them, and speak to the people watching at various points during the play.

Bucky has even taken the audience further into the normally separated artifice of the play. At one point a stagehand gets caught up in one of Vladimir and Estragon's games (to start over) and brings down the curtain. The stage manager shouts across the theater "Get that curtain up" and the stagehands bring it up so the play can go on.

The result is a chilling evening, empty with a million bits and pieces and routines from almost everywhere, which add up to nothing. Simply, these men wait for someone who never arrives, and we in the audience wait along with them. If there is anything to fault in this richly conceived and masterfully integrated production, it would have to be that Vladimir and Estragon are too good at entertaining themselves. Though they are doing nothing, it would be more persuasive if they were not always so successful at it.

Every detail of this production is to be commended, from the bowler hats to the shadow-like set covering and the beautiful lighting effects of nightfall and an unnaturally appearing moon.

When the final curtain fell, the two pair of legs protruded, fracturing once more the division between play and audience. I was unsettled to find my evening at the theatre was spent waiting for "Godot" and that I may spend my life returning to such evenings in the hope of finding him.

First half domination seals Little 3 title

On paper, the game was a football expert's dream. The strategy was simple to map. In order for Williams to pull off the upset of the fall and claim their sixth Little Three title in seven years they would have to explode through the air, scoring often, with tricks and gimmicks. Ha! Why not just take the ball on the ground, stick it directly the faces of the Amherst defenders, and control the game for nearly the entire first three quarters?

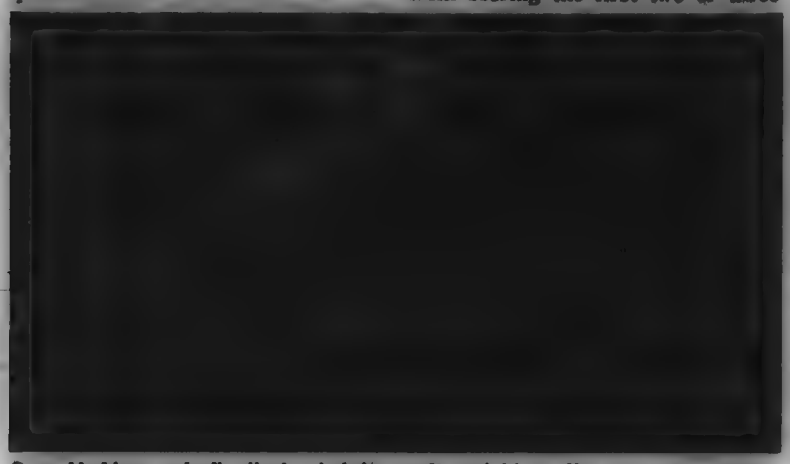
To call the Ephs' 21-13 upset victory (but don't anyone dare tell the players it was an upset!) amazing would be to greatly understate the case. Two weeks ago last place in the Little Three was not only a possibility, but very likely. Two games, 34 points, and a lifetime's worth of guts later, the 1977 Williams Ephs rest comfortably on top of the heap with a hard-earned 5-3 record and all sorts of bright prospects for the future.

"We knew we had to keep them from scoring the first two or three times they had the football," said Williams Coach Bob Odell. Amherst, in fact, was so unimpressive on their first three possessions of the game that Coach Jim Ostendarp must have been ready to put in a call for Freddie Scott, Jean Fugett, or even Jim Rhenquist for offensive help. While the Purple defense was shutting off the Jeffs (Pete Tuttle sacking Mike Newman for a 26-yard loss after playing "Me and My Shadow" with him from the line of scrimmage), the offense was getting on the board.

The Ephs took over on their own 47, and on the Amherst 43 on their two opening drives, and with a pair of inspired efforts, steamrolled the Jeffs as if they were so many Hamilton Continentals or Union Dutchmen. Greg Collins slipped off tackle from the Jeff three for the first score, and Kenny Hollingsworth brought the noisy throng of 8,500 to its feet with a 27-yard field goal and a 9-0 lead.

Newman and halfback Bob Sternberg cut out the middle man (punter Paul Harasimowicz) on the final play of the first quarter, botching an exchange and giving Williams the pigskin on the Jeff 35. Tri-captain Scott Harrington picked up 17 yards on the drive, with Gus Nuzzolese leaping over the top from the one for the touchdown. Hollingsworth's PAT left Williams on top 16-0, as the Amherst players and alums sat stunned and quiet and the Eph fans uncorked a little firewater and started plotting the downfall of the goalposts.

The stories of Mike Newman's quickness of foot are legendary. The senior, conquerer of Williams once now in three tries, went down under Brian Benedict and Phil Shuman in his own end zone at the 8:52 mark of the second quarter. Whatever Clarence Thomas and Rich Turi designed for the interior line and ends against Newman's scrambling, it was working, just like everything else Williams did this day.



The Williams game plan was superb. The halftime score could have easily been 35-0, as the Ephs threatened three times without scoring and the invaders never got close. "At times they just didn't have enough people to defend us," said Odell. Not to mention the offensive line of Joe Maguire, Brian Fales, Kenny Schoetz, Steve Rogers, and Bob VanDore which had an outstanding game.

Hollingsworth thunderfooted a 40-yard field goal to close out Williams' scoring with nine minutes still remaining in the third quarter. "It just shows what adrenalin can do," said the junior. At the close of the third stanza, however, Newman and company tightened the corks on Williams' victory champagne.

Newman set up TD tosses to Pete Neilson and Art Hyde with bombs to Mark Manning and despite a two-point conversion attempt which failed, Amherst trailed by only 21-13 with 1:55 remaining. Kicker Tom Boerth executed a textbook onside kick, and his mates, all on one side of the kick scooped it up and visions of 21-21 danced in everyone's head.

On first down, however, Newman sealed his own fate, tossing an interception, as Greg McAleenan deflected a pass to Long Ellis. It was Ellis' second interception of the game and the Ephs' fifth, McAleena, Thiel, and Mark Gerry getting one each.

Champagne, with a scoop of Little Three champions leaves, a very satisfying taste in the mouths of the Williams Ephs. "It's been a tough season," said Odell, "and this is a very pleasing win." It's over now and a bunch of very big-hearted individuals can smile all winter—they beat Amherst.

The Williams offense delighted these north end zone fans with 10 second quarter points plus 3 more in the third quarter. The purple defense coaxed a second-quarter safety from the harassed Jeff offense as well. (photo by Oettgen)

by Mark Pogue

There was a light in Dave Barra's eyes as he floated around the Dodd House party Saturday night. "I just hit the ceiling when it happened," the junior said of his goal that helped the Ephs beat Amherst. "My whole family was there watching it. Man!—I'm still way, way up there."

The exultant Barra spoke for all of the Williams Ephbooters following their 2-1 conquest of the Lord Jeffs on Saturday. It had been seven years since Williams beat Amherst on the soccer field. The triumph marked coach Jeff Vennell's first regular season win ever over the Jeffs, and it transformed a generally frustrating year for the Purple into something almost satisfying. The College's 54th soccer team concludes its season with a 5-6-1 mark; Amherst finishes at 2-7-1.

Williams blasted off to one of its best starts of the year and had Amherst bottled up for the first 20 minutes of the half. Ephbooters ran rampant in the Jeff backfield during this period, but erratic shots on the end of pretty passing series—a problem the 1977 booters never really mastered—cost them at least two easy goals. Amherst, following these scares, regrouped and began to move with its own pass-and-run game.

"They gained confidence when they saw us missing," said Vennell, "and they really came to life near halftime." Purple goalie Jay Loeffler, playing a deliberate but authoritative game, held the fort and the half ended scoreless.

The schools played evenly off the second-half whistle and traded deep threats as time ticked away. In an effort to break the strategical logjam dapper Amherst coach Peter Gooding played a variety of trailers—ranging from 5'7" speedmites to 6'6" lopers—but nothing afforded more than spotty penetration. Vennell, meanwhile, urged his charges to advance the ball across midfield sooner, since the Jeffs were finding time to clog their backfield with bodies at the first sign of an Eph threat.

At 24:59 Barra broke the deadlock and brought the shivering throng to its feet when he tapped home a Pete May feed from five yards out. Ten minutes later it was 2-0, as John Friborg chest-trapped Perry Nelson's pass, turned, and pasted the ball in the right corner of the Jeff net.

Still Vennell refused to smile. He remembered that in 1976 Amherst trailed 1-0 before wrecking the Ephs in overtime, and a similar nightmare seemed about to unfold when Lord Jeff forward Chris Linscott scored on a diving head shot 62 seconds after Friborg's goal.

But time ran out on the Amhersts in 1977, and when it was over the Ephs danced off the field with arms raised in triumph. "I'm pleased," said Jeff Vennell afterwards with monumental understatement. "I'm pleased we finally beat 'em."

"It's great," said Dave Barra with that shine in his eyes. "It's just the greatest feeling." You got a sense that the Williams Ephbooters, no matter how they said it, were happy to have beaten Amherst. It had been a long, long time.

Seesaw season ends on upswing

by Tim Layden

For the 1977 Williams football team, the rollercoaster ride which began under a scorching sun last August is now over. And through injuries, inexperience, and a couple incredible breaks, the Ephs emerged sometime late Saturday afternoon champions of the Little Three for the sixth time in the last seven years.

The '77 pre-season saw Bob Odell's young Ephs (only eleven seniors) lose starting offensive guard Bruce Wilson for the year with a knee injury. Jack Spound, Scott Harrington, Jay Skerry, Mark Eckert, and Pete Tuttle followed Wilson to sick bay at various points in the season, yet the Ephs survived.

A heart-stopping 21-18 win over a Hamilton team which was to win but one game all year opened the season, followed by a crushing loss to Middlebury and an equally crushing win over Trinity. A pair of very disappointing losses to traditional doormats Bowdoin and Tufts brought the tide to its low point, then a big win over at Union had an entire campus wondering what would happen in the Little Three, with Amherst and Wesleyan both supposedly loaded.

A wise gambler would have bet the Ephs even money to go 0-2 in the triumverate. A foolish one would have said 1-1. The undisputed title? Not this year; no way, pal. Wesleyan was a 12-point favorite and Amherst 10. Needless to say, neither beat the spread.

The Wesleyan win was another piece of Odell's planning genius. He pulled the straight T backfield out of the dark ages and ran the ball down the Cardinals' throat for a hard-earned 13-7 win and a shot at Amherst.

1977, however, was the year of the Lord Jeff, said the experts. Their only loss was to powerful Springfield, and their brilliant senior quarterback Mike Newman was healthy for an entire season for the first time. If you thought Little Big Horn was a rout, stop by Williams-Amherst Saturday seemed the general consensus.

Then something very funny happened. Williams showed up for the game, and they didn't just throw their jocks on the field and surrender. The gutty Purple Cows scored 18 points in the first half, running through Amherst like Jim Beam through a thirsty alumnus. Gus Nuzzolese (625 yards on the year) and Greg Collins got touchdowns, Ken Hollingsworth got a field goal, and half the Williams defense got a safety, and it was suddenly very obvious this Williams team not only came to play, but came to win.

Amherst came back, at least enough to keep everybody interested. But it was just one of those days, just one of those teams. All season long the Ephs have been a team one doesn't leave for a hot dog on. They were exciting, explosive, and at times, a damn good test for the nerves of a loyal fan.

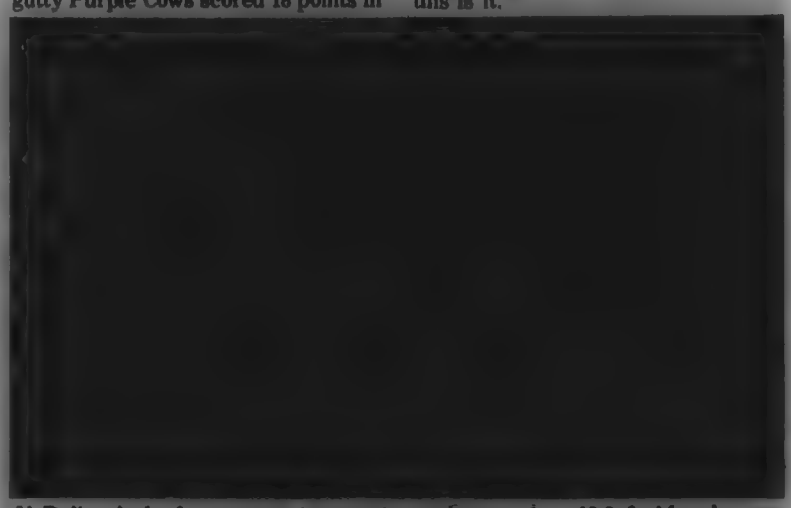
"It's been a tough season," said Bob Odell through a smile he'll probably wear till next August, "but this is a great bunch of kids; they worked hard at it." After those mid-season losses, the Ephs could have rolled over and played dead, start rebuilding. Un-uh, for eleven seniors and a whole bunch of hungry underclassmen, now was not too soon to start atoning, and the Little Three trophy is back in Williamstown.

"Team of destiny" is a phrase which gets thrown around a lot. Well, if there was ever a team it truly fits, this is it.

Ephs dunk Jeff polomen

by Bill Baldiga

The Williams water polo club provided the first homecoming weekend win as the Ephs drowned the Jeffs Friday night, 15-13. Although Amherst fought to the buzzer, Williams scored when it had to and protected its early lead.



Mike Murphy led the balanced scoring attack as he brought the crowd to its feet with his first of four goals. John Trapp and Gordon Cliff followed with three each, while Mike Feltes, Guy Hoelzer, Brian McDermott, Bob Kraus and Mark Roche hammered in single goals to give Williams the victory.

Taking a quick 3-0 lead, Williams managed to hold onto the three goal margin until the fourth quarter. In the final period the Jeffs, led by Snow's seven goals, came out firing and cut the lead to a single point. Defenseman John Trapp then broke up the left side of the pool and powered a shot through the Amherst goalie mid-way through the period to give the Ephmen a little breathing room. With a minute left in the contest, senior Mike Murphy rocketed two to the lower left-hand corner of the Jeffs' net to clinch the first Little Three victory of the weekend.

During pre-game ceremonies, seniors Hoelzer, Roche, Murphy, Feltes and Glenn Shannon were honored for their contributions to Williams water polo. Special tribute was paid to Sandy Pike for his enthusiasm and dedication to the game as he was presented with the first annual Dennis R. O'Shea Trophy.

On the preceding weekend, Williams participated in the New England Water Polo Championships at the University of Southern Connecticut. Although finishing sixth, the team played extremely well against some of the top N.E. squads.

Bob Kraus had a fine tournament with five goals, frosh Gordie Cliff put in four scores and Brian McDermott added three to the Eph cause, Murphy threw in a couple, while Trapp, Hoelzer and Roche rounded out the scoring with one goal apiece.

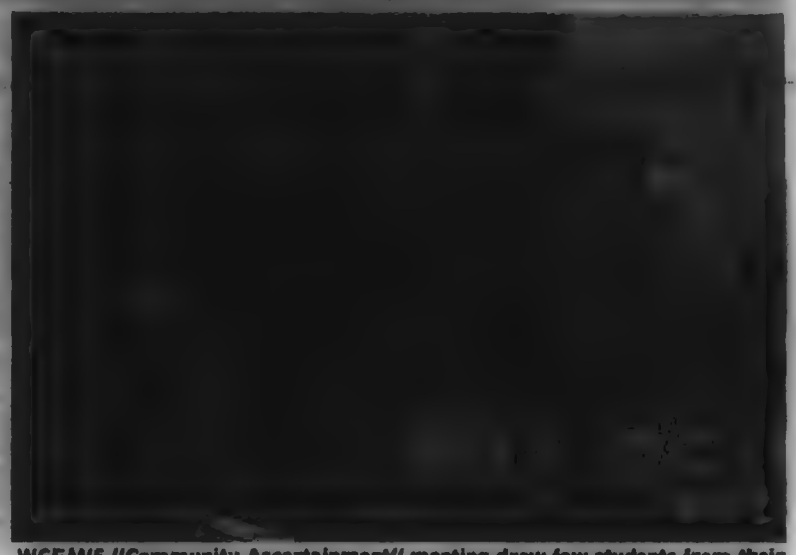
Council reviews 17 more budgets

by Tim Jones

As a result of nearly six hours of debate Monday and Tuesday nights, the College Council voted on Finance Committee grants for 17 campus organizations. At the behest of the College Council, the Finance Committee will reconsider the budgets for WCFM, the proposed WCFM Capital Fund, Rugby Football, and the Dance Society.

During this week's meetings, the CC also voted to reduce the All-College Entertainment Committee's budget to $15,500 from $18,500. Dave Koenigsberg of the Finance Committee told the council, "In effect, we have cut them one concert." Several council members suggested that this concert be omitted during Winter Study. Cap and Bells will receive $4800, virtually the entire sum it requested. The Lehman Service Council suffered a small cut to $4500. Acting independently of the Finance Committee, the council cut $50 from the Williams Coffee House budget, leaving it with $3805 for the year. Ultimate Frisbee and Sailing received $212 and $280 respectively.

Other allocations approved included: Adelphic Speaking Union, $253; Free University, $160; International Club, $1000; Jewish Association, $900; Language Clubs, $400; Newman Association, $800; Pipe Band, $300; Pottery, Ltd., $650; Purple Key, $400; and the Student Art Gallery, $290. The council restored $75 to the Williams Hunger Action Project and gave no funds to the Baroquen Recorders.



WFCM representatives Dave Breuer and Steve Jackson strongly opposed the station's $8350 grant. WFCM had initially requested $13,000. It later reduced this figure to $10,595. The Finance Committee cut of $2246 entailed the abandonment of plans to buy such items as a phonolog, to be used for record back ordering, a mike boom, two accordion booms, $800 worth of new albums, two headsets, and a tape recorder. According to Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly, "the loss of these items will not impair WCFM's ability to remain on the air."

Dave Breuer, Program Director, stated that the proposed budget would "cut WCFM down to a level where it will survive, but not progress."

Tom Herwitz, CC President, directed questioning toward the "fat" in the radio station's yearly expenditures. He criticized the station's budgeting of $372 for postage, $450 for general office supplies, and $810 for long-distance telephone calls.

It is often necessary for up to three announcers to share one mike due to the theft of two microphones last year.

Several council members expressed dissatisfaction with current WCFM programming. "I think you're putting on too much music that people don't like," said Joel Smith '79 of Hopkins House. Jackson responded that WCFM "is not solely for the entertainment of the College." Brewer claimed that WCFM could lose its FCC license if it "refuses to respond to people outside the College" who are nevertheless within its broadcasting range.

WCFM seeks communal input

Despite the failure to attract participants in a "Community Ascertainment" meeting Monday night, WCFM President Peter Green '78 claimed that the station will continue to make an effort to "adopt new programming oriented toward community issues."

The meeting, which had previously been advertised in the North Adams Transcript, was designed to determine the "pressing problems" of the WCFM service area, according to Green. Referring to the lack of attendance, Green theorized that "Williamstown community members attach a low priority to community affairs. It's difficult to ascertain community opinion when the community offers no opinion." Station Manager Lew Mills '78 added, however, that the apparent lack of interest would not "hamper efforts to direct programming toward the community."

According to Green, the meeting was held in compliance with an FCC "suggestion." He explained that the FCC has recently increased the level of community programming expected of stations like WCFM which are educational in nature and "don't really do anything for the community." Green pointed out, however, that WCFM's "Concert Hall" program is "kept on only because of community interest," and also cited a "high local interest in sports programming." The stations's license is up for renewal next month.

WCFM is currently conducting a telephone survey of 100 area residents in another effort to "determine community problems." According to Green, the survey has already pinpointed "a lack of industry and employment" as a primary concern. The station will also conduct interviews of 20-30 "local leaders" to obtain their views on community programming possibilities.

Policy change: applicants can receive December rejection

Over 500 students completed early decision applications to the Class of 1982 by Tuesday's deadline, according to the Admissions Office.

Admissions Director Phil Smith explained a policy change, instituted this year, which allows the College to reject applicants in December. "Until now, we would defer everyone until the April decision date. Now, a candidate who is completely out of the running will be rejected in December," Smith added, however, "I've found very few who fall into that category."

Overall, Smith is "impressed with the caliber" of applicants, which complicates the task of choosing a maximum of 150, or 30 per cent of the projected class of 480.

Each year, the Admissions Office receives about 550 applications, of which slightly more than 50 per cent are from women. Smith sets no particular quotas for male or female admissions.

Smith said that, "A person who is overwhelmingly strong in one area, has a very strong school record, over 600 on the college boards and strong personal performance in extracurricular or community activities" has the best chance for early admission. Explaining his heavy reliance on board scores as a tool for discriminating between early decision candidates, Smith stated, "We won't accept a student unless he is clearly in the outstanding group."

Occasionally, however, a position may be filled in December, which the Admissions office wishes in April could be filled by a more highly qualified regular applicant. "Over the years, we've had that feeling more than once," Smith commented.

A majority of the early decision candidates visited the College for an interview, which Smith feels helps the student decide whether to apply, and helps, the Admissions Office decide whether to admit the student.

Open forum to discuss campus 'sexism' issues

The Dean's Office will sponsor an open forum Monday night to discuss relations between the sexes at Williams. The forum, to be conducted at 7:30 in Dodd House, is an occasion for students to discuss incidents and issues with each other and the administration.

Dean of the College Peter Berek said the forum is largely an outgrowth of "a disciplinary infraction which violated the College's idea of proper conduct and created an offensive disturbance of peace in the reserve room." Berek added that "such disturbances are not something students can do with impunity."

Berek stated that similar incidents have been dealt with on an individual basis through the Dean's Office and the Discipline Committee. The forum, besides providing the campus a chance to discuss male-female relations, arises from the College's commitment to insure that students can conduct their affairs without being disturbed or intimidated, according to Berek.

Faculty consider general education curriculum goals

General education, energy consumption and the implications of new copyright laws were the major items on the agenda at last Wednesday's faculty meeting.

Gordon Winston, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), gave a preliminary report of the CEP's inclinations regarding the changing of the general education component of the curriculum. Winston defined general education as "the degree of structure in the non-major portion of the curriculum" and said that there was currently on the CEP "some enthusiasm for what an increase in that structure could do."

Winston, along with other faculty members on the CEP, noted that the liberal arts education consisted of both "depth"—or specialization as embodied in the major requirement—and "breadth"—as embodied in various types of general education programs.

Jim Wood, also speaking for the DEP, stated that the purpose of general education requirements is to "provide a unified intellectual experience or common educational background." He noted that the present Williams curriculum comes

Excluding Vermont

Liquor prices vary only slightly

by John Simon

A Record survey of liquor prices in the Williamstown and North Adams area reveals negligible differences in price levels among the five stores compared. Beer prices are in general highly standardized, while wine and liquor prices may vary from store to store. Because price levels are dependent upon wholesale rates, the claim that local merchants take advantage of the college trade by charging higher prices is unjustified.

Ray Smith, owner of King's Liquor Store on Spring Street, explained that liquor prices are based on the bi-monthly state publication "Suggested Minimum Consumer Resale Price List." Most liquor stores in the area have their prices near the suggested minimum. King's, however, has an advantage due to its Spring Street location; the comparative price list shows that the store has slightly higher prices than others. But if you're in a jam and need some money, King's will cash a five dollar check for any student.

The management of West Package Store refused to give a price list, feeling it is difficult to make price comparisons at any one time due to sales and specials. One salesman claimed that with the coming holiday season, the various specials run by local liquor stores will make it difficult to determine which store has the lowest price on any given item. West Package Store usually lists its current specials in Record ads.

Upon walking into the Spirit shop, one notices two differences between this store and the others. First of all, the prices for beer and wine are posted. Secondly, unlike most of the local liquor stores, with the exception of King's, the Spirit Shop stores wine correctly. Friendly salesmen and full delivery service complete the Spirit Shop's advantages.

In Vermont, liquor stores are state owned, and thus prices are standardized. Even though the state publishes a liquor price list, it frequently runs specials for store operators. Those who purchase during these sales are able to pass the savings on to the consumer, thus accounting for some of the price variations.

As a result of the state system, Vermont liquor prices are generally lower than those in Massachusetts. According to an employee of West Package Store, local establishments have little choice in pricing since they must keep within a competitive range and abide by the laws for minimum pricing.

Students are therefore paying high liquor prices mainly because of Massachusetts guidelines and not because they live in a college community. With Vermont only three miles up the road, however, it would be unwise for local stores to set their prices well beyond the minimum retail price allowed by law.

Grabois vies for presidency of Haverford College

Neil R. Grabois, Provost of the College, has been named as one of four finalists in the search for the President at Haverford College in Haverford, Pennsylvania, according to Paul Zuchman, editor of the Haverford News.*

Grabois, a Professor of Mathematics, received his bachelor's degree at Swarthmore and his doctorate at the University of Pennsylvania. He has been at Williams since 1968.

*The Provost confirmed the fact that Haverford had notified him of his standing as a finalist.

Record autonomy

One misconception appears in several of today's Letters to the Editor which should perhaps be commented on. This is the idea that because that Record is a college newspaper, funded in part by money from a student activities tax, that it is somehow not an "independent" newspaper but rather an organ of the College or its student body.

If the intent of such comments is to suggest that members of the Record editorial board should be conscious of, and open to, the comments, criticisms and suggestions of the members of the College community, then the point is exceedingly well taken. Few situations could be worse than for an organization like the Record, which, in some sense, speaks for the college community as a whole, to be run by a group of people who are totally unresponsive to the needs and desires of that community.

On the other hand, this newspaper is not now, and never will be, a democratic institution. The running of a newspaper is not simply a numbers game and Record policy decisions are not going to be made by a campus "show of hands." This, we suggest, protects the interests of a number of minorities on this campus more than it abuses the interests of some imagined majority.

Even more annoying is the argument—found in several of today's letters—that Record editors are obligated to cater to those interests which make financial contributions to the paper. If this were the case, then presumably Schlitz Brewing Company would have 22 times as much influence on Record policy as any given student at the College. Fortunately, this is not the case.

No, in the final analysis, Record editors are responsible to their consciences and their sense of what is right, not to the majority of some constituency, or the financial supporters of the newspaper. In cases where the decisions of Record editors are wrong, they should be cajoled and harangued and subjected to "consciousness-raising" sessions until they see the light, but the integrity of their decisions must be respected.

The editorial board of The Williams Record cordially invites interested members of the College community to an open meeting to discuss the formation of a Record ad policy. The meeting will be held on Tuesday, Nov. 29 in the Baxter Hall lounge.

Winter Study projects

99's transcend the traditional

by John Seatar

Simply put, a 99 project is an opportunity for students to break out of traditional conceptions of "education" and do whatever they please, in the sometimes dubious name of academic freedom.

Science 99's are the most varied of the lot. "Urea Production in Rats" is typical of some of the more boring titles. Perhaps because most science projects seem to lack creativity, however, those that do not are truly different. "Chemistry Magic" is the concoction of a would-be Merlin who wishes "to investigate some of the experiments and demonstrations of a magical nature." "The Tao of Physics" is an attempt to relate Eastern philosophies with the modern fundamental principles of physics.

Although Physical Education might seem a less intellectual field than science, the projects there do not lack high-sounding titles. "Physiology of the Knee," "Coaching Theory," and "The Physical and Psychological Effects of Shaving Down" would suit the title page of any reputable journal. It is important to point out at this time that all the projects herein mentioned have been approved.

Internships at Rolling Stone magazine and Representative Mo Udall's office, as well as law and medical internships—in Bermuda—will occupy the month of January for some.

For the craftsman, "Cabinet Making and Design" is available. So is a course in "Maple Sugaring." And yes, several people are doing weaving projects.

Finally, there is a class of projects whose titles alone provide all the explanation possible. While "Germany on Skis" is a contender for best title, the undisputed winner has to be O Vrede Tabaka. Don't ask me: I only work here.

Nominees announced for Watson, Luce fellowships

The Williams Selection Committees for the Thomas J. Watson Fellowship and the Henry Luce Foundation Fellowship have nominated five seniors and two recent graduates, the Dean's Office announced.

The Watson nominees are Scott Hoot, Kenneth Leghorn, Thomas Gass, and Sheila Sullivan. They will compete with 172 candidates from 50 other institutions. Each year the Watson Foundation chooses 70 graduating seniors for a year of independent study and travel abroad.

Scott Hoot plans an investigation of "open-air" re-created museums in Europe and Scandinavia; Ken Leghorn hopes to observe how the extreme arctic environment affects life in non-native communities of Canada's Northwest Territories; Thom Gass will investigate individual sources of martial idealism and its effects on personal and societal relationships in Japan and Isreal; and Sheila Sullivan plans to study nationalism in Ireland in the seventies and its relation to the literary-mythic tradition of Ireland.

The Luce nominees are Eric Laschever '78, Mary Ellen Winninghoff '75, and Daniel Hanley '71. These candidates will compete with 177 other nominees for fifteen job internships and placements in Asia. The fellowship is intended for students with well defined career interests and with no previous exposure to Asian studies. Dan Hanley has just completed his medical residency, Ellie Winninghoff is an equity securities merchandiser, and Eric Laschever is planning a career in ocean management.

This will be the last issue of "The Williams Record" before Thanksgiving break. The next issue of the "Record" will appear on Tuesday Nov. 29. The deadline for copy will be Sunday Nov. 27 at 2:00.

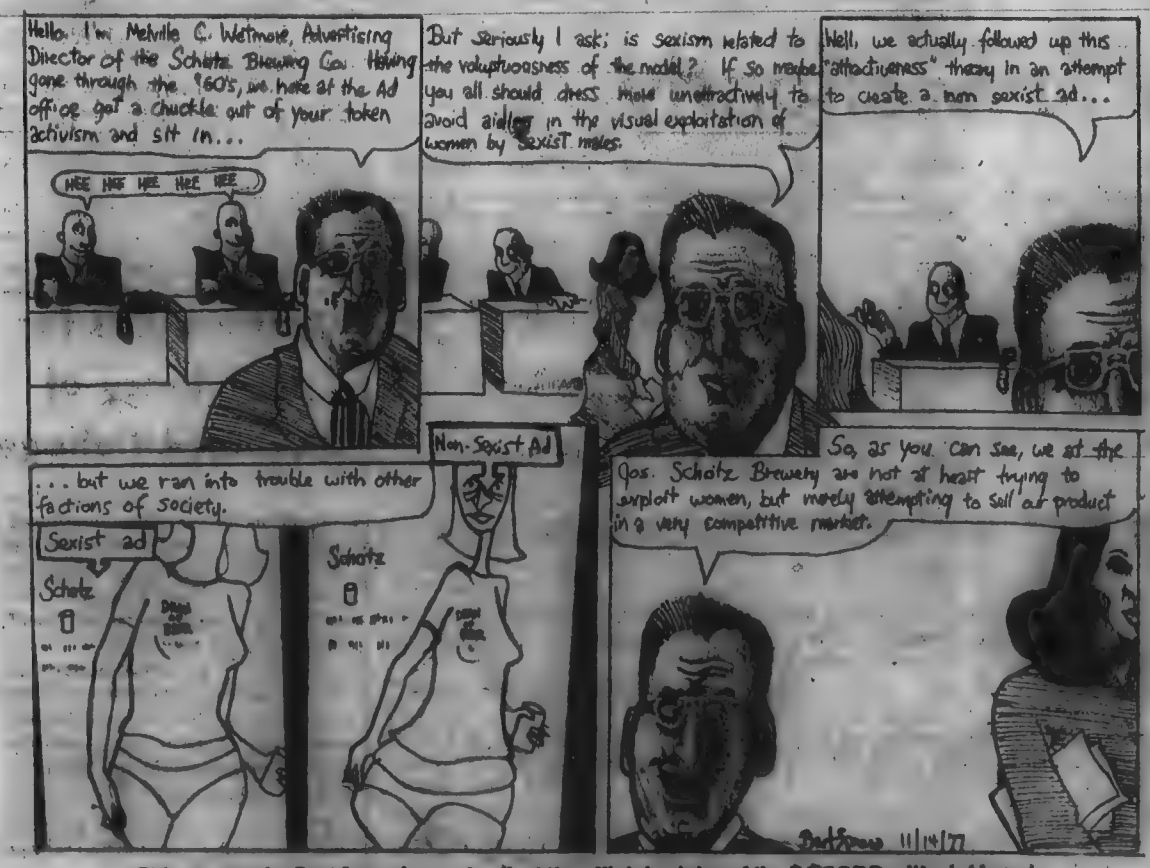
OCC EVENTS SCHEDULE FOR NEXT WEEK

Mon., Nov. 21 - Government Job-Application Workshop, 3:30 PM, Mears House.

OCC will be closed on Friday, Nov. 25 and Sat., Nov. 26 in addition to Thanksgiving day, Nov. 24.

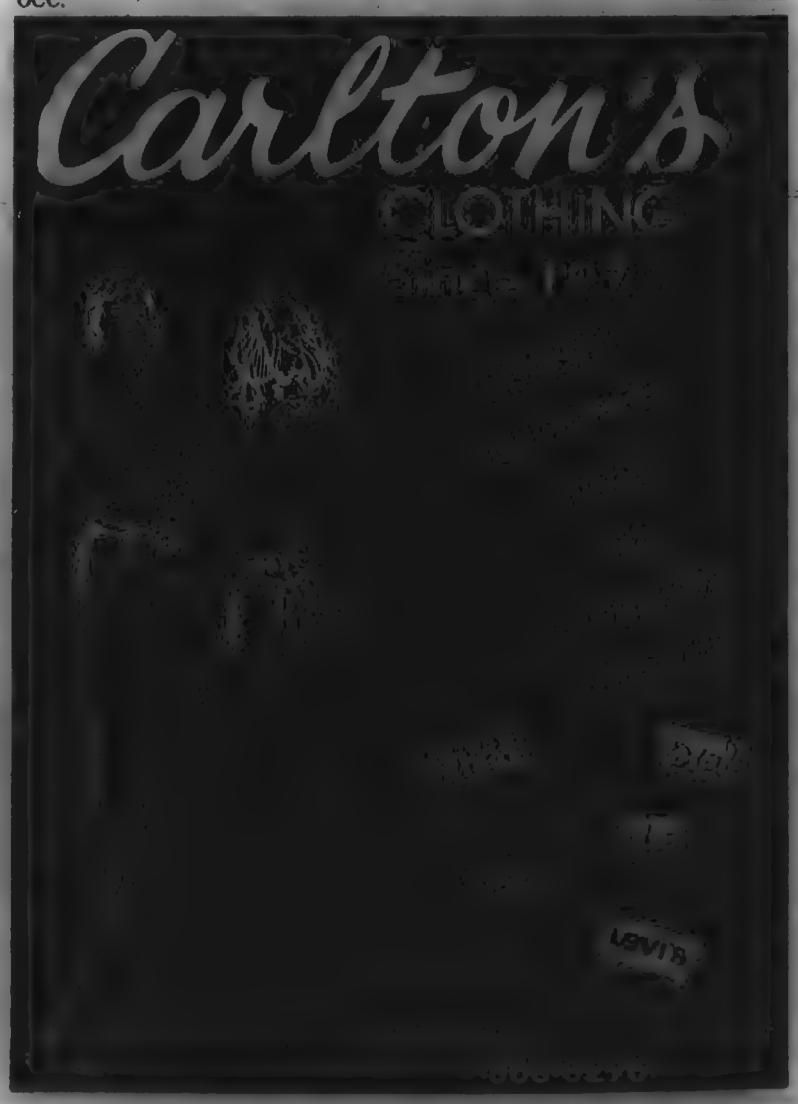
SENIORS APPLYING FOR GOVERNMENT JOBS. If you just think you might want to apply for a Federal job or are definitely applying, take the PACE in January on the earliest date you can. The word from an alumni in D.C. is that January test takers could have Civil Service Register priority over those who take the test in April. If this turns out to be true, you want to be totally prepared. Come to next Monday's Government Workshop for more details on applying to Federal Jobs.

MEAD GOVERNMENT SUMMER INTERNSHIPS



The government summer internship program sponsored by the Mead Fund is designed to encourage qualified students to seek a summer experience working in Federal, State, or Municipal government. A faculty committee selects Juniors from any major and a limited number of Sophomores. Since the program does not provide a specific working situation, the candidates are considered on the basis of interest and motivation to seek out such an opportunity. Applications are now available at OCC. See Cynthia Thomas for further information. DEADLINE: November 23 (Noon) at OCC.

Concert attendance



To the editor:

There are about 1800 students here at Williams. There were about 350 people at the Stanky Brown-Kalapana concert Homecoming Weekend. Where was everybody? Granted a few hundred went to the play or the movie but that leaves over 1000 people who did nothing for those three hours. Those same people are probably the ones who complain about the concerts we do get and say "I've never heard of them, why should I go?" Well maybe that's all the more reason to go. If we get bands that everyone has heard of like Fleetwood Mac etc., the ACEC would go under. We can't afford them because we can't sell enough tickets with our limited facilities. If people come to the concerts we do get, which have been as good as any, the ACEC would make more money, or I should say, lose less. Then we could get, along with the up and coming bands, a well known band to attract all the narrow minded cynics among us. A little support goes a long way and I think it's time this college turned off Boston and opened its ears to something new and different.

Letters: reaction to sexism, viewpoint

'Record' responsibility

To the editor:

We are writing this letter in response to Jim Cohen's "Viewpoint" in Tuesday's issue of the Record.

There are two major issues in our criticism. First, there is the question of how responsive a college newspaper should be to its constituency and, secondly, the concern of sexism itself. Although our primary interest in this letter lies with the first point, we hope that the college community, and especially Cohen and other members of the editorial board, will not lose sight of the larger question of the implicit acceptance and practice of sexism at Williams. The Schlitz ads were only one manifestation of this problem; the reserve room incident and Marcel Oudin's letter are further revelations of the underlying sexist attitude of many members of this community.

We were part of the group occupying the Record office and stepping on the "most sacred principles of journalism". First we would like to make clear our resentment of Cohen's perjorative use of the word "mob" in his article. Our group was not a "large disorderly crowd" or "a criminal set" (as defined by Webster's dictionary) but rather a peaceful, well-behaved, orderly and voluntary association of concerned men and women who made their wishes (demands, if you will) known to the editorial staff.

It is inappropriate to call upon the "most sacred principles of journalism" and "freedom of the press" when talking about an advertisement. The suppression of an offensive and sexist ad does not constitute a violation of the freedom of the press since it does not limit any dissemination of information. We did not demand the elimination of all Schlitz ads, but rather the elimination of a non-sexist one.

You state the you "do not believe the Record should be bound by any list of offensive elements" and that the editorial board should set "within its own guidelines" and should not have to function under any "restraints". Granted, an editorial board has the right to exercise control over the form and content of the paper it presents. But does this exempt the board from responsibility to the community at large? Should not the Record be a reflection of students' interests, in other words, of the constituency which it represents? This question is especially pertinent since the paper is funded by all students' activities tax rather than individual subscriptions. The Williams student can make his or her feelings or demands known through a letter to the editor, which imposes no restrictions on the editorial board and to which the board does not have to supply an answer. But what about a more active form of involvement, i.e. the "mob" to which you refer? Apparently you see this as only a "restraint" and therefore reserve for the board alone the right to bring about change. You put yourself in a position in which the board becomes the ultimate judges and actors in a process which should include the possibility of active input by other members of the Williams community. This active option is especially important in light of the fact that less extreme means of expression—letters, petitions, and conferences—were largely ignored by the board.

You propose that the board adopt an advertising policy as we believe you should but how can the community be assured of the fairness in implementation of such a policy when you write such statements as, "I still do not and never will consider the Schlitz ads sexist". (Emphasis added.) This represents a narrow attitude and lack of the flexibility which you have promised to follow in your editorial decision.

Finally, a brief interjection about sexism. Recognizing that all definitions of sexism are subjective, we would nevertheless like to present our view. The mere presence of a female body does not constitute sexism. It is the exploitation of sexuality in this case depicting women as sexual objects only, that is offensive. Schlitz is using sex in their ads, not the product's intrinsic merits, to attract readers and to sell the beer. Moreover, their ads cater to men at the expense of women, and more broadly is offensive to human dignity.

Unless the editorial board and the majority of the college community come to recognize the blatant, explicit sexism in advertisements such as the Schlitz ones, we question whether they will perceive the more subtle sexism present in other ads and in the Williams community.

Julie Rossi '78

Pervasive attitudes

To the editor:
To the Williams community;

I react with dismay, disbelief, frustration, and outrage to the letter of Marcel Oudin concerning the beer advertisements and library incident that have caused "such an uproar" at Williams in recent weeks. I say it's about time that something cause an uproar on this campus of complacency, where blatant instances of sexism are tacitly condoned by the majority of the college community. The views expressed by Mr. Oudin are typical of that "relax, don't-get-so-upset-over-nothing" attitude which merely serves to suppress vital issues that need to be dealt with at Williams, but that most of us choose to ignore. It's not those few irate women that need to get off their "high chair," but rather the apathetic and insensitive bulk of people who fail to see that a serious problem of sexism exists at this school.

Inadvertently, it would seem, Mr. Oudin gets to the heart of the beer ad issue. The ads are indeed directed toward men, especially lascivious and unimaginative ones, who are turned on by the mere sight of a woman used solely as a sexual object. Is it a "prude (sic) attitude" to resent the total objectification of a human being? Just because this may be the "best way" to sell beer in terms of advertising expediency, it does not follow that this is the way beer should be sold. Although there is little we can do at this point to affect general advertising policies in society at large, we can make an effort on the home front. It is for this reason that I strongly urge the Record editors to adopt a policy of refusing to print sexist ads.

The library incident was a much more extreme, ugly, and perverse display of sexism (or should I say misogyny?!). How can anyone consider this a mere "practical prank"? What are you saying, Mr. Oudin, that a woman should be able to laugh at a representation of her bleeding from the repeated phallic attacks of drunken males? To condone such a vulgar display is to fail to consider the feelings of those to whom it is a direct, personal offense.

Moreover, I fear that the library incident may be indicative of a deeper, more pervasive attitude of men toward women at Williams. To me that particular act suggests many men's fear and resentment of the women here (combined with a certain sexual frustration). Those "radical tendencies," the disappearance of which Mr. Oudin bemoans, I call reactionary. I can not relate to this sentiment: many of my closest friends at Williams are strong feminists, and I see nothing threatening about them. What I do see and feel in them is warmth, awareness, and an earnest searching for humanity in interpersonal relations.

I wish I were mistaken in my impression that most people here at least tacitly condone the sexism that festers and thrives at Williams. I wish that the fact that the song sung in the library almost took first prize on Purple Key night were not symptomatic of a wider social sickness. I leave it to you all to prove me wrong.

Sincerely,
Bill Fleming '78

Sincere apology

To the editor:
Re: The infamous library insult to humanity in general, women in particular.

Editor: Tell me, Paul, what was in your mind when you wrote those mystical lyrics to Helter Skelter?

Paul M.: Actually, I was tryin' to write a song that would inspire 'orrible bloody mass murder.

(from "Beat the Meatles", National Lampoon, Nov. 77)

Entirely too much has been said and done over the incidents of Monday night in the reserve room. There needs to be a serious look at these incidents once and for all. Here are the facts as I see them:

1. The song-True, it did come in second in the Purple Key Night songfest. It lost out to a song presented by a group of girls' entries whose song was festooned with many such non-sexist phrases as "You short balls" and the like. Interestingly, many of these same mature, adult women now see it fit to sign petitions decrying sexism at Williams. Have they suddenly seen the error of their ways and repent for their acts? Or do they dismiss the whole incident as a foolish act to inspire "entry unity" or some other such familiar phrase? Hmmm!

2. The doll-True, this was a bad move. The doll was received as a gag-in-extremely-poor-taste-gift at a drunken birthday celebration prior to the incident. She was discolored (i.e. the "newly-taped" undies) when she was involved in another insult to human rights, a punch and donut war. It was not intended that she look molested and-or bleeding. She was not brutally kicked down the stairs; Sexist Sally sailed over the rail in an air of festive jovialty. (She is inflatable).

3. The intent, already. We did not go over to the library with the intent of offending anyone but merely to enlighten the otherwise mundane existence of the Monday Night Reserve Squad. We could very well have sung a song about mooses or Gerald Ford or whatever but we didn't all know the words. We intended no offense, symbolic or otherwise. If we had intended any such political-social statement, we would of course have formed a committee to organize a petition and write nasty letters-to-the-editors.

Corinthians 7:7 tells us that even wise men, when oppressed, can do crazy and irrational acts. The effect of phony liberalism and activism for its own sake so prevalent on this campus is oppressive, to say the least. There is a clear reason for the same group of people who write letters to the editor appearing on every committee. These are the blind souls who live in their little Berkshire never-never land who think that Student Committees on Campus Life and the like are not the worthless, circumnambulatory farces they are. Then there are the folks who are wise to the system and are out busily racking up brownie-points for their grad-school transcripts in order to beat out all the other rats in the race ... all in the name of decency and equality. And bullshit.

To those rare sensitive souls who were sincerely offended, I give a sincere apology and hope you can make it out in the real world. To those outraged souls who are merely blowing off steam, I invite any and all replies to come to me personally, as all this space is expensive for the Record, and could be better used to have Ross Keller explain the origins of Tuna Bumstead . . .

A few observations

To the editor:

For all it's worth, I would like to offer a few observations on the recent controversy surrounding the Dean of Beer ad. I am glad to see that the ad got cancelled—there's no question but that it deeply offended and insulted a lot of people on this campus—but I don't think that either Williams Women or the Record particularly distinguished itself in the process that led up to that cancellation.

My major gripe with Williams Women is that their initial reaction to the publication of the Dean of Beer ad was not that of an organization seriously trying to prevent the publication of offensive material, but of one indulging itself in some good old fashioned righteous indignation. Their letter of a week and a half ago, while expressing a genuine feeling of offense, at the ad, ended with a savage and arrogant attack on the paper. Remarkably, they did not attack Schlitz or the Mohawk Beverage Company; equally worthy targets from their point of view. They reacted in the tone of an organization with an ax to grind.

By doing that, they immediately put the Record in a position where they could not cancel the ad without appearing to have bowed to pressure from an interest group. If Williams Women's goal was genuinely to get the ad removed, this was the worst possible tactic. This was evident from Managing Editor Jim Cohen's comments in last Tuesday's Record. It was wrong, he argued, for the Record to compromise "the most sacred principles of journalism" simply to meet the demands of a campus organization.

But it the Record was encouraged to develop this kind of a siege mentality, it is not to their credit that they actually developed one and let it obscure their view of the issues. The paper confused knuckling under to Williams Women with cancelling the ad strictly on the merits of the case for cancelling the ad. That case, as I see it, is that the ad unnecessarily offended many people, often deeply, and it reinforced a view of women that many women find degrading. The Record could have acknowledged these arguments without bowing to Williams Women.

The Record, like any responsible newspaper, must remain dedicated to the "sacred principles of journalism," but it must be wary of becoming too dedicated to them and insensitive to the needs of the campus. Williams Women should also guard against being insensitive to the people whose attitudes it is attempting to shape. It is not in their interest to have their reactions looked upon by the campus, or by the newspaper, as merely perfunctory posturing instead of rational arguments for their cause.

Peter Rintels

We can assure you that the majority of the RECORD editorial board cancelled the ad "on the merits of the case," not for any other reason. Ed.

Ivory tower complacency

To the editor:

The Record is busy defending its honor; its mythical image of itself as a responsible journal upholding First Amendment Freedoms—in our "free society." The concerned students (women and men) and faculty members that sat-in in the Record office last week are now being portrayed as an angry "mob" (in the Nov. 11 issue they were just a "group") foaming at the mouth about offended sensibilities (la-de-dah). Meanwhile, one Williams male elects himself spokesman for a policy of ivory-tower complacency, Let's keep it loose, you guys are no fun, you women are "prudes." Strong feelings are flowing and the essential argument is lost.

I hate to spoil Jim Cohen's societal illusions, but today we are not free - justice is a convenience for those that can afford it - oppression and alienation are facts of life, not just concepts we academics debate in our more esoteric moments. That ad was representative of an oppressive inhumane view of women and women's function in our society. That ad reduced "woman" to "object" and "man" to "consumer". "Woman" through the media and on the streets is evaluated as so much choice meat in various revealing packages. This sex-for-sale seems to me to be middle-class pornography and not sexual liberation. Liberation implies there is equality between two partners, and real choice, in that there are no stereotypical roles each person must conform to.

Finally, the protesters (I am one of them) were not concerned with the dubious matter of "genteel behavior" but of asserting human values. In the course of the sit-in we did not scream, set fires, spill pig's blood, throw typewriters or reporters out windows, rather, we stated our position, discussed it rationally, and stood strong by our principles: it was an act of civil disobedience.

Does the silent majority on this campus possess a "sense of justice," do they hear us and listen, read our letters and understand? Is it a topic for dinnertable discussion - a joke - a lot of noise? (In the words of Benjamin Braddock,) You got me.

Yale, UMass ban

To the editor:

Your readers might be interested in knowing that the student newspapers at Yale and the University of Mass. at Amherst, also cancelled the "Dean of Beer" ads under protest. Does this mean, Marcel Oudin, that the thousands of students there are prudes too?

Not offended

To the editor:

I, on the other hand, was offended neither by the Dean of Beers nor the Library incident.

Open meeting

To the editor:

For being offended by the explicit use of a female body to sell beer, I am a prude. For being offended and alarmed by derogatory lyrics and symbolically violent language and behavior, I lack a sense of humor and am childish. Apparently, I am expected to appreciate that "boys will be boys" at Williams College. Perhaps those members of the community who share the opinions of the author of the recent letter to the editor will tell me more at the open meeting Monday night at 7:30 p.m. in Dodd House.

Case tells homecoming saga

by John Libertine

The Homecoming Concert fiasco began with the cancellation of the Music Department's production of The Merry Widow early this fall, according to Steve Case '80, chairman of the ACEC.

The ACEC learned last summer that it could not have a Homecoming concert in Chapin because the opera was scheduled at that time. The subsequent cancellation gave the ACEC four week's notice to prepare a concert for that date.

However, the ACEC was able to book both Kalapana and Cheap Trick and prepare advance publicity about a month before Homecoming. Cheap Trick cancelled on Friday, October 4 to take advantage of an opportunity to appear on Don Kirschner's television program in Los Angeles. This gave the ACEC a week to find another band.

The committee found Treasure, but on the Wednesday before the concert, the group broke up and cancelled. Ironically, Stanky Brown became available; this group had been the suggestion of several members of the ACEC in September.

According to Case, if the ACEC had known in July that there would be a concert on October 21, there would not have been any problems. As he explained, the ACEC could have signed the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, if they had known what the concert date would be during the summer. There would have been enough time available for advance publicity and the ACEC could have worked around the opera. The extra time would have insured a better prepared concert and a much better turnout. The ACEC was rushed because of the music department's decision, said Case.

"The concert was pretty well received, but we could have done a lot better given more time," Case said. The reaction of the audience seemed split; some thought Kalapana was not rowdy enough for a Homecoming concert and others thought it was one of the best bands they had ever heard.

Who's afraid of Woolf— ivory rites

by Don Frazier

The Williams Film Society will show the film version of "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" Friday, November 18 in the Bonfman Auditorium at 7 and 9:30 p.m.

Edward Albee, so the myth goes, drew the inspiration for Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? from the faculty parties he attended here in the '50's. While we try to guess who's supposed to be who (and we all have our pet theories), Albee's play works on levels of meaning transcending the literal. He transforms an evening of sophisticated cruelty and wit in the ivory tower into a raging Strindbergian fantasy; a surreal and gaudy ritual excorcising American ideals of ambition and success.

The stronger a stage play, the greater the difficulty in transferring it to film. Mike Nichols tries to play cinematographer with the few outdoor scenes, but gladly most of the action occurs in a single indoor set, and the more strictly theatrical virtues of performance and pyrotechnics triumph intact.

Nichols wisely allows full rein to Richard Burton as George, the failed and inadequate history professor, and Elizabeth Taylor as Martha, his floozy, castrating wife. The camera pries into them indecently, capturing George's quality of sensitive self-disgust and an overweight Taylor brimming with bile and Electral frustrations.

Their epic conflict begans after a party. It is an indulgent, humiliation of a new, hollow bio instructor, played by George Segal, and his silly child-bride, a buck-toothed Sandy Dennis. Reality and illusion, however, soon swirl into an all-night battle of overwhelming rage. George and Martha (aptly named) exchange incessant ruthless invective; each incisive barb is honed by twenty years of mutual, self-dependent sadism. They maintain an incredible and unbelievable pitch of savage and ironic hostility. All of this is fueled by a flood of alcohol. Their capacities, like their passions, are superhuman. Enmity has become the only way they can deal with each other, and they find endless variations in the ways they rip each other's defenses to shreds.

Beyond exposing their own failures and recriminations, George and Martha also reveal their guests' secret guilt. As cold dawn arrives, an eerie Genet-like ritual elevates the nightmare into allegory. Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? retains the impact of compelling and immediate drama.

David Bowie
RCA AFL1-2578

by M. Smith

As the "chameleon" of contemporary music, David Bowie has always been full of changes. On his latest album, "Heroes", though, confirmation proves ultimately to be the word for the work. For starters, Bowie continues his long-time collaboration with the aloof Eno. The result, as in Bowie's previous record, Low, is almost a full side of eerie, distant instrumentals with Eno on synthesizers, keyboards, and "guitar treatments". From Gothic horror show melodrama to gentle, but ill-at-ease Eastern detachment ranges the music, producing, as one of the titles puts it, a real "sense of doubt." But enough comment on this by a musical illiterate (i.e. rock critic). On to the "songs".

Instrumentals aside, "Heroes" is an intriguing album for the Bowie fan, giving him glimpses of the old and the new Bowie. Lyrically and structurally the six songs here are bare, stripped down, pathetically simple. Emotions are grim, pleading, resigned. An austere feeling pervades. A glimpse at some of the titles ("Blackout", "Beauty and the Beast", "Sons of the Silent Age") or the haunting black and white cover photo of Bowie certainly tip us off that, to say the least, all's not well. At their best, the songs confirm Bowie as the extremist poet-singer-social critics. At their worst, they make us wonder whether Bowie's terseness is merely a reflection of his supposedly growing contempt for commercial music and his commercial audience.

But is it rock 'n' roll? Yes, but not the kind which transformed a cultist kook into a hip middle class kiddie hero. The days of Ziggy and Alladin Sane, as Bowie himself has continually told interviewers, are over. The tone of the songs is more akin to the jumbled, distorted, abrasive style of Bowie's second album, The Man Who Sold The World, while the focus continues on Bowie's theatrical, almost nightclubbish, singing with a chaotic and "thick" background of supporting vocals and instruments behind him (Station To Station). In short, Bowie here is often cold, often impassioned, but seldom "catchy".

After a few listens, "Sons of The Silent Age" emerges as the best track on the album, with the title track, "Heroes", a close second. "Sons" is Bowie the true pessimist, the true cynic on the verge of his "rock 'n' roll suicide". A slow, chilling number in which good use is made of the saxophone by Bowie, "Sons" alternates between extreme alienation and desperate sentimentality:

The Sons of the Silent age stand on platforms blank looks and no books . . .
pick up in bars but cry only once make love only once but dream and dream . . .
Baby I'll never let you go
All I see is all I know
Let's find another way down.

"Heroes" is in the vein of true love versus the false world. A simple song with simple lyrics, it is, unlike most of the album, very melodic, yet is flawed by its persistent length. Note too the qualifying quotations around the title, as the realist and the pessimist in the end endure:

We can be Heroes
We're nothing
And nothing will help us
Maybe we're lying
Then you better not stay
But we could be safer
Just for one day.

The rest for the most part is a frenzy of distorted guitars, wailing and affectation by Bowie, and condensed imagery, bordering quite often on the nonsensical, for which Bowie has become famous for. And the themes too are disquieting. "Joe the Lion" with its get drunk and buy a gun motif, could be the theme song for the movie Joe. "Beauty and the Beast" tells us, "There's Slaughter in the Air." "Blackout" 's plea, "get me some protection - get me off the streets" take on an all too familiar truth in this the year of the New York blackout.

"Heroes"? An ironic title for a grim and rather dischordant album. Bowie, "The Man Who Sold The World", is back, and like Richard Hell's "Black Generation" of current New Wave fame, "He can take it or leave it anytime."

Open your eyes

To the editor:

Of course Marcel Oudin thinks of women who are shocked and dismayed by events of recent weeks as having a "very prude" attitude. Of course he sees these incidents as offensive only to a small coterie of radical feminists; it's common for people of his mien to close ranks and feel that their attitude reflects a more tolerant and reasoned approach to this sort of trash.

His poor grammar notwithstanding, Oudin probably expressed the sentiments of many in this intellectual hothouse. Sexism is so much a part of their lives that they have to gloss over the gross and demeaning outcome of their thought. The first requisite of "liberal" learning, an open mind, is something lost on them.

So disturbance is disheartening, Marcel? I suppose it is to the complacent, the sleepwalkers on this campus.

Open your eyes; there are women and men here who understand that violent degradation of any of us hurts all of us. Your complacency and "relaxation," Marcel, is the foundation upon which all sexism, racism, etc., is built. Until we all realize this, liberal education isn't worth a damn.

OUR newspaper

To the editor:

I would like to express my support for all those who felt that the recent beer ads have no place in the issues of The Williams Record. In the first place, it must be stressed that your paper is not subject to the usual canons of journalistic independence. Your paper prints on its front page the name and seal of our college. It accepts what I gather is free office space in Baxter at a certain cost to us all. Most importantly, it supports itself in part by a considerable amount of money allocated from mandatory student tax funds. Like it or not, you are thus a semi-official organ of this educational institution required by the aid that you accept to be present and to listen to groups who feel that their aid to you is being abused.

As such, you ought to be committed to the educational objective of furthering human freedom. Surely this means not only refusing [illegible] the Nazi Final Solution or portray Blacks as shiftless, but also not insisting that (as one of your letter writers put it) women ought to have "a sense of humor" when an advertisement portrays them as little more than people in hot pants who have a nice set of knockers.

The obligations of human decency, in sum, at times run afoul of the concept of pure tolerance. Dangerous though that concept may be, the perpetuation of insults to one-half our people represents an even greater danger to the achievement of the legitimate goals of our College newspaper.

[illegible]
Associate Professor

Hakala traverses Greek Marathon

Mary Hakala '79, who is studying at the University of Oslo in Norway this year, traveled to Greece in early November and placed third among the women and 127th overall in the Greek Marathon. The 42 kilometer race was run from Marathon to Athens with 1,500 runners competing.

Hakala ran an excellent time of 3:08.25 and received a medal and two certificates for her performance. The event was run on an asphalt course in high temperatures and is the site of the original "marathon" run. In 490 B.C., Phiddipides "invented" the race by running from the Plains of Marathon to Athens to proclaim victory over the Persians. Unfortunately, Phiddipides received no Gatorade along the way to protect him from the high temperatures and after reaching Athens, he died.

Winston said a survey would be distributed to faculty members in the "next few days" on the question of general education.

Energy

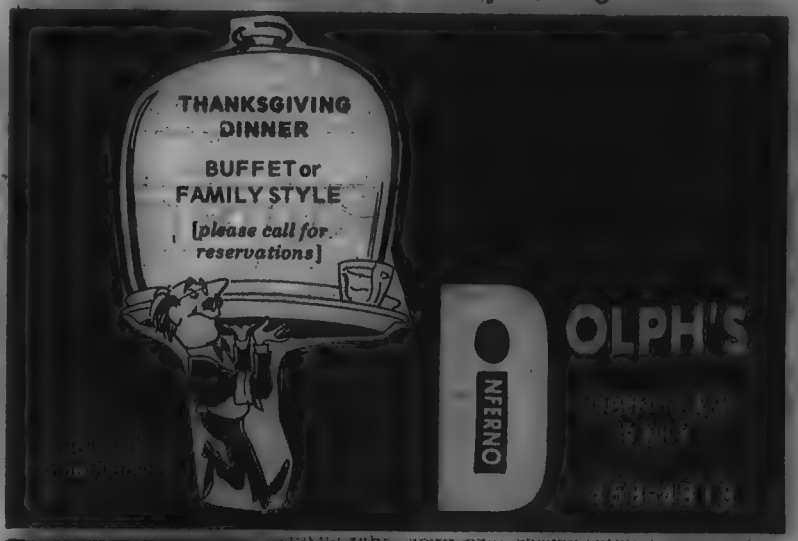
In other business, Charles Fuqua reported on the actions of the month-old Energy Conservation Committee which he chairs. Fuqua outlined the committee's four part program which begins with a definition of the energy problem at Williams. In the second stage, the committee will conduct a detailed review of current energy policy, Fuqua said. The committee will then recommend changes in energy consumption policy, intended for implementation this year. The fourth stage will address what Fuqua described as "a need to create continued and continuing awareness of energy consumption at Williams."

Describing the scale of energy expenditures at Williams, Fuqua noted that "5 per cent of the college budget went to energy costs last year and 50 per cent of the student board bill goes to energy."

Fuqua said that the committee must assume annual energy price increases of 10 per cent in determining the prospects for controling energy costs and consumption on campus.

Copyrights

Fuqua's report was followed by a discussion of the new copyright legislation which will go into effect in January. Lawrence E. Wikander, College Librarian, told the faculty that "multiple copies for classroom use are okay under the new laws, according to the fair-use principle." Faculty members may duplicate copyright works outside of the library, for classroom use, and may distribute copies to students in class. "The library, however, is prohibited from making multiple copies of copyright works or distributing multiple copies," he explained. In terms of its application to Williams, Wikander noted that the new legislation will mean that only a single copy of a reproduced work can be placed on reserve in Sawyer.



What really happened

"It would have been an opportunity to show the quality programs we have at the two schools," explained Peck, "we've got bright kids, a spirited and unique rivalry, and good feeling between the school." The Williams athletic director is certainly not dissatisfied with what the schools have without television, but notes that "I think we missed a wonderful opportunity to display a fine academic-athletic setting."

On the philosophical level, it comes down to this: Williams was willing to take a chance, a chance at enhancing the already fine reputation of the schools, while Amherst balked on the possibility that maybe somebody was trying to turn their quiet little academic Eden into a football factory. One just has to wonder what might have happened had the game been on Pratt Field.

Just one more thing. What about the players themselves? If there's any doubt in anyone's mind as to how those 80 individuals (yeah, both schools) who sweat to toil in front of a couple grand each week felt about the chance, just ask a player. After all, aren't they the ones who really count?

Purple ruggers end year with victories over Jeffs

The Williams Rugby Football Club saw its season come to a happy ending Saturday, beating the Amherst club twice. The A-side got by the Jeffs 10-9 while the B's trounced their foes 18-4.

Spurred on by an Amherst refusal to play for shirts, the A's jumped out to an early 6-0 lead after a try and extra point by Tom Kondel. Two field goals and a drop kick by the Amherst kicker put all of the opponents' points on the board in the middle of the first half. Good line play and strong scrum pressure set the stage for a fine goal line penalty play and a try by captain Jim Stuart. That brought the half to a close with the final 10-9 score already on the board.

The second half was played almost entirely in the Amherst half of the field. With the scrum controlling the ball much of the time, Kondel kept the opposite scrum half from getting the ball to the line and various Amherst attempts at offense were easily stifled. Williams remained in control until the end of the contest, with only a determined Amherst defense preventing more purple points from reaching the scoreboard.

The B-side closed out a fine season by going undefeated in its last five games. In Saturday's 18-4 rout of the Lord Jeffs, Williams dominated play from the start giving the visitors little room to work. Strong scrum and line work kept the B's on top the entire game.

Tries by Vic Zerbino and two by Yashi Belash, along with three extra points by Zerbino marked the scoring for Williams.

Runners place 18th at Div III Nationals; 2 crack top 100

by Frank Carr

The Williams cross country runners closed out their best season ever Saturday, placing 18th at the National Championships in Cleveland. Fifty-two of the best Division III schools in the country were on hand for the race as the 410 entrants were welcomed to Cleveland by a three-inch snowfall on Friday night.

The blanket of snow turned into a sea of mud once the race started and consequently the times were slowed drastically. Dale Kramer of Carelton College, who was the individual winner for the second year in a row, ran 24:56 in the ice and mud of the 1976 race but this year he was slowed to 25:44 for the same 8,000 meter course.

Despite the snow and freezing temperatures, two California schools (Occidental and Humboldt State) finished first and second, so it seemed fitting enough that a Californian should lead the Williams harriers.

Junior Tom Schreck flew into Cleveland on Thursday night after passing up the 10 hour drive to get some work done and he kept right on flying after the starting pistol went off on Saturday. Schreck went out fast at the start to avoid the mass of runners and he was able to keep his place in the front pack as his ¾" spikes gave him adequate traction in the messy conditions. After hitting the two mile at 9:30, he hung with the pack through the back section of the course and then outkicked the third man from Brandeis and Bates for 53rd place overall.

Schreck's time for the course (which was 51 yards short of 5 miles) was 27:08, and although it was quite a bit slower than his 24:59 five-mile clocking from the Easterns he was very happy with his performance.

Senior Frank Carr was the second Williams runner to complete the course, as he just cracked into the national top 100 with a 99th place effort. Carr ran his last collegiate cross country race in a time of 27:30. Sophomore Mike Behrman followed just 18 seconds in back of Carr, but with several runners finishing every second he crossed the line as the number 147 runner. Joe Kolb was right behind Behrman in 153rd place, recording a time of 27:55.

Team captain Dan Sullivan found himself face-down on the ground after a stampede-like start, but the senior harrier managed to quickly get back in the race and make up the lost yardage. Sullivan passed over 150 runners along the route and came home in 267th at 29:22. Garrick Leonard completed the six-man purple contingent, running 29:53 in his first NCAA race for 325th place. Both Sullivan and Leonard finished the actual race in a little over 28 minutes, but because of a massive traffic jam in the finish chute their times were boosted over a minute each.

UMass sinks waterwomen

The women's swim team lacked its early-season liveliness Wednesday night as it dropped its first dual meet of the season to UMass, 76-55.

UMass held Williams to five victories in the fourteen-event meet, while itself sweeping four events and both relays. Senior Sue Tuttle accounted for two of Williams' wins in the breaststroke events, clocking a fast 34.9 in the 50 and a 1:19.4 in the 100.

Joanna Monroe was also unaffected by the general pallor hanging over the team. She won the 50 fly in 29.4, her best time so far this season, and placed third in the 100 yd. event.

Keron Walker also claimed two first in the 100 individual medley and the 50 freestyle before succumbing to the continuing illness which has dogged her for the past three weeks. Freshmen Katherine Pearsall and Linda Reed each took two seconds apiece, losing close races in the 200 and 500 freestyle events and the two back strokes, respectively.

Sarah Mann swam an excellent race in the second heat of the 500 freestyle, just nipping her UMass competition on the last lap.

While at this time last year the swimming season was virtually over for the Ephwomen, there remain five more meets for Coach Samuelson's team before the New England Swimming and Diving Championships February. The Saturday after Thanksgiving vacation the mermaids will travel to Amherst with the men's varsity to help it open its season against a perennially weak Amherst squad. The last home meet before February is against a strong Smith team on December 7.

Harrington wins athlete honor

Athlete of the Week: Scott Harrington

Scott Harrington, senior halfback on the varsity football team, has been chosen as the Record Athlete of the Week after his outstanding game against Amherst Saturday. The senior tri-captain rushed for 99 yards on 20 carries and caught three passes for another 47 yards. Harrington, after missing four games due to a knee injury, returned to the line-up to score the winning touchdown in the Wesleyan game and then sparked the Ephs to a 21-13 victory over Amherst for undisputed possession of the Little Three crown.

HONORABLE MENTION—Tom Kondel and Yashi Belash of the men's rugby team receive honorable mention this week as their efforts gave the WRFC two victories over Amherst. Kondel's try and extra point led the A-side to a 10-9 win, while Belash's pair of tries brought the B-side to 18-4 trouncing of the Jeffs.

Williams-Amherst-A.B.C.: what really happened?

by Tim Layden

While the excitement of an outstanding football game between two ancient rivals, one stacked, and the other rolling, descended upon the campus last week, it was accompanied by a rapidly snowballing and mind-boggling rumor. As of late Monday evening, much of the campus had become aware of the possibility of A.B.C. broadcasting the Williams-Amherst game on regional television.

Visions of slow motion, stop action, yellow banners, and "up close and personal" were conjured up in the heads of all tube-mongering Ephmen and women. And the players; well, Greg McAleenan was practicing saying "East Grand Rapids, Michigan," all night. Perhaps Jim Lampley will even be on the sidelines, thought the Williams coeds.

An already enthusiastic Williams campus seemed on cloud 10 at the prospect of seeing Purple Cows, marching bands, and Weston Field on the tube. All hopes, however, were dashed as quickly as they appeared sometime early Tuesday afternoon when Williams athletic director Bob Peck informed A.B.C. regional media chief Donn Bernstein that "the two schools were unable to get together on the deal," and that A.B.C. would not be allowed to televise the game.

Since Williams was to be the host school for the telecast, the final decision had to come from here. There was no blame attached to either institution in the message Peck delivered to Bernstein. Rumors of an even harsher nature, however, soon began to fly. Their jist was that Williams had approved the telecast, but that the neighborly Lord Jeffs had nixed the idea.

It is unnecessary to describe the disappointment which those individual close to the team, players, fans, or otherwise, felt. The decision, of course, was not without its virtues. Coach Bob Odell used the decision as a psyche for his charges, and it would not be foolish to suggest that the thoughts that Amherst "kept us off T.V." helped contribute to the 21-13 upset win.

Bernstein related that the original terms laid down by the network called for the starting time to be moved 40 minutes, to 12:50. A later compromise of 1:20 was agreed upon. Just two cameras, with no slow motion, would be used. Rick Forzano, of Navy and Detroit Lion coaching fame, would join with one of the network's younger play-by-play men in the booth. The host school would receive from $6,000 to $8,000, and the visitors 60 per cent of that.

Why Williams-Amherst? A.B.C. has a contractural commitment with the N.C.A.A. to televise three regular-season Division III games. "We felt that if Williams-Amherst doesn't represent Division III football," explained Bernstein from his New York office, "nothing does; that's why we chose the game. Two network outlets, one in Springfield, Mass. and the other in Albany, N.Y. would have carried the telecast, making it actually somewhat less than regional.

Peter Gooding, first-year athletic director at Amherst granted a statement to the Amherst Student following consultation with college president John William Ward. The resulting story appeared as a page one lead story two days before the game and was headed "Ward Punts Williams T.V. Coverage." For all who desired an admission that Amherst's was the decision to turn down the telecast, the story is adequate proof.

Acting as spokesman for the school, Gooding outlined a series of reasons for the decision, ranging from Williams' being "only lukewarm" on the idea to the more critical issues, the "philosophical" ones everyone was talking about. "The image of the school would be distorted," related Gooding. According to the Student, Gooding mentioned that A.B.C. could portray Amherst in such a way such as to compromise the school's values of low-key athletics and its emphasis on academics.

Now, A.B.C. is a professional organization, viewed by the average sports fan on Monday night professional football games, and the major college clashes. It seems Gooding feared being portrayed unfairly by the network, or perhaps overrun by swarming crews of technicians. The network, however, seems to have a good deal more confidence in its ability to convey the image of the schools it presents.

"We are responsive and sensitive to the image of Division III football," explained Bernstein, "we have no intention of attempting to portray it as Division I or II; we respect the institutions involved and their students." Bernstein also noted that the network's philosophy and understanding was thoroughly explained to Gooding, but that he still "expressed certain reservations." Gooding stated in the Student interview that he found A.B.C.'s "whole attitude unsatisfactory."

"Sure, we were willing to go ahead," said Peck, but we didn't want to twist Amherst's arm." Peck admitted that he "understands their reasons," but seems to feel that the positive factors which would have resulted from such exposure would have far outweighed the problems expressed by Amherst.

Copyright law will curtail Reserve works at Sawyer

Sawyer Library will drastically cut back its supply of articles on reserve when a federal copyright law takes effect January 1, according to Librarian Lawrence Wikander. The new law will allow reproduction of single copies, but prohibits libraries from making multiple copies of materials without written permission from the copyright owner.

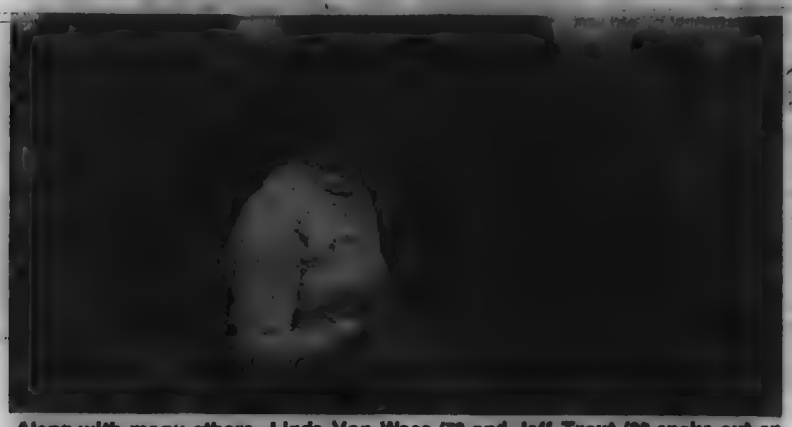
The law, which was passed in October 1976, is "very restrictive," according to Wikander. He suggested that professors "should try to retreat under the umbrella of paragraph 107, the 'fair use' clause, whenever they can."

Previously, "fair use" was a general agreement, assuming that a person could quote a certain amount of copyrighted material without permission. However, the new statute will restrict "fair use" to purposes of "criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching, scholarship or research," allow a limited amount of the work to be reproduced and consider the effect of multiple copies on the potential market for the work. By invoking this "umbrella," professors can make multiple copies if they, rather than the library, distribute them to students.

The law also broadens the definition of copyrighted materials, protecting them from the moment of their creation until 50 years after the death of the author.

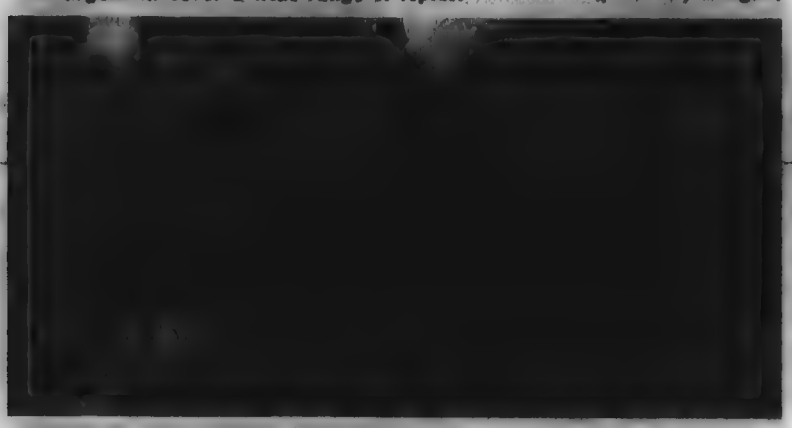
Under the law, reserve materials will be limited to items published before 1921, (the date of the original copyright laws), works written by professors at this college and articles which indicate that permission is granted for unlimited xeroxing.

Wikander described several options that could be followed after January 1. "The college administration, in this case, President Chandler, could tell us to continue as before." However, he dismissed this alternative, as, "they do not seem disposed to do this."



Swarthmore College, which also has an extensive reserve system, follows a plan similar to this, as Wikander described, "They have filing cases with multiple copies of copyrighted material, but the library pretends they don't know these cases are there."

Smith College's policy is to encourage students to make their own copies of single articles on reserve.



Clearly, however, compliance with the law will sharply diminish reserve materials. Wikander stated, "After January 1, we won't have multiple copies for reserve that are outside the public domain. We will stay with the one copy until some other law comes down allowing multiple copies."

VOL. 91, NO. 21 WILLIAMS COLLEGE NOVEMBER 29, 1977

Along with many others, Linda Van Waes '78 and Jeff Trout '80 spoke out on sexism at Williams. Beginning with the "Dean of Beer's" ad and an incident involving a scantily clothed inflatable female doll in the library, discussion and argument cover a wide range of topics. (photos by Oettgen)

400 attend forum on sexism

Over 400 people crowded into Baxter Hall on the Monday night before Thanksgiving break to attend the forum on sexism and the general concern expressed at that meeting was the need to promote a greater degree of sensitivity on campus for women's rights.

The two events of the preceding week—the "Dean of Beers" ad and the library incident—served primarily as a starting point for a more generalized discussion of the problem of sexism here.

"The advent of coeduation at Williams has had little effect on the functioning of this school," began the forum's organizers in their opening statement. "Williams today remains essentially a school for men."

Among the specific reforms advocated in that opening statement were proposals to eliminate the single-sex freshman entry system, to review the JA selection procedure, and to demand that the Deans' Office take a more active role in condemning blatantly sexist practices.

In response, Dean Berek spoke about his office's handling of the students who were involved in the incident in the library. "So long as I was dealing with a disciplinary matter," he said, "I felt that it was my job to remain silent. However, I think that we can join in deploring that incident and look towards creating a Williams College where things like this don't happen."

College President John Chandler affirmed the fact that "Williams College does have an obligation to educate its members." "Our graduates have a multiplier effect in our society," he said, "and I agree that we should be doing more consciousness raising here." Chandler said that he would like to see more women's studies courses at the school and he noted the need for more women on the faculty and board of trustees.

Participants at the forum however expressed concern that the sexist attitudes here emanated not from administrative negligence but from the students themselves. As one person observed, "It's a problem of student attitudes and it's harder to change." "The key word here is consciousness," said another student. "And how much can one individual do?" asked a third speaker. "Every time that I want to speak out about it, people view me as a political statement."

Participants agreed that there was a need for greater tolerance of differing opinions on campus. Some individuals believed that sexism was not a problem at Williams. "It seems that people on all sides of this issue have a 'holier than thou' attitude," one person observed, "and we have to have a little more compassion for others."

Although there was general agreement that the forum itself had served a constructive purpose, there was apprehension as to whether the ideas expressed at the meeting would be translated into action. College Council President Tom Herwitz noted the virtual disappearance of student activism in the aftermath of last year's Gladden House forum on student power. He said he hoped that the forum on sexism would be remembered. Another participant observed that, "this has been one of the greatest educational experiences that I've had here. What scares the hell out of me is my feeling that come tomorrow, nothing will be done."

One senior was more optimistic. "There are so many people here," he noticed, "and conditions here have changed. The Williams College that I knew four years ago was a lot more intolerant."

Peer health center expands health care and counseling

by Julie Bermant

Peer Health Counseling has increased awareness of its services this fall through the distribution of information about the group, including the names of the counselors and their phone numbers, and the "Contraceptive of the Week" display in Sawyer Library.

The idea of forming a student organization that could provide information and help on sex-related problems and health care began four years ago, when some students approached Kristina Beatty, at the gynecological service of the infirmary. They felt there was a need for an intermediary group of peers who could offer advice and answer questions that students might desire before or after going to the infirmary. Beatty, who had been a full-time family planning counselor, offered to teach a course in order to train the students to become peer health counselors.

One of the first accomplishments of Peer Health Counseling was the creation of the "Williams Guide to Health and Sex" which has been distributed in freshman entries for the past three years. Last year, the group tried having a counselor available in the waiting room of the gynecological clinic in order to answer questions that students might have, but it was generally felt that the area was not conducive to open discussions. Few people asked questions and those who did usually wanted to know the prices of various contraceptives. The group has discontinued having a counselor in the clinic this year, but it plans to place there a list of the prices of contraceptives available in the area.

The group was also responsible for showing a film about contraceptive methods. Entitled "Hope is not a Method," the film was shown semimonthly last year. Because the audience was so small each time, the film will be shown once over Winter Study and again next semester, expecting larger audiences.

The group says it also holds meetings with the newly appointed Junior Advisors and with freshman entries each year. This year particularly, the group has visited almost all the freshmen entries and talked about the gynecological services offered at the infirmary, major methods of birth control, and information about the group itself. In the past, the established counselor, Eleanor Hamilton, has given a talk about non-verbal communication and her personal experiences as a counselor. The group says it hopes to bring another speaker to the campus this year.

The most recognized function of the group is the two hour session (3-5 p.m. on Fridays) that Beatty makes available at the Women's Center located in the Center for Environmental Studies. In addition to providing contraceptive information and counseling, she offers free pregnancy tests. Many students prefer taking the tests from her rather than at the infirmary because the results are given right away and because there is a stronger feeling of confidentiality.

A course concerning anatomy, reproduction, human sexual response, forms of contraceptives, and general physical health is taught by Peer Health Counseling. Offered once each semester and over Winter Study, it is composed of eight two-hour sessions. The first four deal with information about aspects of sexuality and the last four provide training on counseling primarily through role playing games in which students are presented with situations similar to those that Beatty has encountered during her experience as a counselor.

Beatty has taught all the courses, but this Winter Study two of the peer health counselors, Sher Berggren and Stephen Daniel, will be offering the course as part of the Free University program. The sessions involving counseling training are not required,

Open letter of apology

An open letter to the Williams College Community:

We, the students responsible for the incident in the reserve room on November 7, apologize to any and all who were offended by our actions. We did not intend to degrade the women of this campus. Our actions were not a premeditated attempt to insult anyone. The incident was the result of a surprise birthday party which admittedly got out of hand while breaking up. We realize that our actions were offensive to many and we apologize.

Committee to present results of energy study

The Energy Conservation Committee will present a report on energy use and conservation to the College Council tomorrow night.

According to Charles Fuqua, chairman, the committee's primary job is to "create a sense of awareness . . . that traditional assumptions of energy consumption have to go by the board."

The committee has three functions: first, to study energy usage on campus on a total scale; second, to review current conservation recommendations; and finally, to recommend additional or substitutive proposals. The past several months have been spent examining statistical data and determining their validity.

The committee will make no recommendations Wednesday night, but the bulk of the research, according to Fuqua, has been completed. The major difficulty, he said, was in dealing with buildings whose ages vary as much as two hundred years.

The committee plans to make some preliminary recommendations to the faculty next month, and the rest during January, said Fuqua.

Fuqua emphasized that the committee is dealing with sums of money, affecting both tuition and salaries. The College spent about $800,000 on energy last year, the equivalent of about 11 per cent of tuition revenue, or approximately $400 per student. The committee's goal is to hold energy costs steady.

In compiling the data, the committee spoke to the major energy users on campus to discover their needs. Among them were the Athletic Department, especially regarding Towne Field House and Chapman Rink; the science departments; Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing; and Francis Dewey III '41, chairman of the Physical Facilities Committee.

According to Fuqua, the ECC had considered various incentives to groups in order to reduce usage, but no specific proposals have been formulated yet.

Viewpoint

'Freedom of the Press'

by David Breuer

Jim Cohen's Viewpoint on newspaper "freedom" and "independence" (Record, Nov. 15) is an incredible statement of philosophy for the managing editor of a student newspaper. One would almost think from his reaction that the "independence" of the Record in its newswriting and editorial writing had been challenged by the students of Williams College. Unfortunately, in my 3½ years at Williams I have seen considerably more pressure put on Record "journalism" by members of the Williams College administration and faculty than by the students of Williams College. There has yet to be a serious challenge by the students to the Record's lack of independent journalism.

According to its ownership report, the Williams Record is owned by "The Students of Williams College", and therefore ultimate control rests in the student body. It is not a matter of "financial interest", but of ownership, which means control. Jim Cohen can talk about abstract concepts of "freedom of the press", and to some extent an editorial board has this freedom, but it must remember that any editorial board or editor is ultimately accountable to those who own the paper even in societies with "freedom of the press". In the case of newspapers in the U.S., editors can be fired by the owners for executing policies out of line with the owners' wishes, and are usually hired in the first place because of their agreement with the owners. The Record's contention in its November 18 editorial that it "in some sense speaks for the college community as a whole" ignores once again the fact that the Record is a student newspaper which should be operated in the interests of students, not on behalf of the Williams College "Community" in which students have very little power. The Record editors are just beginning to be called to account by the student body for their policy (or non-policy) in the area of advertising. When will the student body wake up, and call them to account for their journalistic and editorial policies (or lack thereof)?

Finally, Jim Cohen's "threat" not to publish the Record under circumstances in which the current editorial board or its appointed successor does not retain control is no threat at all. If the Record decides to cease publishing, it will only hurt the current staff members of the Record (presumably it will hurt them) and the Williams College administration, who have received, and will probably continue to receive, excellent coverage and non-coverage of their activities and non-activities at Williams College.

Letters: More responses on sexism, advertising

Berek publicizes his investigation

To the editor:

Between the time of the deplorable sexist disturbance in the Reserve Room of Sawyer Library and Thursday, November 17, my responsibilities as Dean of the College made me an investigator and judge of an alleged disciplinary infraction. So long as I was fulfilling these responsibilities, simple fairness precluded my making any private—much less public—judgements until my investigation was complete, the alleged perpetrators of the incident identified, their guilt or innocence assessed, and appropriate disciplinary penalties meted out. The judgement I made rested on an institutional perception of what constitutes acceptable conduct at Williams College, not on the urgings of any group of students or faculty. Once these disciplinary issues were resolved, I felt free to speak out, as I did at the open meeting on November 21 and as I am doing in this letter.

Of course there is sexism at Williams, just as there exists here racism, anti-Semitism, prejudice against gay men and women, and other forms of narrowmindedness and intolerance. Williams draws most of its students and faculty from the United States, and they bring with them both laudable and blameworthy ideas and attitudes reflecting those existing in American society today, including such deplorable ones as these. But there are also at Williams many men and women, including students, faculty, and staff, who resolutely oppose sexism and other forms of bigotry.

By its policies and actions, Williams College strives to create a community in which men and women can fulfill their potential to the best of their abilities, unfettered by the prejudices of others. Of course the College opposes sexism, as it opposes racism and other forms of bigotry. As an educational institution, we make our opposition known not merely by public proclamation but by trying to develop policies and practices, both academic and social, which try to sensitize students and other members of the community to the nature of sexual prejudice and to ways of diminishing its impact at Williams and, in the long run, on the larger society of which we are a part.

I believe the College community took a useful step towards reaching these goals by the open meeting in Baxter Hall on Monday, November 21. I and my colleagues in the Dean's Office participated in the planning and sponsorship of that meeting and in many other discussions with groups and individuals between the time of the Reserve Room incident and Thanksgiving recess. We urged JA's, College Council members, House Presidents, and other students in a position to have an impact on their peers to attend. We expect to continue working with men and women of good will to find ways of building at Williams a community more intelligent, sensitive, and humane.

On November 18 I received a copy of a letter to the Editor of the Record signed by eighteen of my Faculty colleagues. Only one of the signers of that letter had spoken to me inquiring about my actions as Dean with respect to the Reserve Room incident; her conversation occurred on the date of the letter itself. The assumption stated by the first paragraph of the letter—that "long silence amounts to support for such sexist behavior"—is as illogical as it is insulting. I place a high value on fair-minded investigation of facts and wish the signers of that letter had done so as well.

Sincerely yours,
Peter Berek

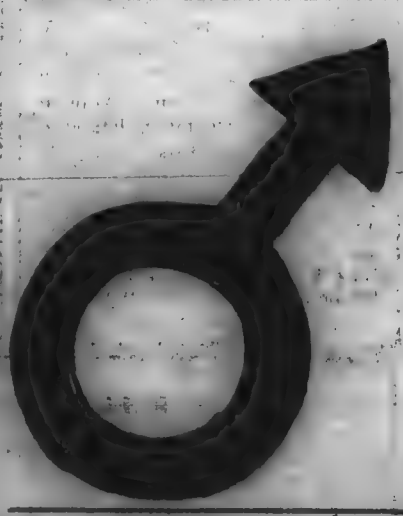
Chandler details administration's handling of 'incident'



To the editor:

During the Baxter Hall forum on sexism at Williams Dean Berek recounted the administration's actions in response to the incident in the library reserve room that deeply offended many members of the Williams community, myself included. This letter is for the benefit of those who did not attend the open meeting and is intended for the further purpose of answering the charge that the administration did not respond adequately to the library incident.

The reserve room episode occurred on the evening of November 7 and came to the attention of Dean Berek and other administrative officers on November 10 shortly after their return from a two-day trip on college business. It took several days to conduct a fair investigation—interviewing witnesses, sorting out conflicting accounts, interviewing those responsible, and finally arriving at an appropriate disciplinary response. The period of investigation overlapped the faculty meeting on November 16, and Dean Berek and I decided that a statement on that occasion would not be proper in view of the pending disciplinary hearing. On Thursday, November 17 disciplinary action was taken against all the individuals involved. In a front-page story in the November 18 issue of the Record Dean Berek commented on the seriousness of the offense and called attention to the forthcoming open forum on sexism of which the Deans' Office was a sponsor.

A lengthy series of developments in recent years demonstrates this College's firm commitment to being a community in which a diverse group of women and men can grow and learn in an atmosphere of mutual support, respect and tolerance. Those developments have come against a historical background in which less than ten years ago Williams had no women students or trustees and only two women faculty members. The offense in the library was a serious violation of conditions of community that many of us have worked hard to promote, and I deeply regret it. The College's response took proper account of the rights of all concerned. I believe it also underscores our commitment to a Williams in which men and women feel equally at home.

Sincerely yours,
John W. Chandler

Symptom not prank

To the editor:

As women faculty members, we would like to express our concern and shock at the incident which occurred in the reserve room of the library on Monday evening, 7 November. We are even more dismayed by the administration's failure to condemn the incident publicly and immediately. Their long silence amounts to support for such sexist behavior.

We are also angered by the Record's failure to report the event in a regular news story. By failing to do so, the newspaper has abdicated its primary responsibility to inform this community of significant events. The decision not to report a sexist incident speaks as loudly as a decision to publish a sexist advertisement.

The silence of The Record and the administration proves that the library incident was not an isolated prank but the symptom of a pervasive and disturbing insensitivity to women on this campus.

Sincerely yours,
Marcella Mazzarelli, Brooke Larsen, Sarah Roche-Gerstein, Carol McGuirk, Lynda Bundtzen, Meredith Hoppin, Sarah Stage, Gail Peck, Sherron Knopp, Betsy Colford, Gillian Feeley-Harnik, Fran Kleinman, Eva U. Grudin, Barbara Nadel, Eunice Smith, Joanne Kosiveki.

Reader deplores Schlitz advertisement suppression

To the editor:

At the outset, please let me make it clear that I am the father of John Libertine '80 and that my views do NOT necessarily reflect his in any way.

As a 25 year veteran advertising man, I was shocked and chagrined to see your Editorial Board suppress the beer ad as reported in your November 11 issue. Our system of government allows sufficient means of expressing disapproval and dissenting opinion without resorting to outright censorship. And make no mistake, you are by this act putting yourselves in the position of censors.

I have no qualms about letting women express themselves on issues they consider important to them. But when they resort to the type of pressure which obviously brought about this censorship, they are putting themselves in the very same shoes as those they criticize. They are, in essence, aligning themselves with the book-burners, the secret societies and the do-gooders who somehow seem to be so much wiser than the rest of us that they can dictate our morals, our ethics . . . our very thinking.

It is time someone pointed out that the emperor has no clothes. I defy anyone to come up with a concensus of what constitutes "acceptable" sex . . . or dress . . . or morals in general. Yes, they have the right to protest. I maintain they do NOT have the right to suppress.

Worse, I strongly urge the Editorial Board to consider what they are doing. By giving in to one pressure group, they are abrogating the rights of other people. Some of us (yes, Virginia) actually like to see a comely maiden (properly dressed or otherwise) used as an attention getting device. If you want to go so far as to say this takes away from the model as a person, go ahead. But say it in the right way. For example, editorially or, by a paid advertising response. Even if those of us who have no objection to this type of ad are in the minority (and I don't think we are) we have the right to run that type of ad.

I urge you re-consider and run the third insertion as originally intended.

Sincerely,
John A. Libertine

Dichotomy seen

To the editor:

Despite repeated remarks to the contrary last Monday night at the mass discussion, I cannot believe that the issues of sexism and human rights on the Williams College campus belong essentially to any one group—students, in particular. They are pervasive concerns that necessarily involve every individual within the community.

Despite a generally high level of student self-commitment and personal honesty, a frustrating dichotomy developed at the meeting between the students and a group of administrators who very conspicuously huddled together in the corner of the room. When they spoke it was a collective voice. The President of the College centered a needless defense on the innovative policy of actively searching out women for the Board of Trustees and for honorary degrees. The Dean of the College (and it appeared that there is, indeed, only one Dean—or did they agree beforehand to consolidate their power?) consistently threw the burden back to students, disassociating the administration from any leadership role.

I saw no evidence that John Chandler, Peter Berek, or any of their associates, attended that meeting. Apparently they are too concerned with maintaining their facade of authority to shed their protective cocoons. Nothing could do more to create an open, tolerant atmosphere on this campus than for persons in positions of power to show individual concern, to reveal a few personal thoughts. Instead they persist in perpetuating a basic distrust, afraid, I suppose, that we will prey on any such [illegible] of weakness.

in order to become a counselor but are encouraged. Berggren said that the experience of counseling is good for an individual because it helps one in dealing with his or her own personal relationships and in developing sensitivity. Only about ten people took the course last year, but this year there has been a marked increase. Fourteen new people are expected to become members of the group this semester.

Peer Health Counseling has tried primarily to provide information and to bring people's feelings about sexuality out into the open. According to Berggren, the group has a great one-to-one counseling potential, but few people have recognized this. By becoming more active in the college community, the group says it hopes to develop this awareness. The group says it can help those people who feel intimidated by the doctors at the infirmary or those who need additional information or instruction after using the infirmary. Last year, the group made the contraceptive and pregnancy advice of a disliked gynecologist who has since been fired.

The group claims that they have received positive feedback on the "Contraceptive of the Week" display in the library, which shocked some at first. Originally, the display was proposed for the infirmary, but the group was denied permission to set it up there. The present location has increased awareness of the group in all levels of the college community including alumni and prospective students with their parents.

The group tries to avoid taking particular stands on issues because members insist that its chief goal is to help students make their own value judgments and decisions according to their personal needs. It says it hopes that more people will be willing to seek help and develop their awareness of the importance of such concerns in the future.

COME SEE WHY EVERYBODY IS TRYING TO KEEP UP WITH US.

Punk rock or "New Wave" is the musical craze this year. The interchangeability of these two terms tips us off to something; namely, that this music is as easy to stereotype as it is hard to define. In a word, Punk is diverse, extremely diverse. In its "purest" form, Punk represents a return to the basics of mid-sixties hard rock as developed by the likes of the early Who and Kinks. At its "rawest" and most defiant, Punk takes its inspiration from the impudent Iggy Pop and the tongue-in-cheek New York Dolls.

Punk is both American and British. Across the seas it is as political as is musical—a symbol of youth, disillusionment, and discontent which reaches nightmarish proportions in the music and followers of groups like the Sex Pistols. Meanwhile, back in the States, Punk is more tame, more a mocker than a spitting rocker.

Many a casual observer thinks Punk is sick, and at its extremes it probably is. At its best though it proves to be of interesting substance as again and again themes of complacency, mass media induced boredom and lethargy, and "dead" feelings pop up, often when one least expects it.

On the whole, it is perhaps fair to say a third of Punk is cacophonous noise and menace, another third good straight rock and roll alerting us that the boys are back in town, and the final third intriguing and disturbing "New Wave" music. Here follows a rundown of some of the more noteworthy and-or notorious of the Punk performers from B to V:

Blondie. Blondie features the surf, sand, sun, and fun of the Annette Funicello days with risque lyrics and song titles ("X-Offender", "Rip Her To Shreads"), camp humor ("Kung Fu Girls") and condescending nonsense ("The Attack of the Giant Ants"). A real pastiche of early sixties Americana, Blondie sings catchy, snappy tunes and sports New York's leader in "radical chic" fashion, Deborah Harry. And she can sing, too (Sexist).

Elvis Costello. Clad in blue jeans, white sox, and thick glasses, Elvis Costello, the man and the name, comes off as a sad but comic personage. But this Britisher has talent. Possessing a fine voice, Elvis sings compellingly, almost perhaps like a fifties version of Springstein.

Mink DeVille. Another New York group, Mink has been a regular attraction at CBGB's for the past year or so. Their debut album is Jack Nitzsche—produced (of early Stones fame) and captures the feel of New York City street life with bluesy ballads and traditional rock.

Patti Smith. The "high priestess" of avant-garde guts, energy, and emotion, Patti Smith cannot be done justice to in this short space. At times pretentious, at times distasteful, at times frenzied, Patti is never dull. Her two albums, Horses and Radio Ethiopia, are both uneven, but contain some faculous rockers and impassioned ballads. A former poet, Patti often treds the line between dige-like singing and raving recitation on her more bizarre creations.

Talking Heads. Talking Heads are, along with Television, the most highly touted of New York's "New Wave". As far from the punk stereotype as possible, the group looks like a bunch of clean cut Ivy Leaguers, right down to their button-down shirts. "Normalcy is part of their pose", however, as Rolling Stone puts it, for Talking Heads performs a subtly sarcastic brand of music based upon dead-pan, good harmonies, and touches of absurdity and indifference. Talking Heads: '77, their first album, is definitely worth more than a few listens.

Television. Television haunts, hypnotizes. Their tone is an eerie chill which is the result of some of the most creative rock and roll guitar work and invocative lyrics in years. Group leader Tom Verlaine is responsible on both counts, and their initial album, Marquee Moon, is easily one of 1976's best, if not the best. A must to see live!

The Clash. One of the "heavies" of England's destroyers, they are as guitarist Mick Jones explains, "a trashy white group dealing in oppression". Song titles include "White Riot", "Deny", "London's Burning", "Garageland" and "I'm So Bored With The USA".

The Dictators. Contrived, condescending, powerful, and melodic, The Dictators are heavy-handed and light-hearted. Their second album, Manifest Destiny, despite a few excesses, is one of the real pleasant surprises of '77.

The Jam. The Jam are a seventies reincarnation of the early Who. From their dark suits to their mod haircuts to songs about "the kids who know where it's at", the Jam embody the fresh, vital spirit of British Rock in the sixties.

The Ramones. The initiators of Punk Rock in American, the Ramones are now three albums worth of three-chord "songs" of innanity. Having been called "great, but boring" by one critic, The Ramones are the ultimate parody of minimalism, and of rock and roll for that matter.

The Sex Pistols. Johnny Rotten, Sid Vicious and the gang have been laughing all the way to the bank for some time now. Their debut album, Never Mind The Bollocks Here's The Sex Pistols, shows why. After all the outrage and publicity, The Sex Pistols, in their own words, still are "pretty vacant". They'll be remembered, but more for their antics than their music.

The Stranglers. Riding the crest of the New Wave, The Stranglers possess musical talent but an excessive desire to offend a la the Sex Pistols with more sophistication (but not much).

Hoopsters open Thursday versus Hamilton at home

Basketball opens Thursday against Hamilton. Tony's squad looks to improve last year's 12-10 record. (photo by C. Read)

by Frank Pergolizzi

The Williams basketball team opens its season this Thursday against a powerful NESCAC opponent, the Hamilton Continentals. Gametime is 8 p.m. in Lasell Gymnasium.

This year's edition of the Williams team stands a good chance to improve on last year's 12-10 record and subsequent ECAC playoff berth. Last year the Ephmen started slow, losing four of their first six, then went on to win nine of their last fifteen, including upset wins over Yale and Hartford, before bowing to Wesleyan in the ECAC Division II-III tournament 52-42 in overtime. The Ephs were especially tough at Lasell, winning eleven and losing one, and hold a nine game winning streak at home. They have lost only one starter, Mike Tanner, last year's leading scorer, and feature a probable starting five with a combined ten years varisty experience, though only two are seniors.

Leading Williams this year will be captain Brad Wolk, a 6-5 center who led Williams in field goal percentage (55.6) and rebound average (8.7) while scoring 10.3 ppg, fourth best on the team. "Brad is a strong defensive player, and I expect him to be a fine captain," says Coach Curt Tong. Joining Wolk on the front line will be rugged 6-4 junior Matt Spangler (8.3 rpg), who is heading into his third varsity season, and 6-5 senior Tom Balderston. Balderston (53.4 fg pct.) performed well in a sixth man role last season. Juniors Jim Dertt and Jeff Brinker, and sophomore Bill Lohrer are expected to be valuable additions to the front line corps.

The backcourt returns intact from last season. Junior Gerry Kelly, a two year starter, was Williams' second highest scorer (13.2 ppg) and was named to the third Division III all star team. Kelly's hustle and defensive ability were key factors in many of last year's victories. Joining Kelly will be sophomore Andy Straka, a good ball handler and effective long range shooter. Straka averaged 10.5 points a game last season. Varsity football quarterback Bill Whelan will fill in as backup to these two. Junior Jeff Hammond and sophomore Joe Flaherty, round out the backcourt troops.

"I'm quietly optimistic about the coming season," says Coach Tong. "We have an experienced team and more depth than last season. If we can stay healthy, it could be a satisfying year."

The Ephs have four games before Christmas break. After the Hamilton game, an equally tough Tufts team comes into Williamstown for a Saturday night game. The following Tuesday Williams travels to Northfield, Vermont to play Norwich and finish the pre-yuletide campaign at home against Connecticut College two days later, the first day of reading period.

Volleyball excells: 16-3

The women's volleyball team closed out its season on November 12 in Salem with a third place finish in the Massachusetts Association of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women (MAIAW) volleyball tournament. The team's overall placing matched its seeding of third in division II of the tournament and the women emerged from the weekend of play with an impressive 16-3 season record.

Playing exceptionally well, Williams won in the first round of the tournament, beating the University of Lowell 15-3, 15-11. In the second round, however, the team could not overcome the strong home court advantage of its opponent, Salem State. As a result, Williams' strong points such as serving and spiking suffered. The team put up a good fight but lost 15-1, 16-14.

Williams entered another major tournament, the Massachusetts Quadrangle, earlier in the season and beat its three opponents to capture the title. The Ephs topped the Univ. of Bridgeport 15-7, 15-3, the Univ. of Maine, Orono 15-11, 15-12, 17-15, and the Univ. of Massachusetts 15-10, 15-3, 15-7.

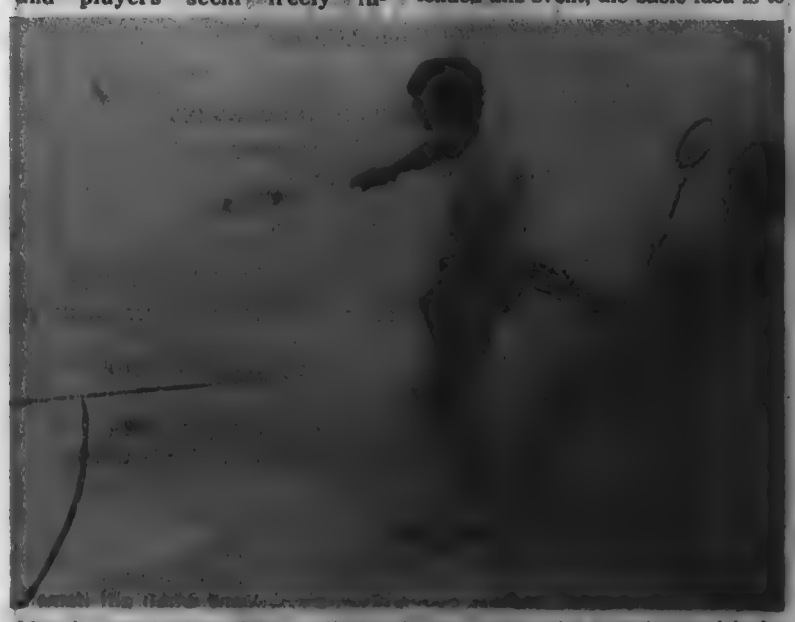
The junior varsity members did not pick up a major tournament win but did end their season on a high note as they easily defeated the varsity squad of North Adams State, 15-7, 15-11, 15-6.

Williams women's volleyball capped an outstanding 16-3 season with a third place finish at the Division II Mass. Assoc. of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women, defeating U. of Lowell before succumbing to Salem State. (photo by Johnson)

Squash squad aspires to Nationals

by Evan Bash

"One of the best kept secrets on campus" is coach Sean Sloane's description of the notoriety the men's squash team's rise to national eminence received last year, when the squad capped a 10-4 season with a fourth place national ranking. Now, with this secret laid open before us, the racketmen have no intention of slipping back into obscurity, as this year's team may very well be better than last year's. A good indication as to just how well the Ephs will do this season may come Friday in their season opener against always tough Navy (Noon starting time at home).



"We have a very strong team," says Sloane, "one capable of defending, if not bettering, our position in the country." The hopes for Williams' success lie in the strength the squad seems to have in each position on the ladder, prompting Sloane to remark, "Overall, this is the best team we've had since I've been here in terms of skill and attitude."

Leading the Purple this winter is captain and No. 1 Arnie Cogswell, who had one of the team's better seasons last year. Clip Lindquist and Martin Goldberg both return from exceptional performances in their first year and figure to do well again at Nos. 2 and 3.

As an indication of the team's depth, the remainder of the varsity positions and players seem freely interchangeable. Senior Peter Thayer may very well lead this lower grouping, but he will be hard pressed all season. Mitch Reiss and Jon Saunders, both juniors, are rapidly improving and big things are expected of them, while seniors Jim Parsons and Jim Little have the experience and shots needed to win. Peter Thomsen and Evan Bash round out this group who should see plenty of action.

Friday's high noon showdown with Navy promises to be an exciting match, for the Middies have eight starters back from last year's squad that well remembers a 6-3 beating dished out by the Ephs. Navy plays a retrieving type game, attempting to wear down their opponents. Williams has worked hard all preseason and the racketmen feel they will prevail in a close match.

All the matches (except Nos. 1 and 3) will begin at 12:00 in the Laselle courts. So grab a quick lunch and come down and enjoy what should be some great squash.

After its fourth place finish at Nationals last spring, the squash squad looks toward Navy as its first conquest on the path towards another national ranking.

Despite verbal handicap frosh Sardo wins keg

by David Sorkin

Recent reports that many freshmen are now entering Williams with insufficient speaking skills were put on the line Thursday, November 17, at the Adelphic Union's Freshman Speaking Contest.

From the same podium that William Jennings Bryan edged Henny Youngman in the famous Class of '61 contest, silver voiced orators of the Class of 1981 vied for the renowned "Stanley Keg" of traditional refreshments. For those who have been fortunate enough never to have attended this event, the basic idea is to deliver a four minute impromptu speech, while fending off the abuse of hecklers, some of whom have been specially imported from the Wrigley Field bleachers for their skills in vituperation.

Many of the favored speakers cracked under this intense pressure, and coming out of the pack to take the title was a virtual unknown, Michael Sardo. Sardo, of Sage E, was born in the Bronx but overcame this handicap, teaching himself English by candlelight. "While the other kids were out playing stickball and stealing hubcaps," Sardo reminisced, "I was memorizing Hamlet and Masters and Johnson. I'm just glad it all paid off." Showing remarkable poise, Sardo called into question the worth of one of his detractor's conceptions, and delivered a moving speech about his most embarrassing moment.

A close runner-up was Lehman's Arun Swamy. Swamy, whose topic was the desirability of a dress code, faltered near the end and resorted to the usually successful rhetorical device of expounding in his native Indian. (Nehru used this technique often and to great effect while at Cambridge.) The judges, however, were unswayed, and even an attempt to eat the question paper could not put the speech back on track.

For reasons of space and tact, none of the other speeches will be considered here. Those who want to see this unique spectacle will have to "wait 'till next year" when the Churchills of the Class of 1982 will be exhibited.

VOL. 91, NO. 22 WILLIAMS COLLEGE DECEMBER 2, 1977

CC petitions administration

by Tim Jones

The College Council voted Wednesday evening to endorse two resolutions stating its opposition to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. In addition, the Council voted to approve revised Finance Committee budgets for the Rugby team, the Record, and WCFM.

The first of the two anti-discrimination resolutions, both introduced by Ted Stroll '78, solicits from the faculty, Trustees, and Administration, in particular, a statement "condemning the practice of sexism, racism, and homophobia." The second resolution calls upon the Trustees to modify the "official non-discrimination policy" of the College, thereby prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation via educational policies.

Stroll stated that the "Dean's Office will only support political organizations on campus (like the WGSO) in private. We must try to make the Administration take a public stand in support of them." He emphasized that it is important for the Administration not only to state that it opposes these forms of discrimination but that it also "does not believe in them."

Those in opposition to the resolutions expressed the fear that they represent a form of restriction upon free expression of ideas and opinions. Jeff Trout '80 maintained that these resolutions are "saying that certain ideas, not actions, will not be tolerated on this campus. We cannot afford to take a position whereby we will be intolerant for the purpose of supposedly promoting tolerance."

Don Toumey '78 elaborated: "We seem to want to create a climate here that will not tolerate criticism of the organizations in question." Toumey also challenged the resolution's attribution of sexual orientation discrimination to ignorance. "It is not a question of ignorance, but of values. Knowledge does not matter."

Lisa Capaldini '78, one of nearly fifty spectators attending the meeting, claimed that the resolutions ultimately stand for "human dignity and respect of human values—this includes not discriminating against those who are gay or Black."

The Council voted to remove one part of the first resolution, which stated that the Council deplored "the unwillingness of the college Administration to contribute adequately to the fight against sexism." College Council President Tom Herwitz urged that the Council strike the statement, claiming that the Administration had done much toward ameliorating the problem. "They may not be performing in the way you'd like but they are handling it in the way they deem best in the long run," he added.

Julia Ayala of the Black Student Union and Harry Kelly '78 both criticized the resolutions' failure to name specific areas where redress is necessary. Kelly pointed out that the "letters in the Record have already put the College on record as being against these forms of discrimination. The Student Life Committee should draw up specific recommendations."

In response to a proposal that these resolutions be presented to the student body in a referendum, Stroll charged that the Council was "shirking its responsibility as a legislative body to take a stand." In defense of his second resolution, he noted that Harvard, UCLA, and other educational in-

RESOLUTION I

Recognizing that a statement is not an answer to problems, the Council uses this resolution as a starting point to demonstrate its concern over the problem of inter-group relationships present at Williams. The Council hereby states its intention to involve itself in the ongoing process of introducing concrete proposals for the solution of these problems.

The students of Williams College,

1. CONDEMNING the recent unfortunate and demeaning sexist incident in the College Library;
2. REALIZING that this and other incidents, which may have been acceptable in times past, no longer are so;
3. RECOGNIZING that such incidents and the attitude behind them debase the entire College community and tend to bring the College into disrepute from within and without;
4. BELIEVING that sexism and other forms of prejudice are deeply rooted problems whose solution can only be brought about through the united efforts of students, faculty and the administration; and

Through their representatives on the College Council,

5. AFFIRM their support for College organizations, including but not limited to Williams Women, the Williams Black Student Union, the Williams Gay Support Organization and others, in their attempt to conquer ignorance and prejudice which is damaging to the College and the College community; and
6. CALL UPON the Administration, Faculty & Trustees to assume their proper responsibilities to the College community, (a) by issuing a statement condemning the practice of sexism, racism and homophobia and other forms of prejudice which are injurious to and tend to lessen the dignity of persons or groups at Williams College; and (b) by issuing a statement in support of the efforts of those organizations named in (5) above whose aim it is to eradicate prejudice through the education of the Williams community.
7. Upon adoption, one copy of this resolution shall be delivered to each responsible officer in the administration of the College, a second to the Faculty for announcement at its next regular meeting, and a third to the Trustees of Williams College.

RESOLUTION II

The students of Williams College,

BELIEVING that no person at Williams College should be discriminated against by reason of his sexual orientation,

Through their representatives on the College Council,

URGE the Trustees of Williams College to modify the official non-discrimination statement of the College; now, therefore, be it

RESOLVED, that the Council request that the official non-discrimination policy of Williams College be modified as follows:

Williams College does not discriminate on the basis of sex, race, creed, color, handicap, national origin or sexual orientation in admission of students, educational policies, scholarships and loans, housing, athletics, employment and other activities; however, the College makes such distinctions on the basis of sex in admissions as are consistent with its educational policy and with applicable government legislation.

'Bought' papers found unthreatening

by Peter Rintels and Susan Matthews

In the early 1970's, higher education faced a serious challenge from commercial term paper companies. Students were, and in many places still are, purchasing prewritten term papers at a cost of $2 to $6 a page to submit for courses.

In 1972, founders of term paper companies claimed that the demand for their product far outstripped the supply and that they were only waiting for more writers so they could increase their business.

Today the industry is winding down, partly because many states have legislated them out of business, and partly for reasons that the still existing companies do not understand.

But the problem of commercially bought term papers, even at its peak, never caused serious concern at Williams. Many professors and administrators said they had not even thought about it until contacted by the Record.

Professor Anson C. Piper, faculty chairman of the Honor Committee, said that in his 40 years with the College as both teacher and student "This never seems to have surfaced. It's not something the faculty has been talking about."

Professor Henry Bruton, Chairman of the Economics Department, said that he has seen "not a hint" that commercially prepared papers had been turned in to his department—a typical faculty response to Record inquiries.

Most persons questioned admitted to the possibility that suct activity was going on, and some even considered it likely. "Probably somewhere out of these 1900 students there may be one or two who are doing this (submitting bought term papers)," said Piper. No documented cases, however, have ever been brought before either the Deans or the Honor Committee.

Why not? One reason cited by many faculty is that Williams students are basically honest people with a firm commitment to their own education. Said Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, "I have been impressed with the honesty of the student body here in comparison with other places I've taught." Piper also voiced this view. "I have a gut feeling that we are fortunate in having students who are not only good as students but who are good people. They come from responsible backgrounds and they are serious about getting an education."

Several professors at Williams suggested another deterrent which might keep students from ordering commercial term papers. In many courses, the paper topics are too specific to be found in a catalog of prepared term papers.

Dean of the College Peter Berek cited still more reasons for the absence of bought term paper activity. One was the size of Williams. "Small schools have an inherent advantage," he said. At big universities, the Dean said, papers may be read by TA's or grad students, whereas here a student is more likely to know a professor personally. Changes in style are more likely to be noticed, he pointed out, and close student-faculty relations diminish the temptation to cheat.

Berek also mentioned the College's "luck" in being located in a small town. There is not "sub-culture here

Grad arrested as art thief

Ronald Valerin '77 was arrested on November 21 for allegedly stealing works of art from several museums. Police found sixty-one works in his home, including objects from the Dayton Art Institute, the Cincinnati Art Museum and the College Museum.

The Williams pieces were small objects totalling less than $10,000 in value, including an ancient Roman ring, a photograph by Lewis Hine, a poster by R. B. Kitaj and a Schwitters collage and painting Frank W. Robinson, College Museum Director said that all the art works have been recovered in good condition.

Valerin worked as a museum guard during his senior year and continued into the summer, until Saturday July 2. Valerin expressed unhappiness with the job, so he and Robinson agreed that he would not continue work after the second. On Sunday Robinson discovered several objects missing and tried to reach Valerin, who had left earlier in the day.

Although he notified the Williamstown Police within the day, Robinson did not contact the Ohio police or FBI because he was "in the process" of recovering the art through mutual friends of Valerin's.

Questioned on museum security, Robinson emphasized that "We're not an easy mark," adding that "Our only problem is, how to guard the guards."

Valerin has entered a plea of not guilty. He graduated from Williams as an English major, cum laude in 1977.

Gay Task Force's co-head discusses progress, movement's antagonists

by Xanthe Berry

In a consciousness raising meeting, co-director of the National Gay Task Force (NGTF), Bruce Voeller discussed some of the injustices he claimed were forced upon the homosexual portion of society by the media and government.

The audience, composed of students, faculty members, Berkshire Community Gay Coalition members and other interested individuals was attentive to Voeller. The talk began on a relatively positive note with Voeller noting that, "All movements take a long time. You can only move so far so fast." In his opinion, the change from gays and their rights being a taboo subject on all levels, especially the media, to being the controversial topic it is today in only six or seven years is commendable.

According to Voeller one of NGTF's main undertakings is to eradicate the myths surrounding the homosexual person. The most apparent and devastating myth is that homosexuality is a disease. Until December 1973 the American Psychological Association termed the life style as such. The United States Public Health Service still does. A group of people categorized as sick faces such problems as being expelled from the armed forces, being barred from immigrating to this country, and being legally discriminated against in the job and housing markets. Voeller related that Army priests are required to break the confidentiality of a confession when gayness is mentioned.

Experiments comparing non-clinical homosexuals to non-clinical homosexuals have been conducted in order to dispel the belief that gays are different from straights. As the Gay society suspected, no internal differences were found. The existence of external differences, such as the stereo-typical lisp and limp wrist is also contrived. Voeller quoted the statistic that the chances are twenty to one that the effeminate man is not homosexual. Further emphasizing the fact that homosexuals do not look or act any differently except in their preference for same sex lovers, Voeller repeatedly stated that, "Ten per cent of the population is gay. Ten per cent of the people in this room are gay. Ten per cent of the faculty at Williams is gay." He added proudly, "We are the only minority that is present in every walk of life."

Teaching the art of critical analysis

To the editor:
An Open Letter to the Williams Community:

We might all agree that one of Williams' primary functions as an institution of development is to teach its students to critically analyze a situation and come to a "proper" conclusion. The importance of this can not be underestimated for our lives are merely a long series of different situations from which we make decisions.

Yet the ability to evaluate and criticize assumes a much higher level of understanding when one moves from theory to people. I feel that often a product of the educated mind is to see people and ideas as one and the same, ie., as objects. How easy it is for the Williams environment to breed this mentality; of seeing others as an object, to class them as a "grind" or a "preppy" or a "football player" or a "potsmoker." The only thing in life that is important is not what people do but how they treat others in the process of doing it. The most intelligent person in the world who treats another person as his inferior is a worm.

Williams graduates do and always will hold positions where they, to a certain extent, control the lives of others. Yet any worldly success, i.e. the accumulation of the Almighty Dollar, that does not at the same time bring people together will only bring each of us one step closer toward destruction.

The N.Y. Yankees are Baseball World Champions. Yet as a team they are despicable. The monetary gain by those associated with the team in no way can justify or repair the damages to the hearts and souls of many of the players. Any championship won when the people involved can not stand the sight of one another is not worth the ink that is used to write the following day's headlines.

To be educated is useless. To use one's education to bring those around us to a deeper understanding and appreciation of one another is to discover one's true worth.

Sincerely,
Tom Reddes

Male reaction to women's liberation

To the editor:

People have thrown around a lot of angry statements in the past few weeks about sexism on campus. Many women reacted with shock and anger when members of my freshman entry created a spectacle in the reserve room. I can understand why the women were upset, but I would like to attempt an explanation of "sexism."

We, and I mean men, are born into a society that pushes us ahead. We all, to some degree, were a smashing success in high school. Looked up to and admired, we considered women to be equal, but it was an equality that we, for the most part, granted to them. Society still expects women to serve men, to be our tools, helpers and satisfiers of lust. So off we go to Williams where few women fit the "cheerleader" concept. Women here are strong-willed, success-oriented and not willing to be somebody's tool. So how do we react? With fear, anger and longing. We are afraid of these "emasculating" women, angry that they don't bend to our wills and yet still long for a caress. Quite frankly, many of us are confused. And for many men there exist deep sexual emotions which they cannot face. We don't know how to deal with women. What the hell do they want? Why aren't they more friendly? Why are they so up-tight?

Sexism does not stem from wickedness. It comes from the clash of historical and societal concepts of women with the reality of the modern woman. The modern man is adrift. He doesn't know how to reconcile the reality of the liberated woman with his own fears and upbringing. Oppression does not just affect the oppressed. The "oppressor" also pays a price in fear and pain. This pain is real and calls for sensitivity and understanding, rather than recriminations and anger.

Alum views tradition of bawdiness

To the editor:

I thought I had heard it all. As a member of the first freshman class of women at Williams, I graduated with a negligible amount of naivete. Ask any alumnus about the all male Carter House of 1972—shooting moons to any available "coed" at parties, Sunday afternoon of Carnival week-end spent turning their snow sculpture yellow by whizzing on it, a spring bachelor party whose details are unprintable. Ask a senior if he remembers the Rope-A-Dope party of 1975 that kept ¾ of the Greylock quad up all night. By that spring I was so immune that I fell right to sleep as they carried on just outside my window. I even missed the famous 20 minute soliloquy on oral sex.

Bawdiness will always remain an active part of Williams College life. I know the tradition. My uncle and father are alumni as are my husband, Harry, and his father. Harry and his friends were no angels, but they had this expression I'll never forget—"There's always somebody who takes it one step too far." Creative humor is a sign of superior intelligence, a quality all Williams people think they possess. But, creative genius can become perverted under the influence of the group and alcohol.

The November 11th issue of the Record printed three letters regarding the nude doll and drunk sophomores in the reserve room affair. I never wrote a letter to the Record as a student, but 3,000 miles and 2½ years away from Williams, I find the paper one of the few links with the college. Maybe I should not have waited so long. It seems the more certain behavior is tolerated the more the limits are tested. You have four short years at Williams, the decades beyond are only memories told in stories to new friends, and someday, children. If these sophomores keep it up, their "stories" will need so much censoring that their experiences will appear as meaningless to their future listeners as they do to me now.

Sincerely,
Connie Durrell Sheehy '75

Recent revelation

To the editor:

We the undersigned members of the east entry of Prospect House would like to extend hearty thanks to all those who have contributed to our very recent revelation. Throughout our extended stay at Williams we have simply assumed that we were, for the most part, healthy and well adjusted college students. However, we were startled to discover from the reams and reams of material presently available on the subject, that we are afflicted with a chronic disorder.

The symptoms of this ailment are many and quite diverse. They include drinking large quantities of Schlitz on weekends, laughing at dirty jokes, looking at beautiful women, listening to loud soul music and participating in an occasional "fraternity-type prank." The reason why these symptoms went so long without being detected is that all along we didn't mind laughing at ourselves a little. We only hope that this letter will be printed so that others like ourselves will realize their plight. Thank you all once again.

Sexism clarified

To the editor:

I am dismayed by people's perceptions of "sexism" of late. Since no one can agree on its definition I will not try to offer mine, but it seems to me that that one ugly word, "Sexism!" has been used too loosely.

When a well-qualified woman walks into my office looking for an executive position and I put her in the typing pool, I am guilty of sexual discrimination, and this is undeniably wrong.

When I go on a road trip and look at a pretty blonde and think, "Boy, look at that dumb blonde", I am guilty of stereotyping. This too is undeniably wrong.

When I open my copy of the Record and admire the Dean of Beers, or when I whistle at a pretty girl, I am guilty of neither of the above. My reaction is natural, a result not of societal influences but of my God-given hormones. I am not being sexist, I am enjoying my sexuality. I am not relegating Gloria or any other woman to secondary status. I am a liberated man, and my fellow liberated men and I can both treat women as people and appreciate the differences between the sexes.

A liberated businessman can "think evil thoughts" about an attractive woman, but five minutes later deal with that same woman as an equal at the board meeting. A liberated rugby player can join in a hearty chorus of "Four and Twenty Virgins" at a rugby party, but in the chem lab he has no trouble dealing with his female lab partner. There is no contradiction; a liberated man can have his cake and eat it too.

Sexuality is not a necessary partner with discrimination and stereotyping. I see nothing wrong with thinking, talking, or laughting about it (with proper considerations of time and place). The attempt by some to have us liberated men ignore the female anatomy is doomed to failure; it is a perverse endeavor.

Vive la difference!

Student action

To the editor:

Some major criticism has been directed at the faculty and administration in the recent sexism discussion at Baxter Hall and in Scott Hoot's letter to the editor (Nov. 29, 1977). Criticism focuses on the administration's lack of leadership in the college community. It also addresses the supposed unwillingness of many professors and administrators to take a public and personal stance on controversial issues which concern Williams College.

What this indicates is that students fear taking affirmative action on their own behalf. For if one is unable to respond to certain situations himself, he must rely on guidance from others. The recent sexism and human rights discussion demonstrated that Williams students do evaluate and make judgments on crucial topics. Yet few will attempt to act upon their independent judgments within the Williams environment. As one individual observed, "this has been one of the greatest educational experiences that I've had here. What scares the hell out of me is my feeling that come tomorrow, nothing will be done."

Many students claim that through our actions we have no power to influence the administration, faculty, or college environment in general. They point out the political weakness of the College Council. Yet this political weakness is the fault of the student body. Ideally, the College Council should express and act upon the desires of the student body. Unfortunately, the Council hardly receives the student support it needs to function as a means to student power. Our lack of control in the running of this college is the necessary result of our own political apathy.

If Williams students are to rationalize and keep a "layed back" perspective on all controversial issues, or if we simply remain inactive against attitudes and college policies which may adversely effect us, then the primary persons responsible for the continuation of these undesirable attitudes and policies are students.

Women supported

To the editor:

To the women at Williams, and especially to letter writers, Judy Nitchie, Valerie A. Anderson, Deb Martindale, and Lesley Wang. I want you to know that beyond your small community at Williams there is a very large one of women everywhere which wholeheartedly supports you.

Hurray for your unequivocal rejection of acts which degrade women! Keep your courage and sensitivity and don't be discouraged by those like Marcel Oudin who will try to further put you down by last gasp cliches. Be heartened that your objections are not radical when seen in larger perspective, they are the timely, sensitive, reasonable objections of any feeling person who stands for equality and openness between the sexes.

Free exchange of ideas

by Chip Buckner '79

As I filled out the Mead Internship Application (doubtlessly a futile exercise) one seemingly innocuous question struck me in a peculiar way. I was to list "two faculty members who know something of (my) qualifications . . ." Simple, but for me it posed special problems.

I regard human beings as fallible creatures, and observe that those who govern us have gone out of their way to prove their humanity. For that reason I advocate a small government so that individual people may make their own decisions, rather than have a strong government where a Congress or a majority imposes its mistakes upon everyone. This, coupled with a belief that an efficient system which produces more for everyone, is superior to an equity-based system which through incentive loss produces less for everyone—identical portions, but less, labels me as "a conservative" or "classical liberal" if you will. I once asked a political science professor where I could find a conservative faculty member to talk with. He referred me to the Physical Education office. Although I harbor great respect for our coaching staff, their recommendation would mean very little on an application for a Government Internship. This reflection led me to the very important question, with whom could I discuss what I believe?

Last year I tried to answer that question through the Political Science Department. I asked the department chairman about what I perceived to be a problem. He asked me first if I wanted a quota of conservative professors (trying, I suspect, to argue that a quota would force the school to hire incompetents,) but as I detest quotas, goals, targets or any such nonsense regarding race, sex, ideology or anything else, I demurred, eluding the trap. After I tried the old "I feel an educational need" argument, he told me that this was not a problem, but that if it were, there was no solution, because he knew of no qualified conservatives who had applied here. (I was tempted to observe that if by "qualified" you mean "liberal" then of course no "conservative" will qualify.) At a later date the good professor explained that he knew of none not because they did not exist but rather that the application process did not reveal ideological preferences.

Undaunted, I tried again. On election night at Professor J. M. Burns' home I watched the returns with my Political Science 215 class and several members of the Political Science Department. Ford supporters being a definite minority, when the former President carried a state, I was one of very few who cheered. My Political Science 101 professor, (not Burns) apparently annoyed by the dissent asked me why I supported President Ford. When I told him, he informed me that my beliefs were the result of childish insecurity and that I was a fool.

Is this enlightened academic the man to speak with when I seek guidance? Clearly the Political Science Department is no place for a conservative.

Anti-conservatives are not, however, limited to the teachers. Once at a cocktail party, a dean told me that he had heard "disturbing things" about me. Was I, he queried, really as conservative as everyone said? Admitting that, yes, I probably was, he proceeded to argue, albeit in jest, that since people tend to become more liberal as they progress through college, there is a relation between liberal-intelligent and conservative-ignorant. He laughed. Since I hoped he wasn't serious, I laughed, too. Ha ha.

I realize that this has come a long way from my original problem, (who do I put on the blank,) but it strikes me as a very grave concern. In my case there are certain people with whom I just don't talk politics. (I have no intention, for instance, of ever taking another political science course.) It's a shame, because I enjoy politics and could benefit greatly from talking with these people, but it's just not worth it.

So much for the "free exchange of ideas" goal of a liberal arts education.

Something rotten in Williamstown

by Donald L. Perry II '79

I am not normally given to writing letters to editors or extensive viewpoints for publication; and many of my friends will attest that I hold some very strong beliefs that could be called enlightened conservatism. I am also not given to frequent outbursts or venting my spleen in public. But today I feel that I must break from that mold and express what I perceive to be major threats to the social fabric of Williams College.

There are two incidents which have occurred this year which seem to point towards drastic alterations in the perception of what college life should be on this campus on the part of the Administration and a few vocal student groups. I am sure that many people are aware of these incidents, but let me briefly mention them here. First, just recently a group of women staged a sit-in at the offices of the Williams Record, demonstrating against sexism in a beer ad that many men looked fondly upon. The result is that the Record, bowing under pressure, took the ad out and agreed to have an open meeting to discuss Record editorial policy. The second incident is still unfolding. In this case a group of intoxicated young men sang a re-written version of Yard-By-Yard on the steps of the reserve room accompanied by a life-size doll. Rather than perceive the stunt for what it was—an irrational act committed by a bunch of irrational, drunken men, that looked pretty funny to some observers and probably relieved the tensions of more than a few people who learned to laugh again as a result of their stunt—these men have been called to the Deans' Office and are facing an uncertain future.

To me, these incidents and the responses to them point towards an indentity-crisis for the College, a fundamental insecurity in the personal identities of a number of individuals on this campus, and a general inability or unwillingness to laugh at ourselves. In other words, it would seem that either Williams has lost its collective sanity or else it has forgotten what it means to have a sense of proportionality. Neither speaks well of our micro-coam of society.

The Identity-Crisis of Williams College

The incidents speak well of the fact that what to many students may seem part of the ordinary, everyday goings—On at Williams are not seen as such by the administration. Their views of "good old Williams" are affected by their isolation from the students that go to their college and the social lifes that they lead, and by the rosey tint that time has placed on their recollections of their college lives many many years past. To them, Williams is a place of very serious students constantly working to uncover the truths of their generation from that of past generations. In the course of these endeavors, Williams students are ever rational, ever reasonable, ever questioning. They are mature young men and women, adults waiting to take their places of leadership in this society. This is what Williams is about, it says so in the catalog, and therefore it must be true.

The fact is that the real Williams is made up of serious students; serious in the sense of not wanting to waste the educational opportunities made available to them here. The students are by and large quite mature for they are also at an age when rebelling against getting older is a real occurrence and fear of impending adult responsibilities is great. The students here are not always rational, reasoning, and ever questioning. They get drunk with enough frequency and the best times they can recall are usually when they have been drunk; they are sometimes obscene in public and often in private; they are given at times to emotional outbursts befitting a twelve year old; they are natural-born pranksters and border on childishness from time to time; and sometimes they do things that embarrass them and make them wish they had never gotten up that morning. In other words, the students here are very, very human, and for that I thank God.

The views that predominate in Hopkins Hall about life at Williams are not the facts that daily show up in class drunk, high, or not at all. There is a wide gulf between the Williams Myth and the Williams Reality, and the over-reactions expressed by the administration in the two cases mentioned are quite revealing. If allowed to go uncorrected, their misperceptions about Williams will lead these administrators to make life here stiff and unbearable. They will create an atmosphere here that will make the pranks we pull, the drunken escapades we have, the old food riots, the water fights, the goal-post stunts on Amherst Weekend unacceptable in terms of their perceptions. They will make this campus tense, serious without remorse, and barren of the spirit that IS Williams today. This will certainly be a cold slap in the face for many of us and totally change the whole tenor of the "Williams Experience".

The Personal Identity - Crisis of Williams Students

All the incidents speak well to the identity crisis that many students are experiencing at this point in their lives. I am told that because of the prank pulled upon him a student here actually felt that his life was in danger! It would appear that a number of women are still struggling to define who they are and what they are, and their angst has caused them to feel put-up-on and beaten down by sexist males. They bandy about the words "sexism" and "sexist" with as much frequency as some blacks, also suffering from an identity crisis, bandied about the words "racism" and "racist" earlier this year. It would also seem that these same women are so insecure in their womanhood that they felt incensed at an inflatable doll being held aloft by a group of Rugby-rejects, singing a song that expresses their own insecurities about their manhood.

If people were truly knowledgeable about who they were, what they were about, and what they wanted from life, then they would probably not feel so paranoid and outraged by events whose motivations are neither the cause of foment, paranoia and outrage. They would never feel threatened by rugby songs, pranksters, and women with 40 D-cup breasts. The fact that their mental houses are in such disarray causes us all such grief. I am not about to offer a prescription for these problems, but if the diagnosis is correct, the solution seems clear—KNOW THY SELF. When we can honestly say that we do know ourselves, then perhaps we can all live less tortured lives, and maybe we can be more understanding and accommodating of those times when we seem to loose our heads a little and do some really dumb things.

The Loss of our Ability to Laugh at Ourselves

The last incident is the real clincher. It shows that as a group, we Williams students can no longer take humor in such a farcical scene as a group of guys, drunk off their rears, stumbling around on the steps of the reserve room with a life size doll and singing a ribald song. I've seen people read the uncensored version of the Canterbury Tales blush and then laugh at some of the passages, but should they condemn Chaucer? Of course not! We take the Tales in the light in which they were offered—as funny and bawdy vignettes of life in 16th century England. What the library incident shows us is that we have all learned our Psychology 101 and English 101 only too well—looking for the hidden meanings behind things when perhaps none was actually intended. Like people trained to find evil wherever it lays, we find exactly what we are looking for. When we look for evidences of sexism on campus, we will interpret everything in the light of what it is we seek, and we shall find sexism.

I'm not sure what makes a rugby song so funny, but I admit I find many of the lyrics amusing and the tunes catchy. I'll also admit there is a time and a place for them and that the reserve room is not the place. And if the stunt had been done by a bunch of rational, sober deviants well then perhaps I might be a little upset. But I have learned never to take a drunken man seriously and never to expect cogent rational behavior from him. Thus I tend to be less judgemental of what these guys did and to excuse it for they knew not what they were doing. They meant no harm by what they did, and I'm sure that everyone of them feels not just a little embarrassed by what took place. I'm equally sure that none of them is the type to go around doing this kind of thing with any frequency. So why all the heat and righteous indignation? Why call in the Deans? You'd think that these guys had yelled fire in a crowded room.

If this kind of attitude attends to all such stunts, then I really do fear for this college and its students. The reactions should be consistent with the spirit of the acts committed. But tacking someone to the wall over an inflatable doll:, GOD we are a hopeless lot! We should laugh more and do more things that will make us laugh. If this is what being serious entails, then by-jove I hope never to be that serious!

So there. I've done it at last, I've said what I believe to my partial satisfaction. Essentially what I see around me these days is a campus which has lost sight of its real nature, of its basic decency, and of its sense of proportion. I see those who would try to make their morality our morality. I see insecure people overcompensating for that insecurity. And I see blind men leading this campus down a blind alley to a dead end. And because of these visions, I am afraid for this place and for those who must come after us.

Voeller aims for gay myth erasure

The ten per cent figure was derived from the Kinsey study which found that 13 per cent of the men and seven per cent of the women asked, admitted to having gay tendencies.

The false homosexual image projected through television and movies is of great concern to NGTF, because of the number of people it affects. Until about three years ago the few gays present in movies either went crazy, committed suicide or died in unlikely accidents. This is no longer true. Voeller specifically commended Norman Lear for his tactful portrayal of a homosexual couple on "Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman." Going into great detail, Voeller explained what NGTF did to prevent the airing of a television program deemed offensive by the gay community. After first appealing to the network, the gay organization wrote the companies scheduled to advertise during the program. All the first string advertisers withdrew their support, as did the second string advertisers and nearly two thirds of the last choice back-up advertisers.

Big businesses have recently begun to show support for the gay rights movement by including statements to that effect in their company policy statement.

At present NGTF is in the process of meeting with each government department.

A common complaint expressed by opponents of gay rights is that homosexuals may attack the children in their neighborhoods. This, Voeller pointed out, was statistically false. Eleven out of every twelve sex crimes committed against children occur between heterosexual men and little girls.

During the question and answer period that followed the lecture one woman mentioned the frustration she felt when trying to discuss gay rights with the Williams administration and students alike. People demanded specific examples of discriminatory incidents which she could not produce, but still she felt discrimination, if only in an overall attitude, exists. Voeller suggested that the next time some one tells her that the Williams community is receptive to gays she should ask them to wear a gay support button on campus for a day. It is his prediction that they won't, and his hope that they will realize the reason they won't is the uncomfortable feeling that homosexuals live with every day.

Jazz review

Criner's 'Magic' packs house

by Dave Frank & Peter Gloo

Those present in the basement of Baxter on Saturday, November 19, were treated to the finest small-combo jazz Williams has seen in a long time. Clyde Criner '75 and 'Miller Magic' played two long sets to a packed house. In general, "the band blew the roof off."

'Miller Magic', composed of Clyde Criner on keyboards, Hal Miller on drums, Brubby Taylor on percussion, George Sessum on bass, and Gary Keller on tenor sax, opened up with two jazz-rock tunes and then brought on vocalist Shirley Hairston for the Ellington ballad "Solitude". Ms. Hairston delighted the crowd with her unique style, as she jumped fleetly over large intervals and Gary Keller's sax solo made it clear to the audience that they were in for an evening of serious jazz.

The second set opened with Sonny Rollins' bebop tune "St. Thomas." Keller, who has played with Lionel Hampton's band in N.Y.C., displayed incredible musicianship, playing the tune assisted only by Miller and Taylor's percussion background. Few Jazz musicians have the ability to play an improvised solo with harmonic accompaniment. Ms. Hairston returned to mellow out the crowd with an intensely mystical John Coltrane composition from the early '60's, "Naima". Then Criner, who has been at the New England Conservatory since he graduated from Williams, enraptured the standing-room-only crowd with two original compositions: "Smitty's House Party", inspired by his uncle's big feet, and the "Timbrook Stomp", dedicated to his grandmother in Albany.

Criner's gospel-jazz-funk style sets him apart from most of today's pianists. He plays the piano percussively and is thus able to invigorate his audience without background accompaniment. The interplay between Criner's gurgling electronic paraphernalia and George Sessum's fretless bass was truly magical. There was an uncanny wordless communion between the two musicians.

What was remarkable about the evening's performance was that there was something for everyone. Few bands have the versatility to play both jazz-rock and traditional standards.

The Rathskeller crowd gave 'Miller Magic' a standing ovation after they finished with Chic Corea's "500 Miles High." In our opinion, ACEC should take note—the Williams community witnessed some real magic in the Rathskeller Saturday night.

Radio drama Mon.

On Monday, December 5, at 8:30 p.m., WCFM will air a live performance of Samuel Beckett's radio drama "All That Fall," directed by Jon Stolzberg '79, and sponsored by Cap and Bells, Inc. The cast includes Cecilia Rubino '80, Robert Gregory '78, John Goodrich '80, Peter Wimberger '80, Byron Walker '80, Craig Elliot '79, Fran Civardi '81, and Susan Von Moschaisker '80.

Clark Art to honor Rubens

The great Flemish artist Peter Paul Rubens was born in 1577. To commemorate the 400th anniversary of his birth, the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute is scheduling for Friday and Saturday, December 2 and 3, a series of lectures, a film, and the opening of a small exhibition entitled "A Tribute to Rubens." The complete schedule follows:

Fr., Dec. 2, 8:00, Lecture: "Rubens and his Social Context" by Zirka Filipczak, Professor of Art.

Sat., Dec. 3, 3:30, Film: "Rubens at Liberty" (color, 1973, 30 min.)

Sat., Dec. 3, 4:30, Lecture: "Rubens' Approach to Ancient Themes" by Julius S. Held.

Sat., Dec. 3, 5:30, Reception for the exhibition, "A Tribute to Rubens".

The exhibition from the Institute's collection, with loans from the Williams College Museum of Art and a private collector, will feature several paintings, a number of drawings, prints after the master, and an example of Ruben's book design. "A Tribute to Rubens" will remain on view through February 19, 1978.

ACEC signs Jazz Quartet

The Gary Burton Quartet, one of the most respected groups in the jazz genre, will perform at Williams on January 9, according to ACEC Chairman Steve Case.

The Burton Quartet was formed in 1967, and was one of the first groups to combine sophisticated forms of rock music with the improvisational intricacies of jazz. Their popularity with audiences in both jazz clubs and concert halls, and their success on the charts both in Billboard and the polls in Downbeat testify to their wide appeal.

Gary Burton has revolutionized the technical and musical possibilities of the jazz; his four-mallet mastery of the instrument has literally set a new standard of performance for vibes.

The ACEC will stage two other concerts during Winter Study; one will be a rock show, and the other "a special event in the folk vein," according to Case. Both concerts will be announced soon.

Dance students to display work

Beth Popik and Mia Baird, the two students in the Independent Study Course, The Materials and Methods of Dance Composition, will present an informal showing of their course work on Friday, December 9 at 4:30 p.m. at the Williams Dance Studio.

Each student will present two solos which explore and solve given problems of composition. An additional group work-in-progress may be performed. One of the solos results from an exploration of the ABA form and uses an Allemande by G. F. Handel for musical collaboration. The other solo is an exploration of "chance" methods of composing and utilizes movement found in paintings, illustrations and photographs chosen in a variety of ways by the students. These "movements" are then structured according to a series of concepts and questions dealt with in the course.

Refreshments will be served.

The Record will run classifieds at 20c per line for the first 3 lines and 15c for each additional line. Deadlines are 4:00 p.m. Wednesdays and Sundays. Total amount due must accompany this form. Mail or bring in person to Classifieds, The Williams Record, Baxter Hall, Williamstown, Mass. 01267.

PLEASE NOTE: Each line on the grid indicates a line in print. Print ad in grid below EXACTLY as it is to read including spaces and punctuation. One letter overrun is allowed beyond a line on the grid. Any overrun beyond this should be counted as a full line in figuring cost.

Commercial term paper racket loses impetus like you find at Berkeley ... no floating population of people who have no formal connection with the College." Though Berek did not know it, one issue of a Berkeley college newspaper contained three ads for term paper companies; two of them were located in the Berkeley area, and the third was a mail order company based in Los Angeles.

The mail order company, Research Assistance, Inc., attempted to place an ad in the Record this September. Record editor-in-chief Scott Fenn rejected the ad. Fenn noted, "The ad was clearly an incitement to unethical acts and as such running it would have been out of keeping with the editorial policy of the Record". "We saw no reason to tempt people," Fenn said, adding that the Record had refused to print the same ad last year.

Many other Northeastern small colleges, however, did run the ad, including the Amherst Student, the Smith Sophian, and the Bates Student. David Mears, co-editor-in-chief of the Student, said his paper ran the ad because the editors felt that the advertising department should be independent of the editorial board. The Student cancelled the ad before running all of its installments, he said, because term paper companies have a history of not paying their bills for advertising. At Smith, a negative reaction from the college community caused the Sophian editors to cancel the ad after one installment.

A major blow was dealt to the Massachusetts term paper traffic in 1973, when the state responded to complaints from colleges in the Boston-Cambridge area by outlawing term paper companies. Research Assistance has successfully challenged a similar law in California on First Amendment grounds. Although the Massachusetts statute remains intact, term paper companies in the Boston-Cambridge area are still sporadically active. Two months ago Boston University filed a complaint with the Attorney General's office about a term paper company operating nearby.

Berek said that the College would come down hard on any student caught handing in a bought term paper. He or she "would not long be a student at Williams College," The Dean said.

Some colleges, however, take a more lenient view. Barbara Leander, Associate Dean of Boston University's College of Liberal Arts, said that students caught handing in bought papers as their own would receive an F for that particular course.

Students willing to accept the risks, however, would probably find commercially prepared papers a poor investment. The Record submitted papers written by Research Assistance, Inc. to Professor Michael Bell of the English Department and to Professor Mark Taylor of the Religion Department for evaluation.

The papers, which arrived by mail four days after a telephone order was placed, were photocopies of the original, and therefore would require re-typing by a student wishing to pass off the work as his own. Numerous typographical errors, as well as errors of spelling and basic grammar demanded correction. The papers cost three dollars a page and came with bibliographies and footnotes.

Bell read a paper comparing the themes found in Huckleberry Finn and Tom Sawyer, and Taylor graded one comparing St. Augustine's and Soren Kierkegaard's conception of God. According to the instructors, neither of the papers would receive a grade higher than a "C."

"This paper is awful," said Bell of the paper which was marred by lines such as "The river was a land of promise" and "Tom ... is a rather more surface character objectively, than Huck." The paper was "sloppy in punctuation and grotesquely abstract in terminology," Bell commented.

Taylor criticized the Augustine and Kierkegaard paper as having "no focus, no central organization and no consistently argued thesis. It is rare to get a paper this poor." He also said, "Ninety-nine per cent of the papers I get would be stronger than this one."

stitutions have added an anti-sexual orientation amendment to their bylaws. The Council voted 14-6 in favor of the first resolution. Its counterpart, directed to the Trustees, carried 18-3. The referendum proposal was rejected.

The Finance Committee resubmitted three budgets to the Council, all of which were approved. These new allocations included the enlargement of WCFM's budget by $510, making its total approved allocation $8860. The WCFM Capital Fund will receive the money remaining in the buffer fund at the end of the school year. At present the buffer fund contains approximately $4000. The Record will receive $15,100, this sum includes funds sufficient to cover the cost of the 1977 commencement issue but not this spring's commencement issue. The approved Rugby team budget for the year stands at $1986.

Hopkins Forest restricted to licensed hunters

Officials at the Center for Environmental Studies are reminding deer hunters that the Hopkins Memorial Forest in Williamstown will be closed to the public from Dec. 5 through Dec. 11, the deer hunting season. Access to the forest will be available only to the 100 persons who hold deer hunting permits issued by the Center.

Record prices staples

by Sally Midgley

Williams students who are unsatisfied with cafeteria food have a limited selection of grocery stores to patronize. Stores within easy walking distance often have high prices and a small selection of goods.

The Slippery Banana (Spring Street) and Tash's Groceries (Water Street) are the most conveniently located stores but carry only basic items in small packages, thus causing the price per unit to be somewhat higher than other stores in the area. Eddie's Market, located on Cole Avenue, is slightly further away, but stocks a more varied inventory of groceries and household items.

If you like to walk and don't have a long grocery list, it is worthwhile to go to the Grand Union, located approximately one mile away on Route 2. Prices are lower and the selection is one of the best in the immediate area. Cumberland Farms is right in front of the Grand Union. Its prices are often higher than those in the stores mentioned above, and the variety of goods is limited. Cumberland Farms, however, is open on Sundays and nightly until 10—convenient hours if you miss the 8 to 5 hours of the other stores.

To shop at Price Chopper it is best to have a car since it is located about five miles from the campus. Although the store lives up to its name, gas costs must also be taken into consideration. The biggest advantage of Price Chopper over other stores is that it is open 24 hours a day, so that late-night munchies can be purchased at any hour.

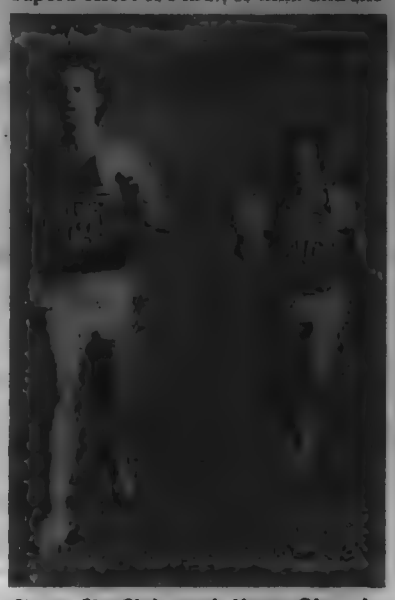
Five qualify for Boston Marathon

by Frank Carr

The Williams Road Runners Club (WRRC) broke into the fall marathon circuit in force Sunday, as seven members of the club competed in the Philadelphia Marathon. Five WRRC runners qualified for the prestigious Boston Marathon by cracking the three hour standard (three and one-half hours for women) and a trio of Ephs finished in the top 50 of the 300-runner field.

The three-loop 26.2 mile course started at a boathouse in back of the Philadelphia Art Museum and followed along the Schuylkill River. The surface was primarily concrete sidewalk but occasional patches of ice did provide some variety for the runners. Although the thermometer was hovering around 32 degrees, and consequently slowed the times, the Ephs were given inspiration by running past the "Rocky Balboa Staircase" on each loop.



Sophomore Bob Ericson, running in his first marathon, led the WRRC contingent with a 2:46.45 clocking for 20th place. Ericson has not run any intercollegiate races for Williams, but his training for crew and high school track experience propelled him to an excellent rookie performance at the "classic distance".

Rusty Anderson Track Star was the second Williams finisher as he ran his fastest 'thon ever at 2:49.30. Anderson completed the distance in 30th place, but felt the effects of the cold. "It was an agonizing race. I was tight the whole way."

The flat course was much to the liking of senior Hans Giesecke and he showed his appreciation with a fine 2:52 performance for 44th place. Fellow senior Dan Riley earned the right to join Giesecke (and a few thousand other runners) at the April 17 Boston Marathon by clocking a 2:55.38 on the Philly course.

"The wind and cold were a big factor", commented Riley, "the course was nice but if it was warmer I think I could have run sub-2:50." Riley can certainly expect to find a warmer climate at Boston as temperatures were in the 70's last year.

"It was fun . . . sort of," explained junior Trish Beckwith after her initial marathon attempt. "I was hoping to qualify for Boston (break 3:30), but I had no idea what I could do." Beckwith easily fulfilled her hopes with a superb effort of 3 hrs., 19 min. and she finished fourth in the women's division just 4 minutes behind the winner.

Steve St. Clair and Hans Giesecke (right) approach the finish of a five mile race in cross country action earlier this fall. On Sunday the pair moved up to 26 miles at the Philadelphia Marathon.

Garrick Leonard and Steve St. Clair challenged the 26 mile event for the first time but developed some technical difficulties along the way and were unable to finish. After the first few miles Leonard was leading the purple contingent but he encountered lower leg problems and dropped out after the first loop. Leonard has now set his sights on the John W. English Marathon which will be held in Middletown, Connecticut on March 5.

St. Clair was an invaluable pacing aid to Anderson throughout most of the race but was forced out of the race to take care of his blisters. St. Clair will get another chance at the "Conn Thon" to acquire an invitation to make the pilgrimage to the mecca of distance running—Hopkinton, Massachusetts.

Eph icers open with Little 3 meet

by Mark Pogue

The Williams varsity hockey team, hoping to rebound from a 9-13 showing in 1976-77, opens its 72nd season this weekend with games against Amherst and Wesleyan at Middletown, Connecticut. Wesleyan, the cold record shows, has never beaten the Ephs in 13 tries; Amherst is 2-18 over the last 11 years of play.

Veteran rink watchers confide that this year's Purple icers can score—and be scored upon. Coach Bill McCormick brings to the ice a load of offensive talent which will certainly better last year's average production of 3.8 goals a game, but the icers' defense remains a chilling question mark. Four of the Purple's six defensemen are untried freshmen, and "until these players get the acid test against outside competition," McCormick warns, "our defensive prospects are uncertain."

The good news begins with junior assistant captain Dan Sullivan, who is skating well again after missing last year with a knee injury. Sullivan, who led the team in scoring as a freshman, will center on Williams' first line for wings Chris Egizi ("he's a scorer," says McCormick) and Peter Gonye ("can really motor"). Egizi and Gonye combined for 42 points last year, but the red light should continue to burn while they're off the ice. Williams' second line, totaling 555 pounds and 10 years' varsity experience, is formidable. Seniors Geoff "Blade" Daley ("aggressive, wiry"), Barney Walsh ("playing his best hockey ever"), and Bob Duffy, a converted defenseman, will see steady action on the second scoring shift.

Freshman Dick Flood, soph Jim Rooney, and Chic Johnson (assistant hockey captain as well as soccer co-captain) compose the Ephskater's third wave, and will be backed by Dave Phalen, John Bessone, and Brooks Tanner. All four lines will see action in the tournament this weekend.

In its defensive quarter Williams will open with freshman Joe Merrill ("coming along well") and four-year standout Jim Norton. Norton, fast and sure with the stick, is captain of the team and will be called on to help stabilize the many youngsters making the transition to college-level defensive hockey. Freshperson Tom Resor ("coming along") and sophomore Jim Daubert ("steady") will back the starting pair; freshpeople John Starr and Pete Barbaresi will provide third-level support.

Unflappable senior Ed "Ice" Weiss returns in goal for the skaters, and he has looked strong in pre-season action. Weiss saved 177 out of 208 shots at him last year on the way to compiling a 5.4 goals allowed per game average. Still another freshman, Mike Moulton, will back Weiss. "I won't hesitate to use Moulton," says McCormick. "He and Weiss make a good tandem in goal."

Watch for the youthful Purple icers to tighten up their forechecking this winter, to play with more aggressiveness, and to improve on last year's awful 4-13 record within Division II. And watch for goals. "I think we're slightly better now than we were at this point last year," says McCormick of his 22nd squad of ice warriors. "We've got better depth, and that has to help us."

Williams opens its home season on December 6 against A.I.C.

Paddle tennis championship held

VOL. 91, NO. 23 WILLIAMS COLLEGE DECEMBER 8, 1977

President responds to resolutions

by Ray DeMeo

"We have all along been taking action and responding to issues of discrimination," said College President John W. Chandler. "I don't think there should be any doubt about our stand." While he said he wished to "signal support" for groups and individuals concerned with eradicating prejudice, Chandler opposed a change in official college policy to include a statement of non-discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

Chandler responded to the two resolutions approved by the College Council Wednesday night in a letter to Council President Tom Herwitz published in this issue of the Record. Chandler called the statement "a means of reassuring the Williams community on the college's stand."

While emphasizing that he could not speak for the trustees on the matter, Chandler responded negatively to the second of the council resolutions, which calls on the trustees to modify the College's official non-discrimination statement to cover non-discrimination on the basis of "sexual orientation." He explained that the present statement reflects the college's "legal obligations," and that it should not be used to "take a political stand." According to Chandler, the proposed change would commit the College to a "support of the efforts of national organizations working toward the passage of certain types of legislation," and thus "impair the capacity of the institution to do its educational job." "We don't want to create a disequilibrium that will disturb our function as an educational institution," he added.

Ted Stroll '78, the council representative who introduced the two non-discrimination resolutions, declared that the administration is "obviously very concerned" about the issues involved. He added, however, that "it's also obvious that they don't want to make any controversial moves." Stroll said that he was "disappointed in the administration's attitude" regarding the change in the non-discrimination statement. "It's an extremely conservative view for any institution to take," he declared. Stroll had not yet read Chandler's letter to Herwitz when contacted by the Record.

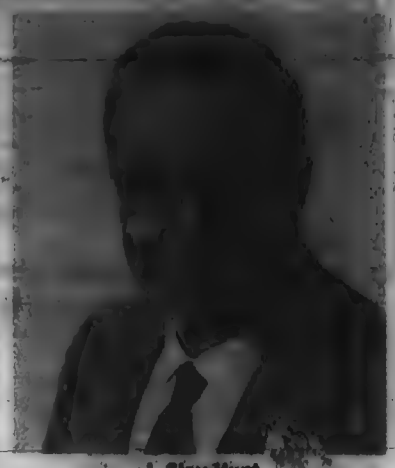
Carl Goodman '79 of the WGSO seconded Stroll's views, pointing out that a policy of non-discrimination against homosexuals is "not a political statement but a statement in favor of human rights." "Being a homosexual carries a stigma in society," he explained. "Most gay people here have a pervasive fear that they're going to be ostracized or discriminated against." Goodman cited 15 educational institutions that have recently modified their official policies in support of gay rights, including Harvard, Cornell and UCLA. "The college should be proud to take this action," he declared. Goodman added that the WGSO will attempt to establish "lines of communication" with the administration and trustees in support of the official change. Susan Coffee '78, another WGSO member, said that the organization anticipates "massive support" for the measure from students and faculty. "We're very optimistic that the trustees are going to pass this," she added.

Council President Tom Herwitz agreed that the College has "made its stand clear" on discrimination issues. However, while he sympathized with the administration's attitude toward a modification of its non-discrimination policy, he stressed the need for "an official recognition" of the rights of homosexuals at Williams. Herwitz suggested that the Council might seek faculty support in favor of the proposed change.

Mr. Thomas R. Herwitz, President
The College Council
Williams College
Williamstown, Massachusetts 01267

Dear Tom:

Thank you for the copies of the resolutions adopted by the College Council at its meeting of November 30.



I am pleased that the College Council has affirmed a position that Williams College has held in the past and continues to hold. Williams needs the efforts of the College Council and other campus groups in creating a community of learning marked by tolerance and respect for personal differences and preferences. The resolutions represent a positive step in condemning such tragically commonplace prejudices as racism and sexism, all of which express fear, insensitivity and ignorance.

I can assure the College Council and the rest of the Williams community that the College does not inquire into or take into account the sexual orientation of persons who apply for admission or employment, nor does it differentiate its treatment of students and employees according to their sexual orientation. The contents of the notice regarding discrimination carried in official Williams publications are stipulated by law. It would be a mistake to load into that statement references to the large body of college-determined practices and procedures that govern the official behavior of the various administrative officers and faculty of the College.

The concerns expressed in the two resolutions will be brought to the attention of the Trustees. They will receive copies of the resolutions and the officers of the Gargoyle Society have been asked to provide an opportunity to discuss these concerns in the arrangements they are making for the meeting of the Trustee Committee on Campus Life on January 26.

A college educates and influences in many ways. I recall the pride I took as an undergraduate in my insitution's motto, Pro Humanitate. The goal we should be striving for as individuals and as a college is that simple in definition. I hope we can continue to work together for the most effective means of achieving this shared ideal.

Sincerely yours,
John W. Chandler

J. Clay Hunt

James Clay Hunt, English professor, dies in his home

James Clay Hunt, retired professor of English died at his Williamstown home Thursday night after a long period of illness. Memorial services were held yesterday at Thompson Chapel for the professor of 30 years. He was 62.

Hunt was born in Lexington, Kentucky. He received his BA and Ma. in English from the University of Kentucky, and his PhD from Johns Hopkins University in 1941.

Before coming to Williams in 1941, Hunt taught English at Wayne State University for three years. He left Williams four years to serve in the Navy during World War II.

Hunt taught courses in Dante, Shakespeare, Elizabethean literature, and early 20th century poetry. In 1971 he was granted a John Hawley Roberts Professorship from the college. After retiring in 1976 due to illness, he wrote a book on Milton that was recently completed.

President John W. Chandler told the Boston Globe that Hunt taught students "how to use their minds with joy, honesty, and rigor. He was a dynamic and brilliant teacher who was devoted to his students, faithful to his scholarly tasks and deeply loyal to Williams College throughout his 30 years."

John F. Reichert, chairman of the English department, remembered Hunt's awesome memory: "Everything he knew he seemed to know by heart. His special loves outside of literature and intellectual history were music and ballet. He could watch a performance of a ballet that he had not seen performed for 20 years and compare the two performances, movement for movement, gesture for gesture."

SAT allocations tighten

by Stu Massad

The College Council Finance Committee has been "somewhat tighter" in allocating funds to student activities in an effort to hold down the Student Activities Tax (SAT) in the face of rising requests, according to committee chairman Harry Kelly '78.

With $106,000 in SAT monies coming in this year—including $4,000 carried over from last year—requests totaled some $109,000, plus $8,300 for a buffer fund, and College Council and course guide expenses, Kelly said. SAT funds have remained fairly stable over the past two years, Kelly remarked, because the student population has remained fairly constant. Funds decreased slightly this year because of a smaller freshman class.

"I would like to see them stay constant," Kelly commented, "because I don't think we should raise our Student Activities Tax just because student demands have increased. In the long run, I think the tax is going to have to increase," he added, citing inflation as a factor in forcing an increase.

Kelly said he expects to have a "buffer zone" of around $2,400 after the College Council completes final allocations. The buffer is used to bail out organizations which run into a deficit and to compensate for bookkeeping mistakes.

"I think people are really playing with fire if they get much below $2,400," Kelly warned. He named the budgets of WCFM and the Record as central to maintaining the buffer baseline. He added that the Finance Committee will ratify most College Council recommendations on allocations, though possibly under protest.

Kelly also noted that the Finance Committee will prepare a final recommendation on changing the SAT before billing decisions are made for next year.

Record appoints staff

Record editor Scott Fenn has announced the appointment of the editorial board for 1978. The new appointments were made by the outgoing Record editorial board and become effective in January.

Chip Buckner '79 has been named editor-in-chief of the Record for next year. David MacGregor and Ann McCabe, both juniors, have been appointed executive editor and production editor, respectively. Keron Walker '80 and Nancy Richman '80 will serve as managing editors. Together with Buckner, these four persons will constitute the new Record editorial board, the official decision-making body of the paper.

The following departmental editors were also announced. Ray DeMeo '80 will be news editor. John Rindlaub '79 has been reappointed as features editor. Mimi David '79 will continue as arts editor. Nancy Rhein '80 will edit the sports department. Hans Oettgen, Charlie Gledhill and Chris Read, all sophomores, will continue as photography editors.

Fenn also announced that no changes were made in the Record business staff, where Michael Behrman '80 continues as business manager.

All four members of the past year's editorial board are seniors and are retiring. Editor Scott Fenn, along with managing editors Bill Dahling, Sally Coney and Jim Cohen, will serve as contributing editors during the spring semester. Also leaving is senior Frank Carr, who departs as sports editor of the paper but will continue to serve as a contributing editor in that department.

Buckner joined the Record in the spring of 1976 as a features reporter after having served as a co-editor of Beph Burger—a newsletter published by freshmen of the class of '79. He was promoted to associate editor in the news department after his first semester with the Record and has served as a layout editor for the past year.

"Chip was chosen as editor largely because of the diversity of experiences he's had in his last two years with the paper," said Fenn. "He proved that he could handle both the editorial and production aspects of the paper competently," Fenn stated, "and we knew that he was someone who could both lead and motivate others." Fenn added, "I think that

Socialist-feminist speaks out on the FBI and its infringements upon women's rights

Marcia Gallo described the growth of FBI "dirty tricks" against the Women's Liberation Movement and called for a strong defense of the rights women have acquired, since she claimed "there is no reason to believe the government has ended these tactics."

Gallo, N.Y. Socialist Party candidate for the U.S. Senate in 1976, delivered this message during "The FBI and the Women's Movement," a lecture co-sponsored by the Williams Women, the Action Coalition and the Lecture Committee last Thursday.

While the FBI's infiltration and surveillance of both civil rights and anti-war movements over the past 15 years has received extensive coverage, their parallel attack against the Women's Movement has come to light only in the past few months, she said.

Gallo explained that FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover perceived the Women's Liberation Movement as a threat because he felt they might "collaborate with Blacks, Indians, and other oppressed groups, become radical or socialist, or reach out to women in other countries."

Consequently, according to Gallo, he sent a memo to his agents to "find out who's behind the conspiracy," or, to identify the leaders of the Women's Liberation Movement. "Every woman involved in demonstrations, conferences, picket lines or other forms of self- or group-expression between 1969 and 1973 was the target of FBI surveillance," Gallo revealed.

Bugging, taking down names and license plates and pumping women for information were not the only surveillance tactics the FBI employed, claimed Gallo. One document targets the Women's movement for "special attention." According to Gallo, the FBI used the term to refer to burglaries, poison pen letters and other "dirty tricks" tactics against civil rights and anti-war groups, so she said it is reasonable to believe the women's movement received similar treatment.

In 1972, the FBI published a document, "Exploitation of the Women's Movement by the Socialist Worker's Party," an example of linking the organization with Communism.

Although FBI and CIA espionage measures have been exposed and their directors maintain that they no longer use them. Gallo said she feels that "there is no reason to believe the government has ended these tactics."

This is the last issue of the Record for 1977, as some of the staff cling to the hope that if we begin now we can catch up on the study time lost during the semester. Assuming some of us pass, we will put out the first winter study issue on Friday, January 6.

The Williams Record wishes all its readers a very merry Christmas and a Happy 1978.

Peer Health corrections

To the editor:

As coordinator of Williams Peer Health Counseling, I wish to correct several errors which appeared in the Nov. 29 Record article about our organization.

First, the headline was misleading: "Peer health center expands health care and counseling." There is no peer health center (although many resources are available at the Women's Center). We do not offer health care or general health counseling—this is a misconception which recurred throughout the article. We do provide information and counseling regarding contraception, sexuality, relationships, and gynecological problems. We have not expanded our counseling; rather, we have expanded the scope of the work we do (to include the display case in the library, for example).

The article stated that students wishing to become counselors are encouraged, but not required, to participate in counseling training sessions. This is false. Counselors must actively participate in training. Only students who take the course solely for their own information are not required to attend role-playing sessions.

I expressed the opinion that counseling training is conducive to an individual's growth and sensitivity. It is not the counseling itself which provides a debutante counselor with the first opportunities to develop this all-important sensitivity, as the article implied.

Finally, the article stated that the Peer Health Counselors were denied permission to set up the "Contraceptive of the Week" display in the infirmary. This is incorrect. We did not even request such permission.

The Peer Health Counselors appreciate Record coverage. But we are a group which handles matters which can be extremely personal and important, and we felt it necessary to provide a more accurate portrayal of the organization than was presented in the recent article.

Sincerely yours,
Sheryll Berggren '79

On Libertine

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Mr. John Libertine, Sr.'s letter to the editor of 29 November.

His point that the Schlitz beer ad should be run because there are some people who like to see advertisements of that type, has some validity in that some of those who objected to it did so for rather moralistic, prudish reasons. They felt that women should not be presented as sex objects, as it is "demeaning". I disagree—I feel that it is only demeaning when women alone, rather than men and women together, are presented sexually. What I do strongly resent in that advertisement is the implied notion that the reader, and therefore the target, is a man. I would have found that advertisement perfectly delightful had the model been arm-in-arm with a very cool, "macho" man. I am offended that Schlitz or their advertising agency thinks that women do not drink beer. This type of sexism through omission is, apparent at every turn. Women drive the family car more than men do—why do we see so many automobile advertisements with female models in evening gowns draped over the car's hood? I realize that the psychological rationale behind the use of sexually suggestive female models to sell products to which questions of sexuality are not related is that men will see the advertisement and think, "I will have her if I buy this product," and women will think, "I will be like her if I buy this product." That, however, leads us to the problem of the perpetual use of woman rather than man as symbol, which is sexism at its deepest level, and is not really the issue here.

My last thought on his letter concerns its tone. I found it patronizing and in itself righteous, which is interesting in light of his comments on those who "somehow seem to be so much wiser than the rest of us that they can dictate our morals, our ethics, ... our very thinking." Throughout his letter he used a copywriting rather than an expository style of writing, which shows that he does not regard us, that is, the editorial board of the Record or the student readership, as equals to engage in a factual or logical argument. We are, instead, to him, "targets" to be "exposed" to his "campaign". His letter might have been taken much more seriously if he had not used the forms he did. I would advise Mr. Libertine to read the letters to the editor in major newspapers, or even some of those that have been run in the Record of recent weeks—he will find a more suitable model.

Sincerely,
Ginny Doherty '79

Corrections

In the November 29 issue of the Record, Zirka Filipczak was inadvertently left off the list of faculty members signing a letter admonishing the Record and the incident in the reserve room.

Renelda Pierce, not Julia Ayala as printed, spoke for BSU at last week's CC meeting.

Letters: the CC, peers, and ads

Therefore, let it be resolved that. . .

Smith

To the editor:

The College Council meeting of Nov. 30 enacted two resolutions. The first urged the authorities of the college to condemn prejudice. The second resolution recommended amending the equal-opportunity clause in the college bulletin to include homosexuals. Since these were matters of general interest, a sizeable group of supporters of the resolution was present. They contributed a lot to the council's discussion. A small handful of them (after a while it seemed like a hundred of them) channelled the discussion with their expressions of approval and disapproval. They booted bigoted speakers and applauded enlightened ones. The council was quickly given to understand exactly what was expected of us.

This tactic worked spectacularly well to push the second resolution through. Homosexuality is a sensitive issue at the best of times. With laughter and theatrical moans the peanut gallery quickly stifled the debate. The resolution passed easily. I think it would have passed as easily without its most vocal supporters.

The council was bulldozed into voicing a humane and enlightened position. Ridicule and noise were wielded deftly and with noble intent. However, uncritical opprobrium can be turned to other purposes. A few noisy redneck homophobe sexist racists might have swayed us in another direction.

Gar-Wood CC representative Larry Mitchell '78.

Mitchell

To the editor:

I must express my disappointment in the resolution passed by the College Council Wednesday night. While I fully endorse the spirit of that resolution, that is, the dignity of all persons and equality of their civil rights, it is written in such a manner that it abrogates those very rights which it purports to acknowledge. The lack of specificity or definition, particularly of the term sexism, leaves open a number of interpretations of the resolution which would be contrary to its spirit. In addition, the wholesale condemnation of certain ideas which was implicit in the document intrinsically denies its intentions. A simple and straight-forward affirmation of all human rights would have been far more appropriate.

Larry Mitchell '78
CC Rep.—Gar-Wood House

It is wrong to ridicule homosexuals. It is also wrong to ridicule Don Toumey, when he asks questions that trouble him. To raise the questions Don raised took an extraordinary amount of courage and an unusual taste for the fray, because the atmosphere of the meeting was artificially charged against "bigoted" viewpoints. Perhaps Don was unenlightened and unrealistic to ask if the vagueness of the "sexual orientation" clause would open the door to all kinds of undesirable people. The same thought occurred to me. I did not bring it up because I did not expect to be reassured or educated. The atmosphere of the meeting made it clear that the first hapless homophobe to speak up would be laughed out of court.

Homophobia is a very perceptive term, but those who use it often forget what it means. Homophobes are afraid, not dumb or cruel. Right now some very important values are being expanded in their application to groups who deserve their protection. Pernicious corollaries to some of these values are being discredited. This is a big change and a salutary change, but for some it is quite a wrench. It is a situation of insecurity and derisive laughter fails to confront this very real emotional state. Judy Nitchie made a good point at the forum on sexism when she said that her feelings remain in spite of all the eloquence and amusement of glib sexists. Feelings must be dealt with, whether they be indignation at sexual abasement or something as anachronistic—and genuine—as fear of people who used to be called perverted.

In order to represent its constituents at Williams, the college Council must weigh alternatives and gather information. As a council member, I should have come away from the debate with an understanding of the problems faced by Williams students and the minorities they oppress. Instead, I left the meeting thinking, "What a bunch of assholes these fem libbers and gay rights activists are." This feeling was surely an unexamined emotional reaction, grossly unfair to the majority of cooler heads among the resolutions' supporters. Yet animosity is the most lasting effect of coercive tactics like those that were used Wednesday night. Jeering and laughter may be highly effective, and are probably pretty exhilarating. But jeers and ridicule heat up tempers and draw lines of battle. Turning discussion into a war against stupidity misses the point. Adversary relationships frustrate the aim of measures like these resolutions, which is to make race, gender and sexuality matters of indifference.

Brian Smith '79

Shedd

To the editor:

Would some enlightened person please define the term "sexism" for me?

I understand that the College Council recently passed a resolution condemning sexism at Williams and, indeed, since we at Williams do represent the future leaders of our society, at least symbolically throughout America and the world. I assume that since a definition was considered so obvious that, contrary to all normal procedures in drafting such resolutions and despite objections from two or three members of the Council who are obviously as ignorant as I, one was not included in the resolution it would not be a difficult and time-consuming task for someone (perhaps one of the supporters of the aforementioned resolution) to provide an answer to my question.

I make my request because "sexist" has such a nasty, Godawful ring to it that I certainly don't want to be one. But how can I avoid pitfalls that I may be unaware of?

Sincerely,
[redacted]

Trivia tests TV, sports buffs

This is the time of year when all of us are trying to use every waking minute we have to its fullest extent: reading, typing, writing, drawing, and, in every form, studying. But remember all of those long hours you wasted in front of the tube watching superchicken whose real name is Henry Cabot Henhouse the III, Johnny Quest (with Hadji Bandit and Race Bannon), Fractured Fairy Tales (with Edward Everett Horton as narrator), and Dudley Do-Right, instead of doing your homework? Or the Justice League of America comic books you used to read instead of geography?

Those were not wasted hours, and you'll have your chance to display your powers for recalling all the incredibly unimportant facts gained in the 23rd semi-annual bonafide Williams College Trivia Contest on Wednesday, December 7 from midnight to 8:00 a.m. on WCFM. General Morgasm (a hybrid mixture of General Bumble and Morgasm), the reigning masters of Trivia, will call the shots from Trivia Central in the WCFM studios, with questions ranging from Star Wars to Star Trek, Rocky to Rocket J. Squirrel, and Soap to Soupy Sales. It was finally decided that this year's theme will be: "1977—Star Wars, Sexism, Siglinda, and Sadat."

The contest setup is familiar to all but freshmen: a question will be asked (i.e. What is the hometown of Frank Burns on M.A.S.H.?) followed by a song (i.e. "Wooly-Bully" by Sam the Sham and the Pharaohs). Contestants will have the duration of the song to call in the name of the song and its artist (worth 1 point) plus the answer to the question. (In this, case, Fort Wayne, Indiana . . . RAH!) Also included will be mega-bonuses, hour-bonuses, super-bonuses, and, as Santa used to say, "some surprises."

So get together with friends, phones, beer (caffeine?) and gather around the radio on Wednesday night.

Chip's forays into campus politics on the CEP, as house president, and elsewhere will serve him in good stead in his tenure as editor and I have confidence that the Record will prosper under his guidance."

MacGregor joined the paper in the fall of 1975, serving as a reporter in the news department. He was named associate editor in that department in February 1976 and became news editor a year ago. MacGregor edited his high school literary magazine—The Thomasonian. "David has been one of the most conscientious and hard working individuals on the staff this year and we think we've given him a position where his editing talents can be most fully utilized," stated Fenn. "We hope that he'll be intimately involved in writing editorials, soliciting op-eds and maintaining quality control in the content of the paper."

McCabe, who edited her high school paper, Silhouette, joined the Record in the fall of her freshman year as a news reporter and layout assistant. She advanced to associate editor in the news department and was appointed layout editor a year ago. According to Fenn, "Ann has always been one of those people who was willing to take up the slack when others didn't come through. The Record desperately needs her talents in the area of layout," Fenn stated.

Richman and Walker both joined the paper in September 1976 as news reporters. Both were promoted to associate editor in the spring of their freshman year. This past semester, Richman co-edited the arts department while Walker assisted with layout and continued in news.

Walker served as editor of her high school paper, the John Burroughs World, and has spent several summers working as a reporter. Richman was editorial chairman of the Phillips Academy Phillipian. Fenn noted, "These two sophomores have been a tremendous asset to the paper and will bring unique skills to their new positions. Together, they'll be in charge of the day-to-day operation of the newspaper and I expect that they're going to shake things up a bit." Fenn added that he thought that the fresh ideas brought by Walker and Richman would blend well with those of some of the older faces on the staff.

DeMeo joined the Record in the fall of his freshman year as a news reporter and was promoted to associate editor last spring. "Ray is a talented news writer and we expect him to run a solid news operation," Fenn said.

Rindlaub begins his second term as features editor, having been appointed a year ago. Fenn commented, "John has really come into his own as features editor and the quality of his department continues to improve."

David joined the Record as an arts reporter in the fall of 1975. She worked as an associate editor in that department and co-edited it this past semester. "Mimi has a flair for the arts," Fenn said, "and we think that she'll get the Record arts department into some areas of the campus arts scene that we haven't managed to cover before."

Rhein joined the Record as a sports reporter last year. After co-editing the department for a period last year, she now assumes full control of the department. "Nancy should help broaden the perspective of our sports coverage," Fenn stated.

Oettgen, Gledhill and Read continue as photography editors, all having served as staff photographers in past years. "These three guys really know their business," Fenn stated. "Our photography department has got more talent than we know how to use," he added.

Project reveals College slang

One hundred lists of twenty words each circulated on campus last week in a Linguistics experiment to determine the extent of Williams own slang vocabulary and how it originated.

Tom Helde, '80, processed 200 examples of typical Williams slang through the computer to produce the lists which members of the course in Introductory Linguistics introduced to 100 informants to determine the popularity of each word and the common background of those who used it. Each word appeared on ten lists.

"To qualify as Williams slang," Helde said, "five of the ten people asked about each word had to have heard or used it at and only at Williams." The original 200 examples came solely from members of the class, who represented a more or less random sample of the college community. Apparently more than 20 met this criteria.

The most commonly known Williams slang is the single word "burger," which refers to any and all members of the freshman class at any given time. The most popular activity in "Binsville" is that of booking, or grinding, closely followed by getting juiced, or "ozoned," on "traditional refreshments" and "za-ing out," in that order.

According to Professor Truett Cates, the project grew out of an examination of the tendency of groups of people to develop a specialized vocabulary which then identifies its members with that group. At Williams, slang seems to spread via three sources: the Junior Advisor, the residential housing unit, or the publications on campus, including the Record and the radio station. The lifespan of a slang word depends on its aural appeal, the popularity and communality of the experience it describes and the importance or notoriety of a single event with which the word is associated.

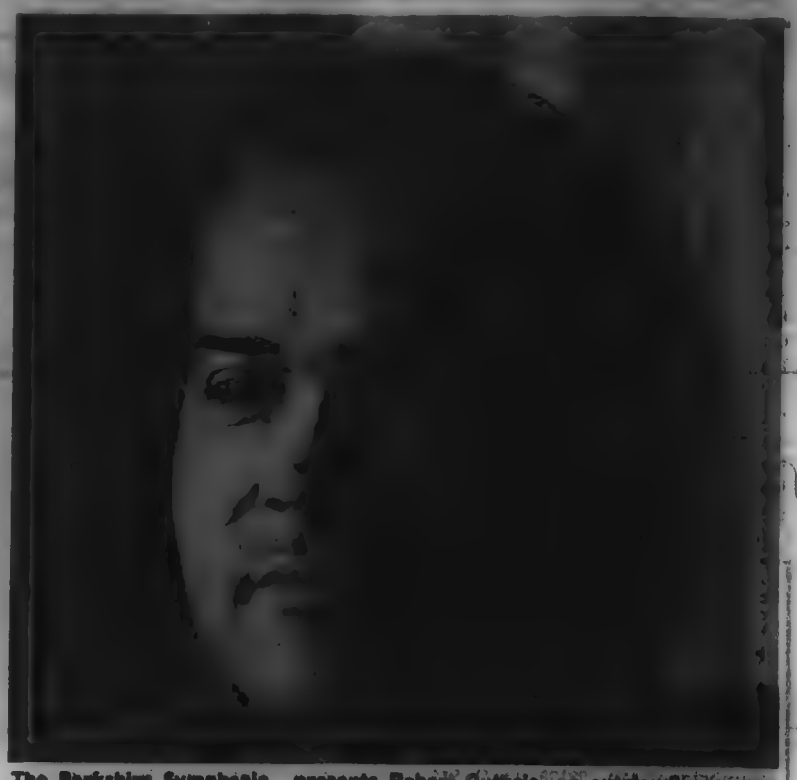
For example, slang having to do with the recent events described as "sexist" has either sprung up anew, or other words previously applying to different situations have been expanded to include these circumstances in their meanings. Discussion has been called "short"—lacking or inadequate—and those who advocate sexism themselves are "short" or, in extreme cases, "inflatable."

Helde said that he has run into problems attempting to localize expressions because of the sketchy data he has received from informants. "We wanted to associate words with a certain house, a JA's house, an extra curricular activity, or a certain athletic team, but we didn't get enough to go on," he said.

"Either the origin of the words is too diverse to trace, or they catch on too quickly to pin down their beginnings," Helde explained.

Then, of course, there are the words for which no one group will admit to originating, or those which are so old that no one can recall where or when they were first heard. Shakespeare students will continue to "pus on B-bar Berek" for his real- or imagined-propensity to give that grade; "muffin brains" will always take "rocks for jocks" to get out of their division three requirements, "random" characters will lurk around the phone booth on Spring Street, and "geeks" will spend the rest of their lives in the "libes" sheaving—writing long, voluminous papers.

Coffeehouse artist comes



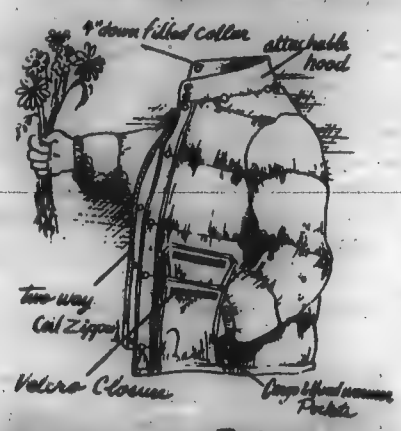
The Williams Coffeehouse and the ACEC present Jaime Brockett this Wednesday night from 9-12 in the Rathskeller, a good idea for the time between the end of the semester and Trivia night.

Brockett is a veteran of the College Coffeehouse circuit. He has played on bills with artists such as Joan Baez, Doc Watson, Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Stephen Stills and Billy Joel. Brockett has been described "as an adept musician, playing 6 and 12 string guitar, dulcimer, banjo and autoharp. He sings material ranging from quiet, melodic love songs to political satire. Brockett integrates his singing with instrumentals and an ever fascinating stream of talk on most any subject that comes to mind.

Dancers perform independent study

Beth Popik and Mia Baird will present The Materials and Methods of Dance Composition this Friday afternoon at 4:30 in the Dance Studio of Lasell Gymnasium. The performance is the culmination of their independent study course in "Dance Composition" taught by Joy-Anne Dewey.

Each student will present two solos which must solve various problems of composition. The first problem involves a dance in the pre-classic form done to the music of G. F. Handel's "Allemande." The dancer must state a theme and use only specific variations and repetitions of it—introducing no new material. The second problem entails a dance based on random photographs.



The Berkshire Symphonic presents Robert Guthrie, an outstanding young guitarist, this Friday night at 8:30 in Chapin Hall. Guthrie has been encouraged and taught by such greats as Andres Segovia, Caledpnio Romero, Jesus Silva, and Alirio Diaz. Further, in 1974, a reader's poll of the Guitar Players Magazine voted him one of the world's five leading guitarists.

Guthrie will play Villa-Lobos' Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra and Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra. The orchestra alone will play Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol and Carl Maria Von Weber's Symphony No. 1. As usual, Julius Hegyi is the musical director and conductor.

Tickets at $2.00 are available at the door or from Harts' Drugs, Spring Street in Williamstown.

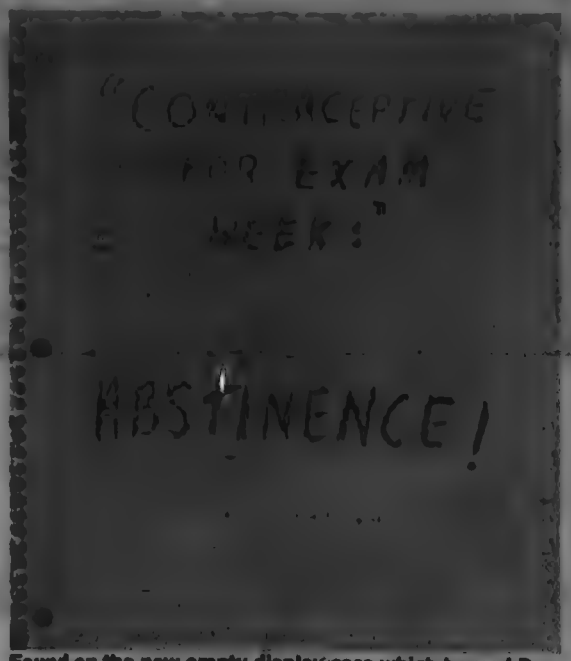
Alumni Review piques Pique

To the editor:



Deadline pressures prompt hasty decisions, and editorial mistakes are easily made in the process. Certainly we've been guilty of many ourselves. But we're presently faced with a "catfeud overnight" that we find difficult to make lightly. The current issue of the Alumni Review contains an article by Sheila Sullivan '78 called "The Return of an Old Fashioned Spellbinder." This article was originally published in the Dec. 1976 issue of Pique under the title "From Acrolithus to Bo Wyatt: A Portrait of Richard Seward." Neither Sheila nor the editors of Pique were notified by the Alumni Review concerning their intention to use the article.

The article has been edited to half its original and intended length. A closing sentence, not the author's own, has been added. The editor's preface makes the article appear to have been written this year, specifically for the Alumni Review. Such unauthorized tampering with an author's material demonstrates a flagrant violation of journalistic ethics. Worse yet, we can only regard the failure of the Alumni Review to credit Pique as the original publisher as an inexcusable act of cribbing.

Perhaps we are partly at fault for not having copyrighted Pique. In the past, we've avoided a copyright for a variety of reasons. Now it seems this decision was unwise. But how unfortunate that we must be forced to a copyright by a careless act of plagiarism from within our own community—and by a publication as highly regarded as the Alumni Review.

We realize that this incident was not maliciously intended. Yet we are troubled by the notion that the Alumni Review forgot to contact either Sheila or Pique, neglected to ask our permission to reprint the article, and overlooked Pique's rightful byline credit. We ask that a public statement of apology, correcting this mistake, be printed in the next Alumni Review.

Sincerely, Anne Eldridge '78 Thom Gass '78 Co-Editors, Pique

Letter: Kalapos

To the editor:

I would like to commend the College Council on its recent resolution stating that Williams College does not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation although I must admit that homosexuality which I take to be fear of going home does not appear a big threat to me. Thomas Wolfe wrote a great novel about it, for those in the college community who would like to raise their consciousnesses. However, this resolution will prove a great victory for those of us with unusual sexual preferences; we have been forced to hide long enough.

Furthermore, in order for this to be more than just an empty gesture, those of us who have practiced our preference so long in secrecy must grab the bull by the horns and come out of the closet—or, in my case, in out of the barnyard. After ruminating over the situation, it seems utterly ridiculous to assume that this open-minded community will not accept and understand my orientation toward large hoofed quadrupeds. I would like, for the convenience of those who have been so long persecuted the way I have, to go public; I invite all interested students to attend the organizational meeting of the WBAS (Williams Bovine Appreciation Society) on Sunday, Dec. 18, 6:30 p.m. in the Currier Hall Lounge. Lovers of lesser cattle are also welcome.

To the editor:

Some of your letter-writers (December 2) seem incapable of making basic distinctions or even of using their pronouns properly. These correspondents—all of them male—allude with lofty regret to "a general inability or unwillingness to laugh at ourselves." (Emphasis added.) Really now, folks, who's been laughing at himself? And who's been objecting to whom? Apparently things just have to be spelled out: What is going on is that there are women (and men) who find it unacceptable when men sing songs, play pranks, run ads, or otherwise laugh in ways that degrade women. This is the issue; those who favor the latter sort of conduct should openly admit it, and not hide behind their blurred logic and bad grammar.

Messrs. Perry et al. may laugh at themselves all they want. We all look forward to their emulating Woody Allen. Let's have a few comic routines about their sexual weaknesses, or about their days as virgins! I'm inclined to suspect, however, that not a single one of them would feel amused if a sizeable group of men (or women) were to bop into Sawyer Library and then sing funny songs that mention him and mock his sexuality; still less would he be pleased if a life-size effigy, bearing some resemblance to his face and physique, were to be tossed down the stairs, visibly bespattered with Gallo wine. Oh, I know, I know, lots of folks here would find it all vastly amusing. But would Mr. Perry and the other letter-writers?

Back in 1962, when I was a food server for a West Coast frat, I used to hear the "brothers" sing racist songs just before dinner every evening. (For adash of variety, they occasionally intoned a prurient strain too.) Among my fellow servers there was a black freshman who eventually quit the job in sheer disgust. Poor guy, he just lacked the ability to, well, you know, laugh at himself. Tsk Tsk. But at least those white frat-boys were broad-minded enough to do his laughing for him.

Sincerely,
Gene H. Bell

Christmas services at Thompson

The traditional Christmas services of lessons and carols will be presented this coming Sunday, December 11, at 4:00 and at 7:30, in the Thompson Memorial Chapel. The theme for this year is "An Italian Christmas".

Readers from the College and community join the College Chaplain, Rev. John Eusden, in leading the service, and the congregation is invited to join the choir in singing traditional carols in both English and Italian. The orchestra will begin a prelude approximately ten minutes before the start of the service.

Kelly sparks Purple to a spectacular win over Tufts

by Frank Pergolizzi

The magic came back. After deserting Williams Thursday night against Hamilton, the little bit o' magic of Lasell gym returned Saturday night. With its help the Ephs were able to come back from an 11 point deficit to defeat Tufts 69-58. After Thursday's loss to Hamilton the victory was crucial, as Tufts and Hamilton were two of the toughest, if not the toughest, teams Williams will play this year.

Coach Curt Tong knew that his young team would have to play at its very best to beat the tough Hamilton Continentals. The Ephs stayed close for the first five minutes of the game, then Hamilton ran off two streaks of ten and six unanswered points and went into the locker room at halftime ahead by 14, 37-23.

Forced to settle for bad shots due to the tough Hamilton defense, Williams shot only 38 per cent from the field. Indicative of the kind of night it was, Gerry Kelly hit on only six of twenty-four shots. Senior Bill Whelan led the Ephs with 13 points. Cedric Oliver led Hamilton with 23.

Saturday night the story was Gerry Kelly. The junior guard came to play, scoring 29 points (20 in the second half). He also had eleven steals and seven assists, two of those leading to key baskets late in the game that sealed the victory.

Williams led at halftime 25-22, but early in the second half Tufts got rolling. An offensive foul call against Matt Spangler turned the momentum around. The rim suddenly closed on Williams, as Tufts got their fast break game going and scored 14 of the next 16 points. With Tufts up by 11, Tom Balderston broke the ice with an inside jumper and Kelly followed with a layup to cut the lead to 7. After John Caragiorgis brought the lead back up to nine, the magic suddenly hit Williams. They scored nine straight, tying the score on Brad Wolk's foul shot. Bill Gorra put Tufts back on top but Kelly answered him with a jumper to even things up. Down by 1, Kelly hit two jump shots, Guard Andy Straka stole the ball and layed it in, and followed with another basket on a jumper. Then Kelly fed Jeff Brinker a perfect inbounds pass for ten unanswered points for Williams and a nine point lead. Tufts went into a full court press to try to get back in the game, but never got closer than 7.

Williams travels to Norwich tonight as they seek to break the jinx that plagued them on the road last season as they won only one game outside of their Lasell home. Thursday the Ephs meet Connecticut College in Williamstown. Game time is an early 7:00.

Kelly hooks athlete of week

The first Record Athlete of the Week for the winter sports season is junior Gerry Kelly who led the varsity basketball team to a 69-58 comeback win over the Tufts Jumbos Saturday. The junior guard poured in 29 points, 20 of which he scored in the second half. Kelly added seven assists with precise passing and in defensive statistics, he broke up Jumbo scoring attempts by stealing the ball eleven times.

Honorable Mention—Senior hockey player Bob Duffy has been awarded an honorable mention after his hat trick against Wesleyan Friday night. Duffy was switched from defense to the front line and he quickly showed his ability to score as he paced the Ephmen to an 8-2 victory over the Cards.

Stu Deans, senior captain of the men's swim team also receives an honorable mention as he captured two individual victories in the Ephs' 61-52 win against Amherst. Deans took the 1000 yard freestyle in 10:32.3 and outswam the competition in the 500 with a 5:04 clocking.

Gerry Kelly: 29 points, 11 steals, 7 assists. Awesome.

Ephs don skates, drub Wesleyan, drop to Jeffs

Williams' Purple icers got their season off to a .500 start this weekend, trouncing tournament host Wesleyan, 8-2, before dropping a 5-4 decision to the Amherst Lord Jeffs. The Ephs' victory over the Cardinals was their 14th in as many games between the two colleges; Amherst's win was its third over the Purple since 1967.

Converted defenseman Bob Duffy wasted little time in demonstrating his enthusiasm for offensive hockey Friday night, racking up a quick hat trick to lead the Ephs on their easy way. Williams Coach William McCormick praised senior cageguard Ed Weiss for a "good job" in the contest, and large clumps of Purple goals frustrated the Cardinals all the more. Two tallies by center Dan Sullivan and one each by Joey Merrill, Barny Walsh, and Blade Daley kept the statisticians busy.

"We got a little complacent" was McCormick's assessment of the Ephskaters' surprising loss to Amherst the next day. Williams started slowly and trailed by as little as 3-0 in the second period only because of some sparkling work by goalie Mike Moulton. The speedy Lord Jeffs, inspired by frosh phenom John Greer, controlled the puck for minutes at a time before the Ephs got rolling late in the first period.

Williams crept up to 3-2 on goals by Sullivan and Rick Flood in the middle session, but these were quickly neutralized by Greer's third score and a high hummer by Amherst wing Paul Howes. To this the Ephs responded with a torrent of third period shots that left them, when the final horn moaned, one goal short. "We peppered the heck out of their goalie but couldn't put it in," lamented McCormick afterwards. "That is a much-improved Amherst team. The Greer boy is going to be a good one."

If you drain that glass of milk and finish up your pie there's still time to see the icers in action tonight. The home hockey season kicks off in Lansing Chapman rink at 7:30 against the A.I.C. Buccaneers. The Bucks, led by All-American forward Tom Mullin, are big, quick, and potent. "Our first job," says the Ephs' mentor, "will be to control their scoring."

Racketmen squash Navy for second time in 24 years

by Evan Bash

It may be impossible to predict a season's performance on the strength of just one match, but when that one match is against Navy, and you've soundly licked them 7-2, one thing is assured: this year's men's squash team will be ready to play with anybody.

For those who are keeping count, Friday's win over the Middies was only William's second in twenty-four years (the first came last year), and more importantly, the Ephs really dominated Navy with plenty of touch, endurance and guts.

Yet perhaps the most pleasing aspect of the victory to coach Sean Sloane was that the Purple line-up appears to have no weak spots. Not only is there good depth to the ladder, but it also looks like the Ephs will be solid in the middle and upper reaches of the ladder where they are usually weaker.

Defeat was dealt out quickly to Navy as the racketmen swept the first five matches to finish. Chip Lindquist, playing in the No. 2 position, never let his opponent into their brief three game match, while No. six Jon Saunders was simply overpowering in his three game win. Dropping the first game, No. five Jim Parsons rebounded to win the next three easily. Jim Little used his deft touch shots perfectly for a four game victory at No. seven, and Evan Bash (No. nine) secured the triumph for Williams as he came back from being down two games to win in five.

Mitch Reiss survived a 14-11 deficit in the fifth game to score an exciting victory, while No. eight Peter Thayer lost his fourth game by only one point en route to a tough loss in five games. Eph captain and No. one Arnie Cogswell was done in by an off day and a quick-as-a-cat opponent in three games. Martin Goldberg scored William's final win at No. three, as he extended his winning streak that stretches over two seasons to twelve straight.

The racketmen will now try to somehow sustain a bit of momentum and stay sharp over vacation as they must next face Princeton, the second ranked team in the country last year, on January 6.

Swimmers slip by Jeffs in opener

The Men's varsity swim team took its first step towards a sixth consecutive Little Three Championship Saturday afternoon by defeating Amherst in its opening meet of the season, 61-52.

In an encore performance, the Williams women trimmed their counterparts, 73-40, to extend their record to 3-1 on the season.

Distanceman and captain of the Men's team Stu Deans accounted for two of Williams' nine victories in the men's meet, taking the 1000 and 500 in good early-season times of 10:32.3 and 5:04. Paul Vom Eigen and soph Brian Volpp swept the 200 Breaststroke and Keith Berryhill anchored the victorious 400 Medley Relay, which included Vom Eigen, David Amlicke, and Guy Hoelzer and won the 100 free in 50.75. Hoelzer also won the 200 Fly in a respectable 2:08.5.

Phil Wild, New England champ in the 100 free-style last season, battled an Amherst opponent to the wall in the 200 Freestyle, but got the win with a 1:53.7. Tom Beckett reestablished himself as a premiere sprinter for the Ephmen with a 22.5 first in the 50 Free.

In the women's meet, co-captain Nina Murphy displayed her ability as a triple threat butterflyer, distance and sprint freestyler, coming up with three seconds and three personal best times in the 500 Free (5:49.3), 100 Fly (1:07.5), and a quick 26.5 split 50 Free in the 200 Free Relay. The breaststroking combination of Seniors Sue Tuttle and Cindy Harvey accounted for two of Williams' six one-two finishes, taking both the 100 and 50 yard events. Freshman Kyle Doherty backed them up in both events.

Each member of the prevailing 200 Medley Relay doubled up with a win in at least one other event. Tuttle swept the breaststrokes, Carol Buck won the 100 Individual Medley, Joanna Monroe claimed the 50 Fly, and Keron Walker took the 100 Free before splitting her first sub-25.0 50 Free in the 200 Free Relay. Linda Reed was also a double victor in the 50 and 100 backstrokes, while fellow freshman Katherine Pearsall clocked her best this season with 5:40.2 in the 500.

Tomorrow at 4:00 the men will take on U Connecticut in the Muir Pool after which the women will face a very strong arch-rival team from Smith at 7:00 p.m.

Alphabet Soup beats Bomo to capture trivia

The triviality of Alphabet Soup reigned supreme last month, with the team working out of Hopkins House beating the perennial powers, an alumni team and assorted aspirants to the trivia throne.

Several members of "The Soup" have already begun to collect bits and pieces of random knowledge from Star Wars and Close Encounters. The team is psyched for the Spring and promises to provide one of the best contests in recent years.

Alphabet Soup organized as a freshman team last year, incorporating JA's and students from the quad as well as several faculty members. This was the team's third Trivia effort.

Alphabet Soup and Bomo pulled away from the pack early in the contest, with Alphabet Soup slightly ahead the entire evening. A spokesman for Bomo remarked that he was "glad to see the soup get their day in the sun."

Twelve O'Clock High, strengthened by a merger with Wingnuts and by defecting Buda Bears, vaulted from seventh place to third, 50 points behind Bomo.

Dan Bruns, a member of the fourth place Knights of Nee, vowed to try catching Bomo and Twelve O'Clock High next spring. Despite a disastrous second hour, they finished only five points behind Twelve O'Clock High.

A band of alumni returned to challenge a younger generation of trivia players, adopting the name of Green Gee. This team finished fifth.

Defections, illnesses and drunken stupors hampered Buda Bear, a power since its inception and a winner last December. Buda struggled to maintain respectability, finishing sixth. By the fifth hour the normally mobbed Buda's Lair was nearly deserted.

Maximus Draught, a freshman team holed up in Lehman, finished in seventh place, only seven points away from Buda Bear.

General Morgasm, the product of a Spring 1977 merger between General Bumble and Morgasm, produced the contest. Paying homage to a trivia giant who led teams to victory over the last six years, General Morgasm proclaimed the trivia fest "The Gene Fals Memorial Contest."

Much to General Morgasm's dismay, most teams rushed off to Sawyer Library to obtain the answer to the first superbonus. The producers of the contest asked participants to list all the prime time TV programs offered by the three major networks in October 1967. Unfortunately, the library was still open, so trivia players ravenged the Microfilmed New York Times TV pages from that month.

Many teams used the same approach on the second hour bonus, which demanded the prices for a series of McDonald's food items. Although General Morgasm waited until the McDonald's in North Adams was closed to announce the bonus, the team didn't realize that the building's interior lights would be on all night. A Buda Bear who drove over to check the price list remarked that Williams students were swarming all over Big Mac's. They were soon joined by a North Adams policeman.

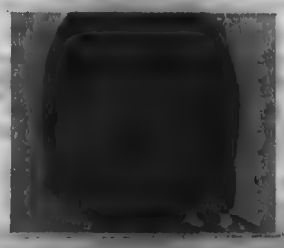
VOL. 91, NO. 24 WILLIAMS COLLEGE JANUARY 6, 1978

Faculty opposes sexual orientation clause

After a two-hour debate on the question of "sexual orientation" and the role Williams should play in the support of gay rights, the faculty voted to reject a College Council proposal in favor of President Chandler's neutral stand. The Steering Committee motion passed 93-12, and the CC amendment which would have added the words "sexual orientation" to the anti-discrimination statement in the catalog, failed 68-40.



In his opening Chandler blasted the "deplorable incident" in the library, in which six sophomore men dropped a sparsely clad life-size female doll down the steps into the reserve room, and noted that this had resulted in "disciplinary action against the students."

He went on to say that the College would act against other unacceptable practices, such as exhibitionism and "Peeping Toms", but that this would be impossible if the College adopted the position advocated in the CC proposal. Furthermore, he noted that no other academic institutions or corporations had officially adopted anti-"sexual orientation" discrimination policies. Williams, he said, had called officers from Harvard, Cornell, UCLA, NYU, CBS and Avon, and that none had officially done so.

Steering Committee member Earl McFarland rose and read the Committee's motion.

The Faculty of Williams College supports the affirmation of the rights of all members of the College community regardless of race, sex or sexual orientation contained in President Chandler's letter of December 3, 1977 to the President of the College Council.

Assistant professor Raymond Baker offered the CC proposal as an amendment to the main motion. He urged that the College incorporate the statement into the catalog.

"The amendment is offered in response to the students' need."
BAKER

"Let's respond through our daily actions. A catalog statement won't affect that."
MARCUS

The first series of arguments revolved around the term "sexual orientation." Opponents of the amendment argued that this might include a wide range of meanings, including some that the College might not wish to condone. Proponents countered that the intent was not to encourage specific actions, but was designed rather to counter a specific mindset and to promote toleration for differences among people.

Assistant Professor William Moomaw asked the faculty to take a broader perspective. More students, he said, seem to be troubled with heterosexual problems than with homosexual ones, so "Why single out only the problem of homosexuality?" he asked. He urged that the focus be upon accepting all students who differ from the majority. Moomaw further suggested that Williams had no need of an anti-discrimination statement because if the College did discriminate there would be no homosexuals on campus.

Several faculty members worried about whether the College should take any position at all. This is, they argued a political issue rather than one which affects the day to day operation of the school. It is imperative, they argued, that each person make up his own mind, but the College need not, and indeed should not align itself on the question. President Chandler compared it to the faculty taking a stand on the Viet Nam War, J. P. Stevens, or Cesar Chavez and the United Farm Workers.

"Why single out only problems of homosexuality? Why not all students who differ ...?"
MOOMAW

"If we want a statement, let's do it before Princeton."
FROST

Extending the legal argument, Associate Professor Gary Jacobson observed that the courts have attached no legal meaning to "sexual orientation". Including that phrase in a legally binding document takes the power of assigning a specific meaning away from the College and places it in the hands of the judiciary. In a lawsuit the College would have to accept the terms as defined by the court, as opposed to taking the intent of the original proposal.

Assistant Professor Charles Sloane and Associate Professor Jay Pasachoff both agree on the need to make a strong statement but did not feel that the faculty had discussed the issue as fully as they might. They each suggested that the faculty should wait and make a decision after completing a longer debate. Associate Professor Peter Frost appealed to many, however, when he counter argued that "if we want a statement, let's do it before Princeton."

Director of Admissions Philip Smith worried that "less enlightened" people might misinterpret the College's intentions and that this might affect the number of applicants in the future. Several people wondered what the alumni response would be to such a motion. An equal number of those present asserted that the alums would either greet this positively, or that they [illegible] the school despite anything the faculty might do.

In an attempt to postpone the decision one faculty member asked if a quorum was present. President Chandler riposted that since the faculty had established no bylaws, that it had no quorum, and called for the vote. The amendment failed. A small number of faculty members expressed the concern that if the term "sexual orientation" was undesirable in the amendment, it was equally poor in the original motion, but they went largely unheeded, and the motion carried 93-12.

Deans' panel hits conformity

Institutionalized conformity became the issue at an open panel discussion, "Making Diversity Work," held by the deans Wednesday night as a continuation of the debate on issues and attitudes begun last semester.

Dean Peter Berek was moderator at the meeting, where an audience of more than 100 students and faculty addressed questions and comments to Dean Nancy McIntire, Ben Blakney '78, Tom Herwitz '78, Lisa Capaldini '78, President John Chandler and professors Eva Grudin and Gordon Winston.

The discussion was part of a series that Berek hopes will continue in houses and entries under the leadership of house presidents and JAs and drawing faculty associates.

Residential housing at Williams is random, Berek said, and should therefore be diverse. But audience participants countered that housing here attempts to attain diversity by merely juxtaposing people from diverse groups, and so fails to gain the benefits of diversity.

Blakney criticized attempts at Williams to attain diversity as "a process of assimilating diverse groups into a common pattern," instead of promotion the acceptance by the community of diverse groups.

Audience members picked up on this, as individuals criticized the JA system for what they perceived as its tendency to try to help freshmen adapt to Williams by gently pressuring them to conform to group behavior, instead of helping them find a niche in the community.

Majority rule in houses tends also to inhibit diversity, some asserted. The interests of minorities do not win support, resulting in the predominance of beer and mixers in the Williams social environment. Attempts to force diversity through the Committee on Undergraduate Life thus meet resistance.

"Greed for success generates a lot of the problems at this school," Capaldini said. Students come to Williams used to succeeding scholastically, and they tend to subordinate ethical implications of achieving success to that goal.

After the meeting, Berek remarked on an antagonism between administrators and students discontented with administrative inertia and the defeat of the faculty resolution. He said he hopes further meetings will help bridge the gap.

Admissions cuts ED acceptances, offers positions to 146 students

The Admissions Office "decided to be tougher this year" and accepted 146 early decision applicants, 15 less than were accepted last year, according to Admissions Director Philip Smith.

"Last year, we felt pressed, and less flexible in making admissions decisions on the spring applicant pool," explained Smith. "We decided to be tougher and admit only 30 per cent of the freshman class early decision," instead of approximately one third of the class, as the Admissions Office did last year.

Two hundred seventy men and two hundred fifty-nine women applied early decision. The College accepted 73 men and 73 women. This precise parity is coincidental, said Smith, since the Admissions Office does not attempt to balance the totals of men and women admitted.

Very few minority students applied early decision, Smith commented. For instance, 5 black students applied for early acceptance, he said. "Some segments of the applicant pool have generally tended not to apply early decision," explained Smith. He cited minority students, financial aid applicants, and students from more distant parts of the country as examples.

This year for the first time, the Admissions Office rejected in December some of the applicants not receiving early acceptance, instead of automatically placing all applicants denied early admission into the spring applicant pool. Of the 383 applicants denied early acceptance, the Admissions Office deferred decision on 292 until spring, and rejected 91 in December.

"We look for the superior candidate in conferring early acceptance," explained Smith. Applicants accepted early generally show "a really strong academic performance, meaningful involvement in their school or community, and broad scores above 600," he said.

The 600 score is not absolutely necessary for early acceptance, said Smith, but added that "we do emphasize board scores more in the early decision process." Board scores of applicants have been rising since the class of 1979, he added, and the current group of early decision applicants scored higher than previous groups.

On prejudice

At its last meeting the faculty rejected a College Council proposal to amend the anti-discrimination clause in the catalog to read "Williams does not discriminate on the basis of sex, race, creed, color, handicap, national origin, or sexual orientation . . ."

This resolution had several problems. First it attempted to force the College to adopt an official position on the controversial issue of gay rights, and thus dictate what Williams students think, of dangerous abrogation of the free exchange of ideas process needed at a liberal arts college. Secondly, the Council attacked the symptom, prejudice, rather than the problem. Though well intentioned, the CC compounded the situation it attempted to solve.

In his letter to CC President Herwitz, President Chandler observed that prejudice is an expression of "fear, insensitivity and ignorance." Neither condemnation nor resolutions can eradicate prejudice, instead we must strive to eliminate its roots. Let's use education and calm discussion to eliminate the causes of prejudice instead of engaging in the futile attempt to legislate morality.

The CC's attempt to outlaw prejudice, if successful, would have perpetuated it. By banning prejudice, they close the debate. Instead of healthy discussion in which we can dispel fear and ignorance, prejudice will remain hidden and unchallenged.

Condemning those people who hold a particular notion, making them appear evil, is counterproductive. Erecting further barriers between people serves only to make discussion more difficult. Ostracizing particular individuals increases their fear. Since fear contributes to prejudice this tactic further exacerbates the problem.

A cynic might argue that refusing to outlaw prejudice allows it to continue. Such a refusal also, however, permits it to disappear. The responsibility for determining which occurs belongs to all of us, not just to the College Council or the faculty.

Chandler disputed on non-discrimination statement claims

by Ken Bertsch '78

During those hectic final weeks of last semester, students from the Thursday Night Coalition and the Williams Gay Support Organization sought support for addition of the term "sexual orientation" to the college's official nondiscrimination statement.

The response on the part of the College Council and the Faculty was encouraging. The Council passed a resolution endorsing the "sexual orientation" language by a vote of 18-3. At the December 14 faculty meeting, the same motion lost by a vote of 68-40, but only after President Chandler made clear his adamant opposition to the proposal. The support of 40 faculty members in the face of such strenuous opposition is encouraging. Moreover, it was good that the faculty gave the subject a long, serious hearing.

Unfortunately, the response on the part of the Administration has been less laudable. While taking a public posture of helpfulness, they have sought to subvert the gay rights initiative and shroud the issue in a veil of legalisms.

This lack of good faith was exemplified by President Chandler's opening oration at the faculty meeting. The speech contained many points, and much of it sounded like a list of charges against those of us involved in supporting the motion. In charging that we had "consistently misled" the faculty, he sought to translate some honest mistakes on our part (along with some of his own misinformation) into a conspiracy.

I had hoped to gain a copy of the typed transcript of the President's remarks so that a point by point response could be made. I was almost able to gain a copy from the news office. However, I was told that I could not have the transcript. Instead, I was given an edited "press version" of the remarks. I would rather not deal with the sanitized version, which is significantly different from the actual speech.

There has been considerable controversy over the carefulness of the wording of the present non-discrimination statement. Initially, Dean Berek led us to believe that the statement is strictly mandated by law. (He later tried to convince the College Council of the same thing.) It would be dangerous, it was said, to mix other elements into such a tightly-dictated statement.

However, a brief look at statements of other colleges indicates that the statements vary greatly. Williams' three-paragraph statement contrasts with one-sentence statements by schools such as the University of Massachusetts and Middlebury.

Moreover, the nondiscrimination categories vary. The Williams statement includes "sex," "race," "creed," "color," "handicap," and "national origin." Some schools use "religion" instead of "creed" and others, such as Mount Holyoke, include neither category. Boston University adds "age" and "marital or parental status." Tufts includes "ethnic origin." New York University includes "sexual orientation." These statements all apparently meet legal requirements. Nevertheless, the Administration continues to stress the sacrosanct nature of the Williams statement.

Lou Mathis, Public Affairs Administrator of the Office of Civil Rights at H.E.W., has stated that the College's statement already exceeds legal requirements because the word "creed" is not required. President Chandler disputed this in his statement, noting that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as amended forbids discrimination in employment based on religion. Secondly, he cited the Massachusetts Fair Educational Practices Act that forbids discrimination on grounds of religion and creed.

If the College is being so careful, one wonders why creed was used instead of religion even though religion is used in both statutes while creed was used in only one. One also wonders why Colleges such as Mount Holyoke don't include either category.

The answer appears when one realizes how President Chandler is subtly obfuscating the law. While it is true that both cited passages ban discrimination as President Chandler said, they do not require non-discrimination statements in the catalog. The Labor Department regulations that implement Title VII include only one section on "notices to employees" (29 CFR 1601.27). This section includes nothing about a nondiscrimination statement.

Chapter 151C of the Massachusetts General Laws similarly forbids discrimination. If the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination has any regulations stipulating that a statement is required, it is not on file in Hopkins Hall. Since Dean Berek wrote the school's nondiscrimination policy, it is especially interesting that there is no copy on file in the Dean's office.

In fact, the College only started including a nondiscrimination statement in the catalog in response to H.E.W. regulations adopted in 1975 to end sex discrimination in educational institutions receiving federal aid (45CFR 86). These regulations specifically require a college receiving federal money to include prominently a statement of non-discrimination on the basis of sex "in each announcement, bulletin, catalog, or application form which the college makes available to students, employees, and others" (45 CFR 86.9b). More recent regulations on non-discrimination on the basis of handicap require a similar statement (45CFR 84.8b).

One would think that if the College were taking such care to meet the supposed requirements of Title VII (which deals with employment) in catalog statements aimed at admissions applicants, the College would take care to cover all the bases on employment application forms. However, an employment application form picked up from Business Manager Shane Riorden contained no nondiscrimination statement as specifically required in the sex nondiscrimination regulation cited earlier (45 CFR 86.9b).

The regulations require the College not to make "preemployment inquiry as to the marital status of an applicant for employment." The Williams employment application does inquire as to whether the applicant is single, married, or engaged (45 CFR 86.60). These first two regulations have been in effect since July, 1975.

Finally, the College asks that "physical defects or chronic ailments" be listed on the application form, despite a regulation requiring that information on the medical condition of an applicant be "collected and maintained on separate forms" (45 CFR 84.14d).

The Administration has not been as careful in their nondiscrimination policies as they suddenly appeared to be when the gay rights initiative came up. The arguments as to the sanctity of the College's statement seem to be grounded more in legal rationalization rather than legal necessity.

In the next issue I will deal with several other topics raised at the faculty meeting.

Letter-Tauber rebuts

To the editor:

In the Record of December 2, 1977 Chip Buckner '79 raised questions regarding the hiring policies of the Political Science Department that merit a response. The College is an Equal Opportunity-Affirmative Action Employer. This policy, naturally, is binding on every department. Equal opportunity for us means that we provide equality of employment opportunity to all applicants for a staff opening. And though the relevant Federal and State Laws speak in this connection only of barring discrimination based upon sex, national origin, race and creed in the narrow sense of religion, the Political Science Department also remains adamantly "creed-blind" in the wider sense that includes political creeds. Lest we leave ourselves open to undeserved praise by liberals, let me hasten to add that we couldn't be anything but "creed-blind" since, as Chip correctly reported, "the application process (does) not reveal ideological preferences."

A little over a year ago, when Chip and his political friends urged me to hire a "conservative," I was, therefore, able to assure them that any "conservative" political scientist, responding to our job announcement, would receive from us an absolutely fair, because "creed-blind," review of his-her credentials. But what Chip and his friends in the instant and earlier airing of this issue have persistently failed to publicize was my offer to give to interested students the names of well-known and highly respected conservative political scientists in major graduate schools, so that our students could make doubly certain that no potential candidate was being overlooked. I have to report that neither Chip Buckner nor any of his colleagues ever called for that list of names.

The Political Science Department in its faculty and Majors, in its classes and its students, has a place for everyone interested in politics, regardless of ideological preferences. After all, Chip, look at me.

Sincerely yours,
Kurt P. Tauber

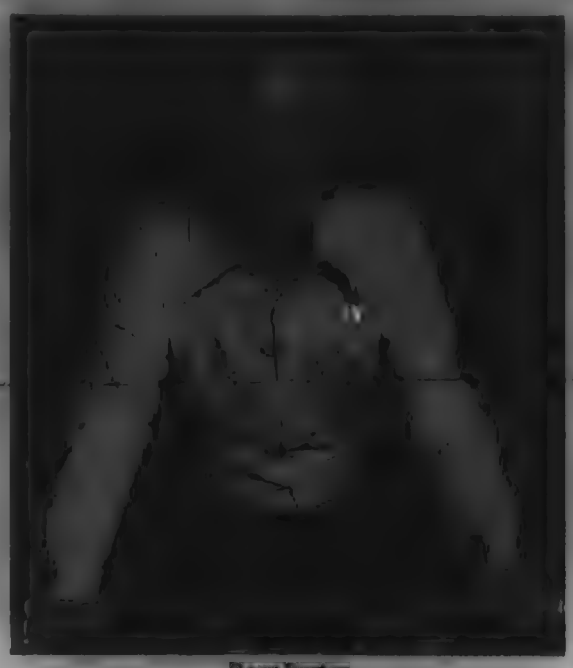
Gary Burton

Jazz giant to play



Jazz giant Gary Burton will appear with his Quartet at Chapin Hall on Monday, January 9, at 8:00 p.m. Tickets for the show are $3.00 for students and $5.00 for all others.

Burton has changed the world's concept of the technical and musical possibilities of the vibes with his four-mallet mastery of the instrument. He has consistently been recognized by polls as the top performer on the vibes and one of the most outstanding talents in contemporary jazz.

The Quartet, formed in 1967, was one of the first groups to combine the sophisticated forms of rock with the improvisational intricacies of jazz. Referring to this jazz-rock fusion, Time said that Burton "made it work beautifully" and New Yorker called it a "miracle."

Gary Burton will be the only jazz artist to appear at Williams this year. In the past, the ACEC has sponsored three jazz concerts during Winter Study, but this year the organization, according to chairman Steve Case, has opted for "quality over quantity."

Tickets will be available at major dining halls on Sunday night, and at Baxter Hall from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. on Monday. If any tickets remain, they will be sold at the door starting at 7:30.

B-ball eager to meet Beavers

by Frank Pergolizzi

The Williams Basketball team resumes season play Friday night in Lasell Gym against Babson College in a 7:30 game.

Babson, for those unfamiliar with the school, is located in Wellesley, Massachusetts, and has a strong athletic program, especially in soccer and basketball. The school is meeting Williams on the court for the first time ever. The Beavers are only 3-3 on the season, but their losses have been at the hands of the top two teams in New England Div. II; Merrimack and Springfield; and the second ranked team in Div. III, Brandeis. Their victories have come against Bentley, Bowdoin, and Bates. For those who think this game will be another Connecticut College yawner—forget it.

The Beavers are led by 6-7 senior center Chris Johnson and 6-4 sophomore forward Jay Nelson. Though hampered by an injury, Johnson leads the Beavers in scoring, averaging 16 points a game. Nelson, a second year player, is averaging 15 points along with 8 rebounds per game, playing the forward spot and filling in for Johnson at center.

Coach Curt Tong will stay with the same lineup that has outscored its opponents 77.25 ppg to 63.75 in four games. Gerry Kelly, with 16 points per game and Matt Spangler with 13 points and 9.5 rebounds per game, have both been named to Div. III ECAC Weekly Honor Rolls. Andy Straka (9.0 ppg), captain Brad Wolk (7.0 points and 8.0 rebounds per game), and Tom Balderston (8.0 ppg) round out the starting five. Junior forward Jim Betti, sidelined for the first part of the season, returns to action and will add depth to the Williams' bench.

The Ephmen were ranked 12th in the December 15th New England Division III poll and could move up several notches with victories in the next few games and full houses both nights could make the difference. A packed and noisy Lasell Gym is nothing short of a snakepit for opposing teams.

Trumpeter to open concert series

WALTER CHESNUT, trumpeter, will open the "Young Artists Concert Series" at Williams College on Tuesday, January 10, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The program will include Suite for Trumpet by Orlando Gibbons, Trumpet Concerto by J. N. Hummel, Haydn's Concerto for Trumpet, and Concert Etude by Alexander Goedicke.

Chesnut is an Associate Professor of Music at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, teaching applied trumpet and directing the University Wind Ensemble, as well as playing in the faculty brass quintet. He has appeared at Williams on several occasions, the most recent of which was for the performance of the Bach B Minor Mass.

He has been a member of seven symphony orchestras and was principal trumpet in the Springfield Symphony Orchestra for six years. He has toured Europe as soloist, conductor, and performer, and was guest soloist with the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler in October, 1975. A virtuoso performer on the entire range of trumpet sizes, Mr. Chesnut will play the C trumpet, the $E^{\flat}$ trumpet, and the $B^{\flat}$ trumpet in his Williamstown concert.

Dorothy Ornest, an Associate Professor in Music at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, will accompany Chesnut on the piano. She holds a degree in voice and piano from the Eastman School of Music and the University of Michigan.

The three Young Artists concerts, sponsored by the Williams Music Department, are free of charge and open to all.

Track hosts quad meet

by Frank Carr

Coach Dick Farley's varsity track team opens the season tomorrow with a quad-meet at Towne Fieldhouse. Hamilton, Fitchburg and Westfield will provide the competition, as the field events start at 1 PM with the running events following at 2:30.

Farley favors the Westfield squad for the team title on the strength of their weightmen and distance runners. Westfield's Healy has thrown 60 feet in the 35 lb. weight and finished third in the hammer throw at the NCAA Div. III Championships last spring, while Kevin Crowley and Jim McGilloway show two-mile bests of 9:05 and 9:20 respectively.

Farley will rely on a strong hurdle and distance crew to counter the three visitors, but the addition of the 440, 880 and two mile relay to the schedule of events (by NCAA proclamation) will definitely hurt the Ephs who are weak in these middle-distance races. Tri-captain Ron White and Vernon Davis should have an easy time going 1-2 in the hurdles, while distancemen Phil Darrow, Dan Sullivan, Tom Schreck, Frank Carr, tri-capt. Joe Kolb and Mike Behrman should pick up a substantial batch of points in the 1000, mile, and 2-mile.

Tri-captain Larry Tanner out-threw Westfield's Healy just three weeks ago at the UVM Invitational and will look for another win tomorrow. Other proven point-getters for the Ephs include Terry O'Reilly and Lee Jackson in the 600.

Concerts highlight musical weekend

Hill holds 100th recital

Victor Hill will present his 100th Griffin Hall Concert on Saturday, January 7, at 8 pm. Hill will play works by Bach and Scarlatti, including the middle third (Preludes and Fugues 9-16) of the Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1. Also, Hill will play twelve sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti, whose works have been called the "the glamor pieces of the repertoire." Admission is free.

Klokken bells ring

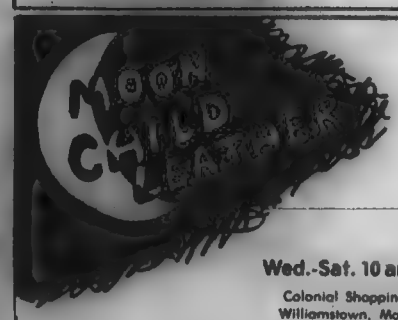
The Klokken Ringers from the New Hackensack Reformed Church in Wappingers Fall, New York, will present a concert in Thompson Memorial Chapel on Sunday, Jan. 8, at 4:00 p.m.

The Klokken Ringers is composed of nine high school students under the direction of Betty Garee. The group will play several familiar works, including Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, as well as pieces composed specifically for handbells. Four ringers will occasionally accompany the others on the flute, clarinet, chimes, and percussion.

The Williams concert is sponsored by the Music Dept. in conjunction with Prof. Douglas Moore's Winter Study class in bell ringing. Admission is free.

Film salutes symphony

"Great Orchestras: The Boston Symphony" will be shown at the Clark Art Institute Sunday, January 8, at 3:00. This acclaimed 55 minute film, produced by Ian Engelman of the BBC, will feature the BSO playing excerpts from works by Brahms, Ives, and Berlioz as well as the Beethoven Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern.



Also included in the film are parts of a Boston Pops concert and a rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Executive Director of the BSO, will introduce the film. Admission is free.

Icemen lose 3-2 heartbreaker; Oswego takes tourney crown

by Tim Layden

It has been written somewhere that a tie is not unlike kissing one's sister. If that is the case then there might well be a group of Williams players who would prefer the company of their female siblings to Saturday's heartbreaking 3-2 overtime loss to Oswego St. in the finals of the Williams Holiday Hockey Tournament.

The Division II invaders from Western New York successfully defended their tourney crown, playing in front of a crowd treated to more than the customary amount of suspense through a scoreless third period by the lack of a functional scoreboard clock. Oswego freshman Al Styckiewicz slapped a bouncing puck past Williams netminder Eddie Weiss at 4:23 of the extra session.

Williams season record drops to 2-3 with the loss with all three of their defeats being one goal decisions.

The team skated through a cautious first period before Williams seldom-used fourth line broke the ice, Sophomore Dave Phalen turned the trick on assists from John Bessoms and Brooks Tanner, knocking a low rebound past the Oswego goalie.

The visitors power play, which tallied both of its regulation time goals needed only 14 seconds on the ice to tie the game at 8:55 of the second stanza.

Williams junior Dan Sullivan countered at 13:54 to give the Ephs their final lead of the night, with an unassisted boomer from the left slot. Preston's power play effort just three minutes later proved the final tally until Styckiewicz' game winner.

Through the scoreless third frame goaltenders Mike Shevlin and Weiss were nothing short of magnificent with the former slapping away Williams attempts in three separate power plays, including screening efforts by Peter Gonye and Jim Dunbeer.

Friday evening Williams defeated University of New Haven 6-5 with junior forward Chris Egizi leading the night with two goals. Captain Jim Norton opened the scoring which later knotted at 2-2. Following a goal Jim Rooney, Egizi tallied, only to have New Haven make it 5-3. Chick Johnson then cut the margin to 5-4. Ten minutes of quiet play elapsed before Gonye and Egizi blanked the NH goalie to ice the Eph's victory.

Winter sports teams head into extensive weekend action

Ski teams

With a nice blanket of snow beneath them, the ski teams zips off to New Hampshire this weekend for their first action of the upcoming season.

The women's squad, under the direction of new coach Judith Zimicki, should do well in the alpine events largely as a result of the skill of All-American Marty Epstein. Returning veterans Corrie Johnson and Ashley Smith should be right behind Epstein along with frosh Julia Ernst and Kathy Lane.

Nordic expert Rachel Potter and sophomore Cathy Allen, coming off an injury last year, hope to bring top scores from this weekend's events at Middlebury, while the Alpine division competes at the Regional FIS in Mt. Cranmore, NH.

The men's contingent also looks strong in the alpine events, according to coach Bud Fisher. Captain Chris Welch and juniors Andy Mikell, Don Tarinelli, and Joe Dembrinki are among the alpine talents returning from the NCAA competition last year. Jumpers Tomm Dodds and Andy Kelly along with newcomer Jeff Hastings comprise the strongest jumping division in recent years. Nordic captain Jeff Magoon leads an inexperienced cross country group.

Men's swimming

Coach Carl Samuelson's core of excellent swimmers returns to Muir Pool tomorrow at 2 to dunk Hamilton College and extend the team's season record to 3-0.

Captain Stuart Deans and seniors Guy Hoelzer, Phil Wild, Paul Vom Eigen, and junior Don Cameron look stronger than ever as top contenders in individual events and were key factors in the team's exciting victory over UConn on Dec. 7. Hoelzer will take on the butterfly responsibilities along with soph Todd Piper while Wild, New England's 100 Freestyle will occupy himself with the freestyle sprints. Sophomore sprinter Tom Beckett is also back along with junior Brian McDermott and a much improved Brian Volpe. Soph All-American Dave Amlicke joins Cameron in the backstroke while Deans looks to clean up in the distance events for the strong team.

Wrestling

Williams' wrestlers open round two of their season tomorrow as they grapple with Coast Guard at 2 in Lasell. Looking to improve last year's dismal 1-11 record, captain Hal Zendle (126) leads a stronger team into a season highlighted by five home matches.

Returning lettermen Joe Carrese (118) and Mark Walsh (150) should perform consistently for the squad as their experience makes them tough contenders. Newcomers Tim Williams (118), John Turi (126), Scott Frost (142), and Steve Cox (134) bolster the team's lightweight hopes coming off excellent starts in the team's fall competition. Steve Cox (132) looks strong with one pin against a Plymouth State opponent already under his belt. Middleweights John Fasano (158) and Brian Plitt, who leaves the squash courts this season, should grab some points as the team takes on highly conditioned Coast Guard.

The heavyweights pose the only question for Williams with the 177 spot still open. Charlie Davis (190) makes his comeback after two seasons while former high school wrestler Jim Stuart takes on the heavyweight responsibility.

Women's B-ball

With a Little Three Championship up for grabs for the first time ever women's basketball coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin and a core of returning veterans are confident as they head into an expanded schedule next Wednesday.

Five healthy letterwomen join forces with nine freshmen as the team looks to improve last year's 8-5 record. Leading scorers co-captain Maggie O'Brien (13 pts.) and sophomore Monica Grady (12 pts.) are back to spark the Ephs' offense. Senior Anne Youngling, at full strength, will be grabbing the rebounds while another steady senior Lisa Capaldini (8 pts.) returns for what should be a good year. Junior Leslie Milne is back for another season of play-breaking and excellent defensive performances.

Racketmen to face ranking teams

by Evan Bash

The last time a Williams' team had a legitimate shot at a national championship must have been back around the time Benny Boynton was roaming over the gridiron for the Purple early in this century. So what's with the men's squash team, fourth ranked in the country last season and possessing both the talent and opportunity to go all the way to the top this year?

In their only match of the season to date, the Ephs showcased their talent with a 7-2 thrashing of Navy. Coach Sean Sloane's squad get another opportunity in the next five days when they face both Princeton and Harvard, the nations' numbers one and two teams last year. The Princeton match was played away this afternoon; Harvard travels to Williamstown on Tuesday at 4:00 p.m.

Although Williams has won only one of the last thirty encounters with both Princeton and Harvard, the racketmen have already shown that past failures do not faze them. The victory over the Middies was only the second for an Eph team in twenty-three years.

Against Harvard and Princeton, Williams will be counting not only on talent and depth, but also the ability to handle the pressure, one which comes with experience in well over two years of varsity play per man. Captain Arnie Cogswell, Chip Lindquist, Martin Goldberg and Mitch Reiss will be facing some of the best players in North America, while Jim Parsons, Jon Saunders, Jim Little, Peter Thayer and Evan Bash all need big days if the Ephs are to pull off the upsets.

The Williams Record

VOL. 91, NO. 25 WILLIAMS COLLEGE JANUARY 13, 1978

3 receive tenure recommendation

by David MacGregor

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions has recommended that the Board of Trustees grant tenure to three assistant professors and deny it to two others.

Raymond Baker, Zirka Filipczak, and Charles Karelis '66 received favorable recommendations, and Thomas Koppenheffer and Joanne Rosinski received unfavorable recommendations from the CAP. This information was confirmed by the Record. The list is not complete.

The Board of Trustees will vote on these recommendations on January 28. Tenure is not official until the trustees have voted, and they have the authority to reverse a CAP recommendation. In practice, however, the trustees virtually never reverse such a recommendation.

According to several trustees, their role is to supervise the decision-making process and to intervene only if the tenure decision process itself is unsatisfactory. The board "would face a rebellion of the faculty" if they attempted to intervene in an individual case, said one trustee. The faculty is far better qualified to make individual decisions than the trustees, he added.

The CAP makes tenure recommendations annually based on recommendations by individual departments, plus any additional information that CAP decides is necessary. A CAP reversal of a departmental recommendation "is unusual, but it happens," said Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley.

The CAP consists of one tenured professor from each division, the provost, the dean of the faculty, and the president. Faculty may appeal decisions to the Steering Committee, which is composed of one tenured and one non-tenured faculty member from each division.

The departments and the CAP weigh three factors in making recommendations, explained Oakley. These are teaching ability, scholarly development, and involvement in the College community.

Of these, "the greatest emphasis is on effective teaching," said Oakley. Closely related to this is scholarly development, he added.

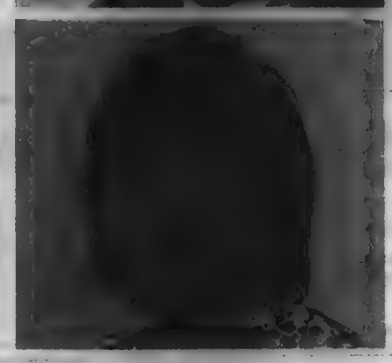
College policy requires that each department's report on a faculty member include an evaluation of student opinion of his teaching effectiveness. This may take the form of a quantitative questionnaire, interviews with students, non-quantitative student evaluations, unsolicited student comments, or any combination of these methods.

Most departments use a combination of student surveys and interviews by senior department faculty with student majors and non-majors. Some also contact recent alumni, he added.

There is "some uneasiness" among faculty about purely quantitative surveys, but their value as one source of student opinion is accepted by most faculty, said Oakley. Use of student interviews is on the increase, he noted.

The faculty voted two years ago that no department may require faculty to use a course questionnaire. That resolution did not affect the College policy requiring some form of student opinion, however.

Scholarly development is clearly "linked with the maintenance at Williams of a high quality and intellectually active faculty," explained Oakley. This is inextricably related to teaching effectiveness, he added.



In assessing scholarly development, the CAP relies primarily on close readings of an individual professor's research by colleagues knowledgeable in the field and on observation of his performance in colloquia, paper readings, and other scholarly efforts, said Oakley.

This assessment looks especially at the individual's intellectual capacity and ability to "follow through" a given project, he explained. Building a reputation for Williams as a research institution "is not a goal," according to Oakley.

The CAP has not consciously ignored student evaluation of scholarly development, said Oakley; students have rarely offered such evaluations. He noted, however, that students would not be as qualified as faculty to judge scholarly development, especially in the more sophisticated fields. He emphasized that a widespread student opinion that a professor did not know his field would be "very worrisome," and would prompt a careful study of both his scholarship and his ability to convey his knowledge to students.

Assistant Professors Raymond Baker, Zirka Filipczak, and Charles Karelis '66 received favorable tenure recommendations from the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. The Board of Trustees will ratify these appointments at its January meeting.

Trustees return to discuss tuition, tenure and co-op housing issues

The trustees of Williams College will return to campus Jan. 26 for two days of discussion and votes on tuition increases for next year, a coop housing proposal and tenure recommendations.

A meeting of the trustees' Committee on Campus Life with Gargoyle Society follows guest meals on the first night. Gargoyle members hope to discuss gay rights statements and indirect investment in South Africa with the trustees.

According to Thomas Dewey, treasurer of the College, a meeting on the following day of members of budget and finance committees will be held to examine the need for a tuition increase next year, and to discuss how large an increase to assess if one is needed.

The trustees also will examine the tenure recommendations of the College's Committee on Academic Policy. Ratification of the decisions—three faculty members have so far been approved and three rejected—is expected.

The student-faculty Committee on Undergraduate Life will present its revised proposal on coop housing over the weekend. The proposal has been changed to allow present sophomores to apply for the program with seniors. If the proposal is approved, committee members will begin organizing application procedures shortly.

Dewey added that he will be working with the trustees over the weekend in drawing up next year's budget, discussing other aspects of funding and endowment besides tuition.

The trustees will again look at ways to cut energy expenses this January, as cold weather continues to eat into the heating budget. They will meet with representatives from Buildings and Grounds Jan. 27.

Meetings with President Chandler, the deans, and the faculty fill out the trustees' schedule.

Free University collects talent

Elements from the Williamstown culture, counterculture, underground and underworld gathered in Williams classrooms this week to kick off Free University '78, the fruit of the organized mayhem of last week's sign-up in Greylock dining hall.

Organized by Sue Shellenberger '78 and Jim Coben '79, Free University this year brings together instructors from the college and Berkshire community to teach 51 courses ranging from religion to roadtripping, country dancing to prison reform.

Of the 500 students at the meeting, 328 enrolled in a jitterbugging course led by Cam Ferrante '78 and Bob Berry '79. Such interest led the instructors to split the class into two sections. Ballroom dancing drew nearly 150 applicants, and many were turned away. Other dance courses—the hustle and tap and folk dance—were also popular, Shellenberger said.

Crafts courses drew well. Camera buffs flocked to a $35 course in 35 mm work, and dozens signed up for cooking classes, from vegetarian to food service experimentation. Knitting, sewing, dying and paper folding brought various responses.

Tobacco chewing and massage courses offer relaxing alternatives to busy January social life. But despite shifting attitudes toward social life among some students, two courses in the Williams traditions of mixology and roadtripping attracted traditional strong responses.

"We have a great time," gushed Chip Buckner '79, instructor in mixology. Of 140 people who originally signed up for the course, 70 eventually showed up, divided into two sections. "Nobody leaves until all the alcohol is gone," Buckner added, saying everyone drinks two to five cocktails three nights a week.

Roadtrippers met Sunday to discuss their Wednesday trip to Skidmore. Instructors discussed their impressions of roadtripping experiences at different colleges and explained the nature of roadtripping. "We're going there partying," explained Jeff Delisle '78, "not to pick up girls."

A third of the campus should be running, climbing, hiking, swimming, juggling, birding and freezing if enrollment in sports and outdoor courses holds through the month. Ken Leghorn's thesis experiment in cold tolerance caught more than two dozen students who volunteered to spend an hour shivering in a 50 degree F. chamber in Bronfman. Bicycle maintenance was oversubscribed.

More cerebral courses in religion, prison reform, native American studies, space possibilities, contraception and sexuality and sign language brought together students hoping to move beyond the wild realm of the Purple Valley during January.

Despite expected attrition as scheduling conflicts arose, response during the first week has been good. "We were really pleased with the enthusiasm," Shellenberger said. "No courses were forced to cancel because of lack of interest."

Council to reconvene after 7 committees meet

College Council reconvenes Wednesday to regroup and review following a week's recess when members broke into seven committees to examine campus issues and problems.

After last week's meeting, postponed because of conflicts and attended by only 15 members, representatives scattered to study groups and council and student-faculty committees.

The five-member Freshman Life Committee, coordinated by Sue Galli '78, scheduled an open meeting for month's end to discuss ways of strengthening or altering Freshman Days, the JA system, the entry system, freshman social life and faculty advisers.

The Elections Committee plans an effort to increase involvement in Council committees and activities. The group, headed by council vice-president Peter Friesen '78, hopes to explain to students the procedures for election and selection to committees and press for changes.

The Student-faculty Departmental Committee has made its preliminary report to the Council and plans to continue work on increasing student input into academic departments in the areas of curriculum change and tenure decisions.

Over winter recess the Admissions Committee began a program of involving students in high school recruitment. More than 40 students participated in the program, offering information and peer impressions on life at Williams. The committee plans to expand the initial project next fall to high schools other than the alma maters of present students.

The Finance Committee met Sunday to discuss ways of improving guidelines for financing student organizations. It plans an open meeting this spring to examine this and look into alternatives to raising the student activities tax.

Don Perry '79 has been selected as new head of Williams Health, Education and Welfare, according to the Elections Committee. Perry will be in charge of organizing and coordinating all-college events for Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend.

The Social Coordinating Committee is extending its efforts to develop closer contact between houses in developing social events. Friesen said committee members Doug Greeff '78 and Steve Davidson '80 hope to get houses together to avoid conflicts, and increase the number and variety of parties held on campus.

Friesen attributed low attendance at last week's meeting to conflicting interests and said that an organized effort had been made to get council members to attend. But several new house representatives said they had not been contacted beforehand and did not know of the council's new Privacy-purposeful or perverse?

In two weeks, the trustees will ratify the tenure recommendations of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. Until then those committee recommendations will be kept officially secret. Individual faculty will be discouraged both by tradition and administration preference from announcing their own favorable or unfavorable decisions. As a result, students will have no certain knowledge of their professors' fates until untenured Faculty depart and tenured faculty are officially promoted a year and a half after the decision.

This secrecy is defended by the claims that CAP recommendations are not final decisions, that tenure decisions do not directly concern students, that faculty privacy must be preserved, and that it is "in bad taste" to announce tenure decisions. These arguments are at best dubious and at worst farcical.

The argument that CAP recommendations should not be announced because they are not decisions makes no sense. Several trustees have repeatedly described their role as one of overseeing the tenure process as a whole, not reversing individual CAP recommendations.

Despite claims to the contrary, students are affected significantly by tenure decisions. It is the students who will take courses from a poor professor who is tenured and will miss the learning experience of a good one who is denied it. They have a right to know with whom they will have to deal in the future.

Any attempt to preserve the privacy of tenure decisions is futile. Such decisions inevitably leak out, whether they are announced or not. Official secrecy only slows the spread of information and promotes rumor and uncertainty.

It is also interesting to note that, while the privacy of the tenure decision is carefully guarded, a group of students before the Discipline Committee were "strongly encouraged" to write and sign a letter of apology for their misdeed, despite the "privacy" of disciplinary proceedings.

It is time that students be informed adequately and promptly of decisions that affect their education. Since the facts inevitably come out, albeit slowly and unreliably, announcement of tenure decisions when made would sacrifice little real privacy, and would make the ideas of honesty and openness less of a joke. Students react to faculty decision, editorial

Coffey

To the editor:

It was with feelings of great anger and frustration that I listened to President Chandler's speech at the December 14th faculty meeting. In a 20-minute admonition to the faculty, Mr. Chandler denounced in the strongest terms the proposed amendment to the non-discrimination policy of the College.

Using arguments that were often incorrect as well as improper, and allowing the four students present virtually no opportunity to respond to his charges, Mr. Chandler unjustly presented the efforts of WGSO and other groups as part of a conspiracy to misinform and misdirect the faculty. In fact, as a matter of courtesy and in order to avoid misunderstandings, WGSO has long been in fairly close contact with members of the administration and with a number of professors.

Unfortunately, the administration did not accord us the same consideration. . . No administration member ever contacted us (as we had requested them to do) for clarification of apparent confusions in the statement we distributed to all faculty members—clarification which a simple phone call would have provided. Instead, the Administration, at the faculty meeting itself, presented its objections to the proposed amendment as an angry and unjust denunciation of the activities and intentions of WGSO and other involved student groups.

I would like to emphasize, again, that it has never been the intention of WGSO to mislead any member or body of the college community. Rather, it has always been our view that an accurate understanding of both the costs and benefits involved in this issue would insure the adoption of the amendment. Mr. Chandler himself perhaps feared that a clarification of the issues would decrease support for the position of the Administration—it was he who, at the faculty meeting, succeeded in obscuring important issues in a tangle of leaglisms and in misleading the faculty on many other points.

Many arguments presented at the faculty meeting require response. I will leave a detailed discussion to Ken Bertsch; however, in all fairness, both to Williams students and to the National Gay Task Force, I would like to reply to one of Mr. Chandler's more preposterous allegations. The President argued rather heatedly that WGSO and other concerned student groups have been manipulated and exploited to dangerous ends by the National Gay Task Force. This charge, totally untrue, was perhaps construed from the fact that we obtained initial information regarding several college and corporate non-discrimination policies through NGTF, and from the coincidental fact that Dr. Bruce Voeller of NGTF lectured here in November. During Dr. Voeller's visit we never, so far as I recall, discussed the question of the proposed amendment, nor have we had any contact with NGTF since that time.

Finally, despite the considerable pressure exerted to insure the defeat of the amendment, 40 faculty members expressed their disagreement with the Administration. This is indeed encouraging. As both the faculty and students now realize, the moral victory was ours. Susan Coffey, '78

To the editor:

I was elated by the moral victory won at the December 14 Faculty meeting. Forty Faculty members voted to include sexual orientation in the College's nondiscrimination policy. Considering the circumstances under which the Faculty dealt with the issue, the vote was a remarkable and commendable show of support for human rights.

One impediment to an outright victory was that the administration virtually ran the "Faculty" meeting. President Chandler chaired it and administrators were stationed strategically around the room. I don't know how many other college faculties countenance this violation of their academic freedom. At the University of California, where my father teaches, the notion of the administration running faculty meetings would be anathema—a violation of the fundamental separation of powers among Regents, faculty and administration.

President Chandler's opening salvo thus put enormous pressure on the Faculty to reject Professor Baker's courageously offered proposal. Chandler's hostile barrage was laced with inaccuracies and conspicuous for its omissions. It characterized the manner in which the administration has approached the gay-rights initiative from the beginning. Had Chandler spent some time consulting with students about the amendment, and less time calling around the continent in a desperate and largely futile attempt to find petty flaws in the argument for "sexual orientation," he might have found himself in a stronger position. Or at least a respectable one.

Much of the debate itself centered on allegations that the term "sexual orientation" was unclear. Professor Barnett read a list of sexual deviations that would have to be suffered should Williams modify its nondiscrimination policy. I am convinced that while some professors may have been sincere in their concern over this issue, it was used largely to disguise the fact that the true debate was over a moral, not legal, issue. If the wording were objectionably vague, it would be easy to define it elsewhere for legal purposes. Any lawyer could do it in ten minutes. That this was not the real concern of most of those voting against the motion was made manifest by their subsequent endorsement of President Chandler's own statement, which referred to "sexual orientation." Apparently the President's statement was completely innocuous, while an official College statement would invite "bestiality," "necrophilia" and "group sex on the front lawn."

Perhaps I am being unfairly harsh. To prove me so, I hope that one of those apostles of enlightened liberalism who claim they "regrettably" could not vote for the amendment due to its vagueness will reintroduce it at the next Faculty meeting. Apparently "sexual orientation" was a safe bet with New York City's lawyers, since Mayor Koch used that language in stating New York's new nondiscrimination policy.

If the same distinguished interpreters of our nation's Constitution had spent one-fifth the time looking for a way to incorporate the offending clause as they did rationalizing against it, the McClelland Press would soon be resetting type for next year's modified catalogue statement. The reasons for their failure to do this are known but to them. Nobody openly contravenes that Williams would be a better place for this change.

Despite the failure of a few to engage in the moral leadership demanded by their positions, the 40-68 vote was highly encouraging—reminiscent of Eugene McCarthy's 42 per cent return in the 1968 New Hampshire primary. I am confident that a future Faculty, less confused by trivial legal arguments and allowed to meet as an independent body, will accord "sexual orientation" its proper place in the Williams College catalogue. That is, if the Trustees do not preempt the Faculty of that honor first.

Shorb

To the editor:

The recommendation of the Jan. 6 editorial that we strive to eliminate the causes of prejudice ("fear, insensitivity, and ignorance") is an inspiring one. I agree that education and calm discussion can help, and look forward to Mr. Buckner's leadership in this area. Endorsement of the proposed clause by the faculty would have been part of that educational process.

In fact, the only effect on students would have been education by example, since the clause would not affect the rights of students to think, speak out, and act as they please (within the limits of "good conduct" as described in the Student Handbook.) Only discriminatory acts by the College would have been prohibited.

Thus, the writer's statements that the proposal would "dictate what Williams students think," "legislate morality" and so on are false and misleading. Are these things even possible?

The editorial complained that the proposed clause "Condemn(s) those people who hold a particular notion." The statement of course condemns no one explicitly; condemnation is not its purpose. But if the price of protecting the rights of any historically oppressed group is some discomfort to the sensitive imaginations of those who feel they are being implicitly criticized, then that is the price we must pay. Would Mr. Buckner have opposed the 15th Amendment as condemning racists and inhibiting debate?

Advocating an attack on the roots of prejudice but not on immediate discriminatory actions is a front for inaction and tacit acceptance of the status quo. "Permit it to disappear" is Mr. Buckner's cure for prejudice and discrimination. But it is only willful human action that changes the world, not the ticking away of time.

To the editor:

In the past few months I have personally encountered a few students who have assaulted me verbally as I walked near them. These persons would make comments about me and the Williams Women Organization (now the Williams Feminist Alliance) of which I am one of the coordinators. I assume their hostility came to the surface in light of the recent publicity about sexism at Williams. Normally I would not bother to make these painful incidents public, but after your editorial of Jan. 6 called "On Prejudice" and after all the talk about how diversity can work at Williams, I can not resist.

The Record editorial urges us to "use education and calm discussion to eliminate the causes of prejudice instead of engaging in the futile attempts to legislate morality". Your editorial somehow suggests that legislation is not needed to eradicate prejudice because the environment itself has the capacity to discourage fear, insensitivity, and ignorance to "permit (prejudice) to disappear". I disagree. After my experiences I have little faith that some students at Williams have the capacity to tolerate individuals whose political beliefs may differ from their own. Responding solely by personal action does little good when one is insulted when she takes a stand. In order for education or discussion to influence people's behavior, a supportive environment must first be created for the persons who do take risks in attempting to communicate their beliefs.

If some students here are unable to deal with others as individuals instead of stereotypes, how can a supportive environment ever be created? Sometimes deliberate policy such as proposed in the recent College Council resolution on sexism and homophobia, must be made in order to publicly recognize and articulate conflict so that when individuals act they do not feel alone. Policy, even in the form of words, can stimulate a supportive environment so that persons will then be compelled to discourage prejudice in their personal lives. Everything does not "just work out", especially when there are pockets of students who are hostile to diverse opinions. Silence, indifference, and lack of action by both students and administrators makes one an accomplice to the status quo.

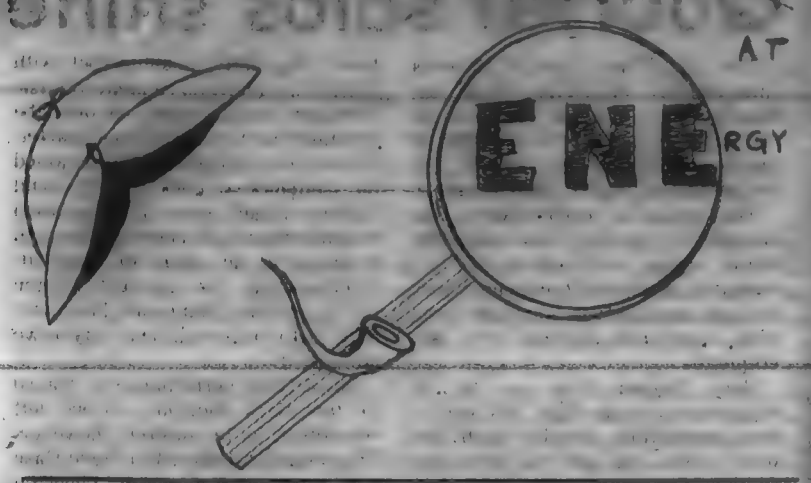
To the editor:

Your editorial concerning the faculty's rejection of the gay rights amendment to the college's non-discrimination policy ("On Prejudice") was based on not acknowledging the critical distinction between a neutral statement of non-discrimination and an affirmative statement of approbation.



The editorial argued that the college's taking "an official position" on the issue of gay rights would preclude reasoned debate on this important issue of human rights. This would be true had the content of the amendment been something to the effect of "Williams College unequivocably supports the gay rights movement and thus will not tolerate any alternative viewpoints on this issue on the part of its faculty, staff, or students."

Instead the amendment is actually an affirmation of the institutional neutrality that is absolutely essential for the "healthy discussion" that your editorial so strongly advocates. A statement of non-discrimination is merely what it purports to be—a refusal to discriminate either for or against a group of individuals. If an institution proclaims to its members that it feels a responsibility to remain neutral on an issue, it can hardly be concluded that the institution is "legislating morality" or dictating a specific position to its members.

Perhaps the confusion of a statement of non-discrimination with a statement of approbation stems from falsely equating the refusal to discriminate against those who have traditionally been discriminated against with actually approving of or fostering the activities of that group of individuals.

In an ideal world we would not need any guarantees of neutrality. Indeed, because at the moment at least, redheads, orange juice drinkers, and ice skaters are not discriminated against, there is no need to confirm that they are not and will not be discriminated against. On the other hand, homosexuals have been and will continue to be discriminated against by many individuals and institutions. In awareness of and in response to the pervasive nexus of attitudinal and institutional discriminatory practices that are generally lodged against gay individuals, it is the responsibility of any institution concerned with upholding neutrality to forthrightly state its unswerving dedication to enlightened indifference.

To put it bluntly, those who support the amendment merely ask the college to state that "Williams College doesn't care whether a person is gay" and thus to confirm that it does very much care about maintaining an environment in which individuals may freely arrive at self-determined moral positions. Chairman elucidates energy facts

Sherlock Holmes observed, in response to Watson's complaint that his deductions were obvious, "The world is full of obvious things which no one ever bothers to observe." As the new chairman of the College's Energy Conservation Committee, I've got to take under my wing (tra, la) a collection of obvious things which few of us want to be bothered to observe. Through the good offices of the Record, I have permission to produce (with luck) some obvious remarks about energy use on the campus, a chance for the English Department to practice their literary criticism on a colleague across the street, and one cold hard (block that metaphor) fact [illegible] thoughts. This consciousness-raising effort (my consciousness has been raised so high that some mornings I can barely reach it) is really only a drop in the budget, but we have to start somewhere.

Most of the facts are courtesy of Professor C. Fuqua, the retiring chairman (he's not all that retiring) of the committee, whose herculean efforts and extensive reports were hindered only by his difficulty in finding a calculator which displays its results in Roman numerals. This week you get two facts for the price of one. Until I became chairman of the committee, I didn't even know who was on it. So, Fact One: Those involved since last fall are Henry Art (Environmental Studies), Malinda Bergamini ('80), Thomas Black ('80), Lee Drickamer (Biology), John Holden (B&G), Ross Keller—secretary—(Food Service), and Charles Fuque (retired); plus, starting now, Edwina Cruise (Russian) and myself (Math). We are all receptive to suggestions, complaints, observations, help, or long-term appointments in Washington. Please do not call if your radiator is not working (or overworking). But general observations and notes about too many lights on, too few drapes pulled, clandestine electric heaters, too much hot air in lectures (well, I guess we'd better skip that one), or any of your own pet concerns and ideas can be relayed through your friendly neighborhood committee member. It's not quite clear what we can do about some of these things, since the committee's mandate is more specific than its powers, but we can at least be a focus [illegible]

The question "Is one less light bulb worth the effort?" will be the subject of a later column. At the moment we are just getting this phase of the committee's work off the pad. Whether it will become a successful launch or simply a flight of fancy remains to be seen. Given an appropriate response (or even not given an appropriate response) to this Madison Avenue aspect of the committee's duties, we look to have a general open meeting on energy toward the end of the month. Those of you (like me) who find open meetings a drag can stay home. Those of you (also like me) who feel that "Darken the corner where you are," is a minimal kind of response to continuing energy problems should at least come and heckle the chairman.

Now, as promised, Fact Two: The College's energy costs in 1976-77 were, as near as makes no difference, $700,000 in an $18 million budget. I can get as tricky with statistics as the next person (even more tricky), but this fact has a simple English translation: In terms of tuition income, about one student in ten is going up the stack at the heating plant. While there may be some students I would like to see assigned just such a fate, it surely would be a better use of resources to have them built into a new building or even (you should excuse the expression) served up in the dining halls. See you in the stack.

Viewpoint II

Bertsch rebuts Chandler

by Ken Bertsch '78

In the last issue of the Record, I cited the Administration's capricious use of the law to demonstrate its lack of good faith in dealing with student supporters of the "sexual orientation" clause. In this article, I will deal briefly with several other issues raised by President Chandler at the faculty meeting.

The President questioned the use of the term "sexual orientation". In support of the President's doubts, Prof. Barnett provided a laundry list of deviant activity that might be sanctioned at Williams should the motion be adopted. A simple solution would be to define the term. The Berkeley, California non-discrimination law defines sexual orientation "as the choice of sexual partner according to gender."

"Sexual orientation" and "sexual preference" are the terms used in civic and corporate non-discrimination policies. Orientation is a better word because it does not involve a judgment as to how the predilection was arrived at. Most recently, Mayor Koch of New York used "sexual orientation" in stating the nondiscrimination policy that he intends to implement.

President Chandler wonders if "sexual orientation" refers to behavior. It doesn't. Orientation refers to condition, not action. It seems unlikely that judges will redefine the word after centuries of use just to allow deviant behavior at Williams.

The President charged that no other academic institution or corporation has adopted a policy similar to that being proposed at the faculty meeting. That is not true. The President specifically contended that New York University had no such policy. That was shown to be untrue at the faculty meeting when Tom Herwitz pulled out his copy of the current NYU Law School Bulletin, which does indeed contain a nondiscrimination statement complete with the "sexual orientation" reference.

While we may have misread a letter from the Avon Products company, American Telephone and Telegraph is quite explicit. According to Chairman of the Board John deButts, the company has a "publicly enunciated policy barring discrimination against homosexuals in hiring and employment."

I should emphasize that the proponents of the sexual orientation clause have also made errors in this regard, and the President's misstatements may not have been intentional.

However, the President cannot escape responsibility for his use of a classic Nixonian tactic in strongly suggesting that the National Gay Task Force was behind the student initiative. Surprising as it may seem, the fact is that students at Williams were intelligent enough to think this up all on their own, without the leadership of outside agitators. The NGTF has on request provided only lists of colleges, cities and corporations that have some sort of nondiscrimination stand on sexual orientation.

The President fears that we will align ourselves with a national political movement if we agree as a matter of policy not to discriminate. That is true to the same degree as would have been true if we had accepted and promoted the application of Blacks and Jews before it became widely acceptable to do so. Are outside political conditions a reason to alter our dedication toward creating a humane community within the College?

It is unfortunate that the Administration has forced the debate into an argument over legalisms. What is really at stake here is a moral issue. Traditional societal attitudes toward homosexuals have brought an enormous emotional cost, both in society as a whole and within the College. It is time not only for individuals but also for institutions, which do so much to set the context for individual action, to move in a forthright manner to create an atmosphere of tolerance and respect for human dignity. It is also time for the Administration of this College to deal in good faith with students bearing serious policy initiatives.

Students interested in The Williams-in-Mystic Program for next fall or spring semesters should see Dean McIntire. The application deadline is February 10, 1978. Professor Laberge will be at Williams on January 19 to discuss the program.

Hill plays 100th

by John Libertine

Flair, panache, and a good deal of fun marked last Saturday's 100th Griffin Hall Concert with Victor Hill, harpsichordist and part-time math professor. Hill played to a wildly enthusiastic audience of about 175, both Saturday and again when he repeated the concert on Sunday.

The history of the Griffin Hall concerts goes back 12 years to Hill's musical debut at Williams with the music department, when he played Bach's Art of the Fugue. For two years, he gave several solo recitals and played with a chamber group. After receiving his harpsichord in 1968, Hill inaugurated the Griffin Hall Concert Series.

Money for the first season came from the donation of 6 residential houses' cultural funds. The following year, the college gave Hill a yearly budget. Since then, Hill has continued to give 8 to 10 yearly concerts in Griffin.

Hill chose Room 3, Griffin because its size was perfect for Baroque music, which, because of its intimacy, requires an intimate atmosphere. The room also has good acoustics; the sound is perfect for performer and audience alike. Griffin remains perfect acoustically even when the room is half full. Hill packed the house both nights, which had a drawback: "a full house spoils the acoustics," he explained.

Hill specializes in Baroque music for several reasons. He is a 17th century enthusiast, and enjoys the music of the period. Bach seems to be the favorite with his audiences, but he believes that Bach's lesser-known contemporaries, such as Bohm, are just as important. The music also appeals to Hill's senses as a mathematician. Baroque music has its foundations in mathematics; just ask anyone who has ever written a fugue.

Hill started his study of music with the piano at age 4. He gave his first concert while in kindergarten. The transition to the harpsichord began in 1961, while Hill was studying with Alice Ehlars. Soon after, he studied with Gustave Leonhardt, and also studied the organ.

In addition to his Williams concerts, Hill also gives many concerts on tours both in the U.S. and in Europe. He has played in Germany, France, and Italy. Closer to home, he has played at Middlebury, Skidmore, Amherst, and Franklin and Marshall. Recently, Hill received an invitation to play with the Leubeck Chamber Orchestra in Europe this spring, but he turned it down. "Having classes does put a restriction on my playing," he said. Hill also gives a concert every summer at the Clark Art Museum. He says that the auditorium is the "nicest stage I've ever played on."

Hill likes to vary his repertoire, rarely playing the same program more than 3 or 4 times. He does, however, like to play certain, important works like Bach's Goldberg Variations every four years at Griffin. Hill seemed reticent when asked about programming next year's concerts. He did say that he had planned them and that his audiences should be pleased. When asked to elaborate, Hill merely smiled, slyly.

Quartet solos shine

The Gary Burton Quartet played a fine concert in Chapin Hall last Monday night. Burton came to the Williams campus with Gary Chaffee on drums, trumpeter Tiger Okoshi, and the renowned bassist, Steve Swallow.

The quartet's performance was consistently exciting and listenable. Solos were well-conceived and executed, complete statements which elicited spontaneous applause even from those not familiar with jazz etiquette.

Gary Burton lived up to his reputation as a top vibist. His playing was masterfully simple, fresh and pretty. Both his solo performances (without the rest of the quartet) were fantastic—high points of the concert.

Tiger Okoshi, the trumpeter, played with a warm, brassy sound that was a major factor in the concert's success. His soloing was usually good, occasionally brilliant. His solo on Keith Jarret's tune, Coral, was one of the best of the night.

Steve Swallow drove the quartet with fluid and energetic lines. Unfortunately, however, a substantial portion of his solo work was lost to Chapin's muddy acoustics.

This band sounded really good. In ensemble sections, the balance was perfect. All members of the band played with taste and creativity throughout. The musicians soloed with the idea of maintaining this level of taste and creativity. There was virtually no technique used for its own sake, and no "showoffy" behavior by any member, just a lot of beautiful music.

The music this band plays was described in the Jan. 6 Record as jazz-rock fusion. This is an unfortunate term, frequently meaning rock with horns, containing no elements of jazz. However, this term does not describe the music of the Gary Burton quartet. Their music was jazz, and it contained no elements of rock that I could discern. I can't help my impression that the music was described as such a fusion in an effort to boost attendance at the concert (Since everyone knows that no one likes jazz, let's call it jazz-rock, and maybe we can sell it).

The ACEC's performance in regard to the Gary Burton concert left something to be desired, however. The remark attributed to Steve Case in the Jan. 6 Record, choosing "quality over quantity" in choosing the quartet was inaccurate, if complimentary. Case is not in a position to say that Gary Burton's music is better than that of Charles Mingus, Lionel Hampton, and David Sancious (a true jazz-rock fusion artist).

Publicity was scant for this concert. Chapin Hall was at most two-thirds full. Posters went up only a few days before the concert. It appeared that the ACEC felt that jazz could not be sold, make only a half-hearted attempt to sell it, and failed. So, you see, jazz cannot be sold.

I am happy to report that even people whose preference I know to be some sort of rock were listening, and enjoying the concert. The audience was responsive to the players. There is a peculiar sort of presence that good improvisors have around them, and I think the audience felt it as a whole, especially from Burton and Swallow. At the end of the concert, the audience gave the band a well deserved standing ovation. Steve Robinson '79

'Most Important Voice' to return to Williams

Acclaimed singer-songwriter Jesse Winchester, a Williams graduate, will appear at Chapin Hall on Wednesday, January 25. Winchester, "the most important voice of our decade" according to Rolling Stone, graduated in 1966, but has never returned to the campus.

Tickets are $3.00 for Williams students and faculty and $6.00 for the general public, and go on sale Friday the 20th. An early sell-out is predicted.

Winchester's return home to Memphis last March after more than ten years in Canada was, according to Jesse, "a very emotional moment." The Williams homecoming is expected to be equally emotional. "Jesse wanted to come back and play," according to ACEC chairman Steve Case, "so a mini-tour of New England was organized around the Williams date. It's more than a concert—it's an event."

College hosts assorted arts

Mime

Trent Arterberry, an unusually talented mime, will bring his silent magic to the Adams Memorial Theater on Thursday, January 19, at 8:00 p.m.

Arterberry will hold a demonstration class at 4:00 p.m. on the day of the show. The class is open to all Williams students and will be held in the AMT basement.

Trent's approach to mime is anything but conventional. As a promotional stunt for an upcoming concert at the University of New Hampshire, he appeared between periods at a hockey game, and 4000 raving fans were brought to silence. Last January, Arterberry performed at Chapin Hall along with Charles Mingus, and received a standing ovation.

Arterberry is featured on both album covers of the Pousette-Dart Band, and frequently performs with them. He has made several television appearances, and was the first non-musical act to appear at nationally-recognized concert clubs such as the Bottom Line and the Cellar Door.

The show is being co-sponsored by the ACEC and Cap & Bells. Admission is $1.50; seating is limited so plan to arrive early.

Photography

The Williams College Museum of Art will house an exhibition of color photographs by Cary Wasserman, a free-lance photographer from Cambridge, Mass., during the month of January.

The 45 photographs in the collection range in subject matter from the documentary to the surreal. During the past 7 years, Wasserman's work has been on display frequently in Boston and Cambridge. Several of his photographs are contained in collections of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, The Smith College Museum of Art, and the Portland (Maine) Museum of Art.

Flutist

Flutist Pamela Guidetti will present the second in the Young Artists Concerts series on Monday, Jan. 16, at 8:30 at Thompson Memorial Chapel. Guidetti will be accompanied at the piano by Elaine Greenfield. Works on the program include sonatas by Platti, Piston, and Dutilleux, and fantasies by Telemann, Georges-Hue, and Bozza. Admission is free.

Guidetti graduated from Indiana University and is now on the faculty at Johnson State College in Vermont. Last year, she won the Concert Artists Guild Award, and she has been a soloist with the Colorado Philharmonic and the Springfield Symphony.

Music in the Round

Music in the Round will present its fourth concert of the season this Friday, Jan. 13, at 8:30 in Thompson Chapel. As a change of pace, Friday's concert has no experimental music on the program. The program includes Mozart's Trio in C Major played by the Williams Trio, Bartok's String Quartet No. 5, and Faure's Quartet, Op. 15. All three works are well-known and well-loved chamber works, and ought to appeal to a variety of tastes. Admission is free to holders of Williams ID cards.

Freshman stars in two events

Trackmen leap to 3-0 slate

by Frank Carr

In an awesome display of scoring power, the varsity track team won four of the last five events for a 66 to 51½ come-from-behind victory over Fitchburg Saturday. The Ephs' early season record jumped quickly to 3-0 as the purple tracksters also topped a [illegible] point effort by Westfield State and a 23 point total by Hamilton to capture the quadrangular meet.

The bulk of the purple points were supplied by the middle distance and distance runners with a total of 37 being chalked up in five events. Freshman Phil Darrow recorded convincing wins in two of these events, taking the mile in 4:23.5 and returning with a 2:01 victory in the 880. Darrow followed Dan Sullivan's early lead in the mile and then took off and built up a comfortable winning margin, while in the 880 he chased Westfield's Kevin Crowley over the last three laps and kicked past his opponent for the win.

"My goal for the mile was to run in the low 4:20's", commented Darrow after the race. "I felt good during the mile and I had a lot left for the 880, but I definitely need to do more speed-work."

Junior Tom Schreck also had an excellent day on the track as he followed Darrow with a second place in the mile at 4:26.7 and then captured first place in the 1000 yard run with a 2:23.2 clocking. Dan Sullivan added a fourth place 4:29.5 effort behind Schreck in the mile, while Darrell Wallace backed up the junior in the 1000, finishing third in a fine 2:24.7. Freshman Jim Suhr gave the Ephs a solid 1-2 class of '81 punch in the 880, clocking 2:05.7 for third place.

The distance duo of Joe Kolb and Frank Carr ran away from the field in the two mile and captured first and second respectively. Kolb parlayed an early lead into an effortless 9:34.2, Carr completed the 18 lap Tartan tour in 9:50.7 and frosh John McCammond had an excellent rookie performance at 10:07.4 for the number four spot.

Williams had a bit of trouble in the sprints as they were shut out in the 60 and 440 yard dashes, but a Williams victory in one of the sprint races was never in doubt. Senior tri-captain Ron White embarrassed the competition in the 60 high hurdle trials and in the finals he sliced them apart like a machete through a ripe banana. White dashed to a 7.5 second victory, just 2 tenths-of-a-second off the college record. Terry O'Reilly added three more points in the dashes with a second place 1:17.5 performance in the 600.

Tri-captain Larry Tanner faced some tough competition in the 35 lb. weight throw and his 51'5" heave could net him only second place. Tanner donated another point to the Eph cause with a fourth place in the shot put at 38'11", in back of Jim DeSimone's 41'5" third place effort.

Junior Greg McAleenan uncorked an outstanding 31'¼" leap in the long jump for first place honors in that event, while Mark Gerry also scored in the sand as his 40'1¼" triple jump performance earned him a second place finish. Stan Parese and Scott Mayfield added the final points in the field events with second and third in the pole vault.

The Williams mile relay quartet of Greg McAleenan, Paul Smith, Terry O'Reilly and Bob Tyler was unable to keep up with the squads from Hamilton and Fitchburg and settled into third for a 3:39.2 clocking. The meet then concluded with the two mile relay, but in this event it was Williams all the way. Dan Sullivan led off and opened up a lead which just grew and grew as Lee Jackson, Cal Schnure, and Jeff Coombs provided the fuel for an 8:09.8 victory.

Tomorrow, coach Dick Farley takes his squad to Boston for a meet with the perenially tough MIT Engineers.

Women's squash stomps foe

by Mary Tom Higgs

The Williams Women's Squash team opened its season Saturday, under the direction of new coach Renzi Lamb as they stomped both Middlebury and Skidmore in astounding 7-0 victories. The women proved their superiority over the two teams by conceding only five out of forty-seven games, all of which were lost to the Middlebury rivals.

Travelling without their captain and top player Jane Garvey were Laura Carson, Beckie Chase, Leigh Costikan, Marcia Johnston, freshmen Pam Hansen and Mary Tom Higgs, Roslyn Sareyan, and Kristin Johanson, who alternated with Sareyan in the No. 7 position to play Skidmore.

While most of the matches ran smoothly in Williams' favor, there were two noticeably exciting matches fought by Costikan and Hansen at positions No. 3 and No. 5 respectively. After losing the first game and winning the next two, Costikan conceded one more game before capturing the fifth and final one 15-11. Hansen led 2-0 going into the third game, and lost the following two games in 15-16, 14-15 tiebreakers. Operating with an injured knee incurred in the final point of the third game, Hansen managed to take the last game 15-9, leaving Middlebury with no wins against a Williams team.

The women now look ahead to a challenging match against Yale on January 21.

Nordic squad especially strong

Skiers show well in four races

The men's ski team opened its competitive season this past weekend fresh from an extensive week of training in Williamstown during the last week of Christmas vacation.

Six members of the men's Alpine team, Chris Welsh, Andy Mikell, Donald Tarinelli, Josh Dembrinski, Roger Prevot and Peter Mongon all qualified for the first FIS Regional Race of the year in Bristol, N.Y. The most noteworthy performance came from Mikell with a 10th place finish in the Giant Slalom. Dembrinski was in 6th place after the first run of the Slalom but joined most of his teammates as he fell on the second.

Coach Bud Fisher's Nordic skiers journeyed to Middlebury, Putney and Brattleboro, Vermont. The Nordic skiers showed some excellent performances but the team's lack of depth was also evident. Nordic captain Jeff Magoon placed sixth in a tough field at the Middlebury 15 km cross country that included one current and one former member of the National team. Freshman Dave Richards in his first attempt at the longer 15 km race placed 14th in what Fisher thought was a strong showing.

Two days later the cross country skiers were back in action at Putney in another 15 km race. Magoon again led the Ephs with another 6th place finish while Richards pulled in tenth. Freshman Dennis Desroches, after breaking and then adjusting to a pair of skis had his best race of the year, placing 25th.

The Ephs jumpers ventured to Brattleboro Saturday for a weekend of competition on the 80 m Harris Hill. Freshman Jeff Hastings had two excellent days of competition as he won the Jr. A class both days, placed 5th on Saturday and 6th overall on Sunday. Junior Tom Dodds also had his best day ever as he had 3 of 4 competitive jumps over the 200 foot mark.

This coming weekend the Alpine team can be seen in action at Bousquet Saturday and Jiminy Peak Sunday. The Jumpers will travel to Berlin to test their abilities on the longest jump in the East while the cross country races will journey to Hanover for the annual Hanover relays.

Hoopsters beat Babson

by Frank Pergolizzi

In two typical Lasell Gym thrillers, the Williams College Basketball team came away with a split, beating Babson College Friday night, 60-58, and losing to Springfield College Tuesday, 57-58.

Williams led all the way against Babson but poor foul shooting in the closing moments made the game closer than it really should have been. An 11 point lead melted to two mostly due to the failure of Williams to convert Babson's [illegible] into points. Both Gerry Kelly and Brad Wolk missed one and ones that could have let Coach Curt Tong breathe a bit easier at the finish.

The key to the victory lay in the speed and overall quickness of the smaller Williams team. Guards Andy Straka and Kelly constantly harassed Babson ball handlers. On offense, Williams relied mostly on outside shooting to exploit the visitor's inside zone with man to man on the guards.

The key to victory lay simply in the speed of the smaller team.

Kelly was high scorer with 18 points. Straka and frosh Dean Ahlberg followed with 10 apiece. Center Brad Wolk and forward Matt Spangler were especially tough on the defensive boards.

The Springfield game was a heartbreaker that the Chiefs won with clutch foul shooting and tough defense in the closing seconds. With 31 seconds remaining and Williams down by three, junior guard Jeff Hammond hit a jumper to narrow the margin to one with Williams immediately calling their last time out. Coach Tong inserted sophomore Bill Lohrer into the lineup and he immediately responded by stealing the Springfield inbounds pass at the foul line. With the clock ticking away, Williams was simply unable to get off a shot and lost the ball as the buzzer sounded.

The Ephmen missed Kelly who sat out the game with a sprained right ankle. He leads Williams in scoring with 16.2 points per game. Andy Straka (14) and Dean Ahlberg (12) took up some of the slack. However, center Brad Wolk was held scoreless.

Williams led 32-30 at the half but didn't score a hoop until 5½ minutes had passed in the second stanza. Springfield went into a four corners offense with 4½ minutes remaining and ate up a minute on the clock before Williams committed a foul. Finally, Springfield's Don Lemieux hit both ends of three clutch one and one situations that eventually won the game.

Williams travels to Kings Point Saturday and Tuesday to New Haven to meet the Yale University Bulldogs.

Icemen lose 6-5 heartbreaker; 2 suspended for next game

by Mark Pogue

The Heartbreak Kids lost another emotional and hard-fought hockey game Saturday night, falling to the Hamilton Continentals by a 6-5 count. The Purple Icers, now 3-4 on the season, have absorbed all four of their losses by a single goal.

"The second period out there was our Waterloo," lamented Williams Coach Bill McCormick after the remains of a game-ending, bench-clearing brawl had been cleared from the Lansing Chapman ice. "We should have blown them out of the rink in the first period, then it all fell apart in the second." The Purple played its best hockey of the night in the opening session, outshooting Hamilton, 14-11, and stifling the vaunted "Canadian Combine" of Len Thomas and Mark Coley. An eight-footer by Barney Walsh and some handy glovework by Purple goalie Ed Weiss left things at 1-1 after the first period.

Then someone whispered "Open Sesame" to the Purple. A 2-1 Hamilton lead was nullified on a spectacular backwards, through-the-legs shot by Peter Gonye, but then the Continentals roared away with a four-goal burst in one eight-minute stretch. One shot bounced off Walsh's leg and into the Williams net. Two scores came on Hamilton power plays. With 15:16 left in the third period Mark Valley beat Weiss on a breakaway and things looked hopeless. "Seive! Seive!" chanted the visitor's fans as the scoreboard moved to 6-2.

Suddenly, Williams got mad. At 12:53 sophomore Jim Rooney scored a shorthanded goal for the Ephs when he fooled Continental goalie Fred Caswell with a pretty "Here it isn't" move off a breakaway. At 7:03, with Hamilton a man down after committing a wild high sticking penalty, Dan Sullivan scored his sixth goal of the season to bring the Ephs to within 6-4.

Tempers on both sides began to heat up in the game's waning moments when a fuse problem in Williams' clock gave the Purple some badly-needed extra seconds. Blade "Geoff" Daley poked one more goal in for Williams with :07 on the clock, and that was the end of the scoring.

It wasn't the end of the action, though. Before anyone knew what was happening Williams' Bob Duffy and Hamilton's Bob Bauer had exchanged slugs, prompting both teams to pour onto the ice with fists balled. Cooler heads prevailed, though, and the ice was cleared. Under ECAC regulations, Duffy and Bauer will be suspended from their next game for fighting.

Racquetmen dump Fordham, fall to Princeton

by Evan Bash

With visions of a major upset dancing alluringly in their heads, the members of the men's squash team journeyed to Princeton Friday to test their luck against the nation's number one ranked Tigers. The Ephs left Princeton with visions still in their heads, but, unlike the dreams they came with, these were images drawn from the sobbering reality of the magnificent, and at times mystical, shotmaking ability Princeton used in upending Williams 8-1.

On Saturday, the Ephs stopped off at Fordham on their way back to the Berkshires just long enough to prove that they are still a cut above most teams, as the Rams were victimized 9-0.

Coach Sean Sloane's racketmen, owners of a 2-1 season record, all played well against their Princeton opponents and showed basically the same racket skills and court savvy as did the hosts. The Tigers just did everything a little bit better, and, in the tradition of all great teams, took advantage of every opportunity that presented itself.

Pete Thayer took the only match of the day for Williams with a gutsy five game win in the no. eight position. Jon Saunders hustled around the court to win one game at no. 6, while no. nine Evan Bash also managed to squeeze out one game from the stingy Princeton line-up. The rest of the Eph's squad lost in three straight games, with captain Arnie Cogswell falling to the national amateur champion and no. two Chip Lindquist bowing to an equally talented foe.

Saturday's match against Fordham saw the Ephs lose no games and give up double figures in any one game only twice in the match.

Martin Goldberg imparted some of what he learned the day before at Princeton to his hapless Ram opponent, while no. four Mitch Reiss and no. five Jim Parsons never lost control in their easy three game wins. Jim Little took low point honors for the day, as in two consecutive games he yielded only two points.

Williams squash had their hopes of glory set back this week, 7-2 and 8-1.

Ephs bow to Harvard

by Evan Bash

A confident Harvard men's squash team arrived in Williamstown Tuesday expecting a light workout, but, instead, the nation's second ranked squad had to battle for every point before prevailing 7-2 over Williams. The Ephs are now 2-2 on the season.

Chip Lindquist treated a large, enthusiastic crowd to a stunning upset, as he outdueled the ninth ranked collegian of two years ago in an exciting five game win. Fighting back from a two game deficit, Martin Goldberg also scored a great 3-2 victory. Captain Arnie Cogswell fell 3-0 to the current sixth best player in the world, Michael Desaulniers, while coach Sean Sloane's other racketmen all were in their matches, managing to capture at least one game at every position.

Wrestlers suffer loss before large crowd

by Wayne Eckerson

The Williams College Wrestling team suffered a 41-9 loss to a well-balanced Coast Guard squad before a large crowd at Lasell Gymnasium last Saturday.

Captain Hal Zendle and heavyweight Jim Stuart secured Williams' only victories despite fine performances exhibited by each Eph wrestler.

Zendle, who has been annoyed by some minor injuries, grabbed a five point lead early in his 128 lb. match. He then held his opponent at bay long enough to pull out an exciting 7-6 decision.

"I'm glad they're fighting for our country. . ."

Senior Jim Stuart perked up a somewhat despondent Williams' cheering section when he pinned his opponent after just 19 seconds had elapsed in the second period. On the whistle Stuart gained a quick two-point reversal and without hesitating, he clamped his surprised opponent in a bear-hug clasp which seconds later resulted in Williams' only pin of the day.

The remaining Eph wrestlers showed considerable poise against their highly touted Coast Guard opponents. 118 pounder Joe Carrese dominated most of his match but wound up on the short side of a 8-3 decision.

A pair of exciting frosh wrestlers, Steve Cox (134 pounds) and Scott Frost (140 pounds) performed well in defeat. Both succumbed by superior decision scores.

The Coast Guard wrestlers shot down sophomores Mark Walch, Brian Plitt, and John Fasano, and Senior Charley Davis in the upper-middle weight classes. The only wrestler here to escape a "back-flattener" was Mark Walch who managed a 14-1 decision.

Despite the rugged beating, his wrestlers suffered, Coach Joe Daley was generally pleased with his team's performance. He commented, "Our kids really hung in there. This was one of the best Coast Guard teams I have ever seen and our kids gave them a run for their money in every match."

The Coast Guard team is ranked highly in New England. Its well-precisioned skills and superb physical conditioning led one Williams' spectator to comment, "I'm glad they're fighting for our country!"

The Williams' record currently stands at 0-3. Its previous two losses came at the hands of Hartford 29-26, and Plymouth State 40-18 in a pre-Christmas tournament which Williams hosted.

The Eph wrestler's next match pits them against Worcester Polytechnic Institute at Lasell Gymnasium on January 14 at 1:00.

Mermen prevail

by Dave Amlicke

A rested Hamilton swim team entered Muir Pool expecting an upset of the aquatic Ephmen. Their New Year's resolution went unfulfilled and the Men's Swim Team stormed to its third victory of the season, 67-46.

Hamilton made things close in the early stages of the meet with a narrow loss to the Medley Relay team of Dave Amlicke, Paul Vom Eigen, Guy Hoelzer, and freshman Keith Berryhill, and wins in both the 1000 and 50 freestyle events. The momentum shifted quickly, however, as the ever consistent Todd Piper and fellow IM'er Peter Howd swept to a 1-2 finish in the 200 IM. Greg Roux scored the first diving victory of his college career and the Williams lead was never again in doubt.

Super-sprinter Phil Wild sparkled in two come-from-behind races, winning both the 200 and 100 freestyle. Amlicke and Vom Eigen also triumphed in their specialties with fine early season times. The premiere performance of the meet came from Guy Hoelzer who sped to a 2:03 clocking in the 200 butterfly. The time is one of the fastest in New England to date.

The Williams swimmers displayed their depth and balance in all events. They captured the majority of second and third places. Freshman Gordon Cliff and Soph Brian Volpp were particularly strong in their respective events.

Southern Connecticut arrives in the Berkshires next weekend for one of the classic swimming match-ups in New England. The Ephs will be attempting to avenge last year's loss in what should be an exciting confrontation.

The outstanding Eph swimmers sank Hamilton, their third nautical [illegible] 67-46.

College chaplain John Eusden

Committee studies Chaplaincy at Williams

The Committee on the Chaplaincy has begun to study the chaplaincy and to interview candidates to replace the Rev. John Eusden when he leaves the post at the end of the year. College President John Chandler said that he hopes the committee will have "someone ready to go in September."

A primary purpose of the group will be to define the role of a College chaplain at Williams. To aid in developing a plan for a restructuring, the committee is consulting the Chapel Board, the Jewish Association, the Newman Association, the Williams Christian Fellowship and local clergy. They are holding an open meeting to discuss the chaplaincy with all interested people, soliciting the opinions of the community at large, in Driscoll Lounge Tuesday January 24 at 7:00 p.m.

After they decide what the College needs, committee members will begin to interview candidates for the job.

The College chaplaincy is a part time job, so the school must give some thought as to what he will do in the remainder of his time. Chandler said that the new chaplain would probably not be a member of the Religion department, as it is fully staffed. He "could" teach in another department, take a part-time administrative job, or work outside the campus for half of each day, the President said.

Chandler said that Eusden told him "a long time ago" that he intended to give up the chaplaincy at the end of this academic year in order to teach.

Energy Contest

The Deans and the College Energy Committee announced an energy conservation contest between residential units to begin January 25. The contest will run for one month, and the winner will be the unit using the least electricity relative to the same period last year. The winning house will receive an additional $50 for their cultural funds.

A second contest with another $50 prize will run from March 25 to April 25.

The contest will group all members of a residential group together. Perry and Bascom, for instance will count as a single building. Freshmen will compete by building rather than by entry.

And who will replace Berek?

Peter Berek will go on sabbatical next fall, leaving his position as dean of the College temporarily vacant, and his fellow-administrators have opened the search for a replacement.

Selection of a replacement candidate should be completed sometime next week, according to President John Chandler. Chandler is working with the deans, individual faculty and the faculty Steering Committee in choosing a new dean.

Chandler said he will be seeking student input in selecting a replacement dean. Members of the Thursday Group, a student organization, already have moved individually to begin lobbying for faculty members they would like to see appointed to the administrator's post.

Dean of the College Peter Berek

Student input would not be considered, Chandler stated, until after the administration had selected a tentative candidate. "I don't want a general election," Chandler said.

Provost Neil Grabois is working with Chandler in selecting a new dean of the College. He has been working with students from the Thursday Group seeking to provide input to the process, and according to the students, has suggested they present individual suggestions.

Once opinion has been compiled from administrators, faculty and students and a candidate selected by President Chandler, the trustees will meet to ratify the decision.

Berek has been a professor of English at Williams since 1967. He succeeded Grabois to the dean's post some four years ago.

Students urge stock guidelines

by Randy Wang

Disturbed by recent activities overseas and on campus, the Thursday Night Coalition (TNC) has proposed strict guidelines for College investments in South Africa and begun circulating petitions for "the inclusion of the sexual orientation clause in the College's discrimination policy," according to Ken Bertsch '78, of the WGSO.

Members of Gargoyle and the TNC will meet with the trustees on these issues Jan. 28, he said.

Of the College's forty million dollars in stockholdings, twenty-five per cent is in corporations with operations in South Africa. The first proposal by the TNC sets requirements which those firms must meet within two years: the provision of equal benefits for equal work; the support of the development of labor unions; the establishment of a satisfactory minimum wage; and an increase in the number of non-whites in training programs and responsible jobs.

In addition, the proposal would require the corporations to take the following actions within six months: to cease all operations in illegally occupied Namibia; to cease further sales of equipment to the South African government; and to cease further loans to the South African government and South African companies. If these guidelines are not met, the proposal calls for the publicly announced divestiture of the College's holdings.

The first proposal also requires the College to vote its proxies in support of shareholder policies which advocate a moratorium on investment, the withdrawal of investment, or disclosure of corporate activity in South Africa. The same would apply to proposals ending the extension of credit to the South African government or South African companies.

The second proposal urges the establishment of an investment committee, composed of three College Council appointed students, two faculty members, the Treasurer of the College, and one trustee, to "deal with the moral obligations involved in investment making."

They also would be responsible for writing an overall investment policy for the College; developing and implementing specific policy for questions brought to the committee; enforcing policy; and voting all shareholder proposals.

Thirty-one corporations would be affected by these policy changes. Two examples, noted Bertsch, are IBM Corp. and Sperry Rand Corp., which sell computers to the government which, he charged, are used solely to keep track of blacks.

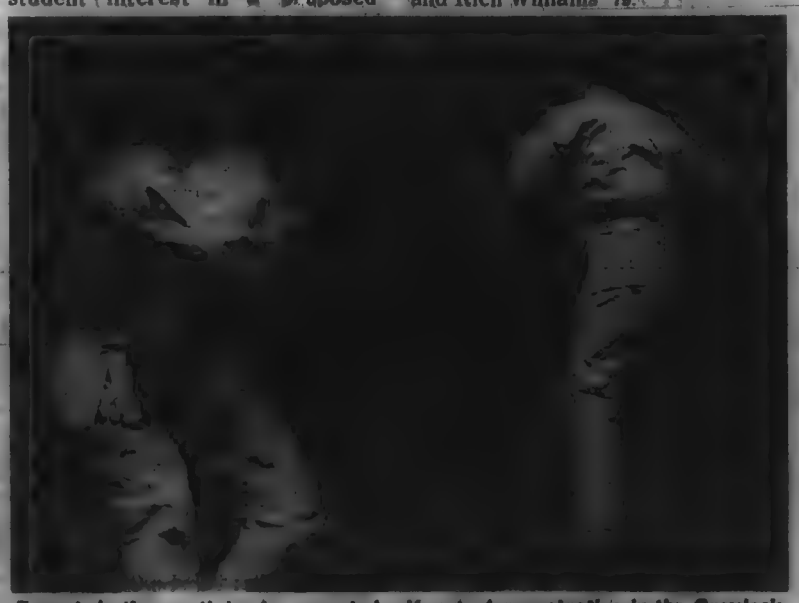
Such activity would cease under the new guidelines, or the College would sell its shares in the companies. The decision on the two proposals will be made in March.

The Thursday Night Coalition also is circulating a gay rights petition through the residential House system, stating "We the undersigned, as members of ———— House, support the inclusion of the sexual orientation clause in the College's non-discrimination policy." The clause itself would be added after the terms "race, creed, or color" in the college catalogue.

TNC supporters have met only moderate opposition in gathering signatures. Students unwilling to actively support gay non-discrimination do sign the petition. Supporters expect nearly 50 per cent response.

Shop and guide confront council

Wednesday's College Council meeting included reports from the Finance, Course Guide, and Elections Committees, as well as a woodworking shop proposal from Dean Eileen Julien.



Harry Kelly, chairman of the Finance Committee, presented the council with a list of five areas of interest for future discussion. These topics included new scheduling procedures to allow the Finance Committee to present its proposed budget allocations in mid-October rather than mid-November as is presently the case. In addition, Kelly recommended consideration of the following: that more Council members be included on the Finance Committee; that all College publications, like the Record, allow competitive bidding for their printing contracts each year; that the number of College athletic teams be reduced for economy; and that the Student Activities Tax be raised.

Elections Committee Chairman Peter Friesen reported on the ten-page booklet currently being prepared to explain the role of the committees on campus in which students have input. He expects it to be ready for distribution in February. The need for this report, which covers approximately 20 committees, arose, according to College Council President Tom Herwitz, because "we have not been getting many applications for committee positions. People don't know what the various committees are." Via this summary of the time requirements and the issues that these committees deal with, "We hope to raise the level of student participation in these organizations," said Herwitz.

Paul Shorb '78 expects two fifths of the courses offered at Williams to be covered in the fall 1978 course guide. This is approximately the same number that were included in last year's guide. Shorb mentioned that he had had difficulty getting adequate participation from the houses.

Council members were asked by Dean Eileen Julien to determine student interest in a proposed woodworking shop to be located in the basement of Greylock. "The College's carpenters are presently concerned for the safety of students using the sophisticated tools at Buildings and Grounds," said Dean Julien. The shop will cost $20,000, half of which will be paid by the College. The rest of the cost must be borne by the students.

Marcellus Blount '80 and Chris Jenkins '80, both College Council members, will fill vacancies in the Elections Committee created by the departures of Brian McDermott '79 and Rich Williams '79.

Stores rate Spring St. best sellers

by Peter Rintels

When students don't buy text books, what do they buy? According to Spring Street bookstore owners, J.R.R. Tolkien's The Silmarillion is the hardcover student bestseller. After that, popular soft cover choices vary widely from store to store, with The Joy of Sex by Alex Comfort and Our Bodies, Ourselves by the Boston Women's Collective the only top ten listings common to both stores.

Joseph Dewey and Ralph Renzi each estimated that non-textbooks (books not sold specifically for a course at Williams) make up approximately a third of their businesses and of that third, about half is with students. Although the claim is frequently heard that people, and students in particular, do not read as much, neither store has noticed a decline in leisure book purchases by students. However George Coussoule, who works at Renzi's, observed that "It seems that students used to browse more."

He and Renzi suggested that declining interest in books might be the result of higher book prices and the fact that the reading lists for many Williams courses are quite long. The "paperback revolution," said Renzi, has done a lot to increase the number of books students are expected to buy for courses.

The two stores disagreed substantially on the effect of best seller lists in molding student tastes. Renzi said that it virtually dominates them. "The New York Times is all powerful. They (students) look at the bestseller list and buy what's there." He noted a few exceptions, such as Even Cowgirls Get the Blues, by Tom Robbins, which has done well by word of mouth. He estimates the book to be his third bestseller to students.

Chris Cassel, who works at Dewey's, found on the contrary "no correlation between student tastes and the New York Times list, although he said that there was certainly some

Nobel laureate to talk

On Tuesday, January 24th at 7:30 pm, Dr. George Wald will speak on "Life in the Universe" in Chapin Hall. The talk, a well-balanced presentation of Dr. Wald's scientific and activist political ideology and most likely will be the most exciting and thought provoking lecture given at Williams this year.

Dr. Wald, born in 1906, received his Ph.D. in 1932 from Columbia University, and upon graduation was awarded a National Research Council Fellowship in Biology. He spent the first year of the fellowship working in the laboratory of Otto Warburg in Berlin where Dr. Wald became the first person to identify Vitamin A in the retina of the eye.

Dr. Wald has been a professor at Harvard University in Cambridge since 1934. He received the Higgins Chair in Biology in 1968. Among his many other awards and prizes, Dr. Wald was awarded the Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine in December of 1967. He was also elected to the National Academy of Science in 1960 and to the American Philosophical Society in 1958. Dr. Wald has also received honorary degrees from many colleges in the United States and Europe. In addition, he is a member of the American Society of Biological Chemists, the Optical Society of America, the Association for Research in Opthalmology and the American Chemical Society.

Letters: New dean; Film Society injustice

Appointment input

To the editor:

Although it is no secret, many Williams College students do not realize that Dean Berek is on leave for the academic year 1978-79. Moreover, many students and faculty are not aware of the college's procedure for selecting new deans. Unlike larger schools, Williams makes appointments from the already existing faculty. Theoretically this means that any professor is eligible to fill the position. President Chandler reviews suggestions made by various members of the faculty and administration and presents his final choices before the board of trustees who then make a definite decision. There is neither a precedent for student input into administrative appointments, nor a formal channel through which students can present ideas and suggestions. However, you can make an appointment to see either Provost Grabois or President Chandler and offer your ideas on who would make a good dean or what type of person you feel would best fill the dean's position.

Mr. Grabois has pointed out that in all fairness to non-tenured faculty selections are restricted to those faculty who already have tenure. Otherwise professors coming up for tenure would be evaluated on the basis of their administrative work rather than on their teaching ability. Also, the President and the Provost are interested more in what qualities students believe would enable someone to become an effective dean instead of merely a list of names. The Provost has requested that suggestions be kept on a personal, individual basis to avoid a politicization of the selection process.

The dean of students is a powerful position. It is an office which requires intricate interactions among administration, faculty, and students. The trustees' appointment affects every student. If you have ideas or suggestions on the issue, I urge you to share them with Mr. Grabois or President Chandler immediately and make your views as students known where it counts.

Reel trouble

To the editor:

At the recent Williams Film Society showing of Alfred Hitchcock's "Psycho" a very important and "classic" scene was chopped off one of the reels. Although the loss of the scene did not greatly hinder our understanding of the plot line, the absence of the staircase scene with the detective did leave some confusion as to the fate of our friend and took something away from the film. The viewers were deprived of a look at one of the great scenes in movie history. I think it is the responsibility of the Williams Film Society and any organization sponsoring a film to be sure that what they show is the whole film, not a butchered copy. Films are edited in such a way that the pieces fit together to form a whole (hopefully). It is an injustice to the viewers to misrepresent a film as was done last Friday with "Psycho." Matt Cole '80

Viewpoint

Who pays Vorster? You do

Originally written as an article, this piece appears as a Viewpoint due to the political orientation of the Record editorial staff.

Twenty-six million people live in South Africa today. Only four million, all of them white, are citizens. The three million men and women classified as "Coloured" (mixed race) and "Indian" (Asian) fall into a nebulous non-citizen category, while the nineteen million Africans are considered outright foreigners. The Africans were born in South Africa, grew up in South Africa, work in South Africa and will die in South Africa—but they are black, and thus "foreigners". Only whites have the rights of citizens in South Africa. Only whites can exercise political power and organize economic power. Africans cannot vote, buy or sell land, own factories, or mobilize their strength as workers in recognized trade unions. They have been stripped of all power. They have no control over their lives or their future.

In response to the oppressive policies of the South African government and particularly in light of the most recent development in the continuing struggle for majority rule, a movement to isolate South Africa from the international community has been growing. In this country, political and economic actions against the racist South African regime have been spearheaded by universities, colleges, churches and labour organizations nationwide.

Throughout the past year there have been student protests at more than twenty schools, including Princeton, Cornell, Amherst, the University of Wisconsin, and the University of Massachusetts. Hundreds of students have been arrested at Stanford and at several campuses of the University of California system for staging sit-ins to protest the universities' investment links to South Africa. The Attorney General of the State of Wisconsin has ruled that the University of Wisconsin's investments in corporations operating in South Africa violate a state law prohibiting the regents of the university from investment in corporations which practice or condone discrimination. He recommended that the university begin divesting itself of the stock.

The University of Massachusetts has divested itself of its stock in corporations in South Africa. The mounting attacks against the South African government have cast a cloud of uncertainty on what was formerly considered a highly attractive investment climate. As a result the rate of investment has declined considerably. In response to this decline, some American corporations have adopted the "Sullivan Principles," which are:

1. Non-segregation of the races in all eating, comfort and work facilities.
2. Equal and fair employment practices for all employees.
3. Equal pay for all employees doing equal or comparable work for the same period of time.
4. Initiation and development of training programs that will prepare, in substantial numbers, Blacks and other non-whites for supervisory, administrative, and clerical and technical jobs.
5. Increasing the number of Blacks and other non-whites in management and supervisory positions.
6. Improving the quality of employees' lives outside the work environment in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities.

These were designed to define a progressive role for the business community in terms of employment practices, in the hopes that their example would carry over to legal and social structures as well.

In the abstract, the principles make unobjectional reading. The catch lies in what they exclude rather than in what they include. Discrimination against Blacks caused by apartheid is not due solely to issues of hiring and wages; apartheid is embedded in the socio-economic structure of the South African state. The Sullivan Principles make no demands for any change in the fundamental structure of the South African state; thus the effect of the principles on the quality of life of South African Blacks will be minimal.

The fact that the Sullivan Principles were endorsed by the South African government gives a clear indication as to how far they fall short of presenting any challenge to apartheid. The short-comings of the Sullivan Principles are evident even when viewed only in terms of wages and employment practices. The following are examples of practices which effectively thwart any modifying effect the Sullivan Principles may have on employment conditions:

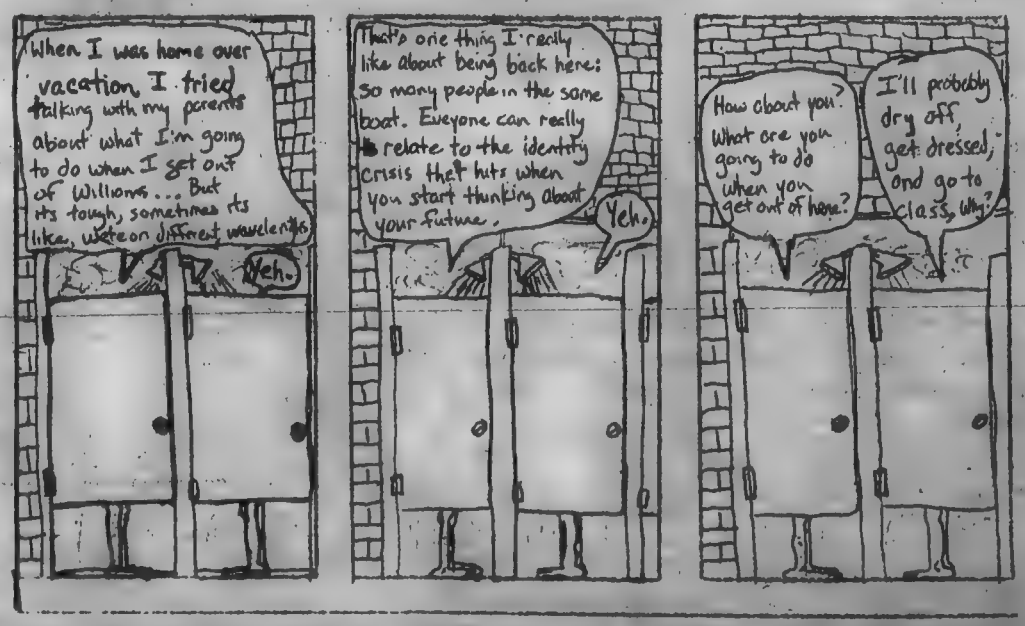
a) Work redefinition and job fragmentation, or breaking up a skilled process into unskilled parts in order to create "new" lower-paying job categories for Black workers make "equal pay for equal work" a meaningless slogan because Blacks do not have access to equal work.

b) Black and white workers already work alongside one another on the shop floor and the law does not explicitly bar an African worker from supervising whites, but white trade union prejudice has barred this practice as effectively as any law. Black trade unions, while not being explicitly illegal in South Africa are nonetheless rendered powerless by the racist policies that permeate other aspects of the society. These include restrictions on an African's mobility as well as limitations on the number of Africans allowed to meet at any one time.

c) Because African workers have no political power and no union recognition they are forced to accept the white South African definition of fairness. There can be no equality of opportunity where one group of workers is denied the right to effective trade union organization.

It should be clear at this point that the modification of working conditions is insignificant in the absence of a commitment to changing the laws and customs that support apartheid. It must be fully understood that Africans are not struggling and dying to reform or improve apartheid. They want nothing less the total abolition of the system. To propose change that calls for anything less than the complete reformation of the social and political systems has proven time and time again to be irrelevant and ineffectual.

The responsibility for instituting change in this grossly unequal system is in the hands of the parties most directly involved. For the Williams College community the question of positive and direct action is a relevant one. To an ever-increasing degree those of enlightened opinion the world over are demanding an end to apartheid and its supporters. As the opposition to the crimes of apartheid grows it will become impossible for the Williams community to justify its current attitude of benign neglect, particularly in light of the supportive role the College's investments play in sustaining the system of apartheid.



Williams has approximately $10 million invested in corporations which are now active in South Africa. In addition to direct involvement with corporations, the College also has an established relationship with American banks which are the major contributors of finance capital to the South African government. The value of the monetary connection between Williams and these banks was not available at the time of this writing, but it is highly probable that the total value of Williams's South African connection exceeds the $10 million. At present, two corporations that have significant investments in South Africa are represented on the Williams Board of Trustees by William S. Sneath of Union Carbide Corporation and Preston S. Parrish of the Upjohn Corporation. Both are members of the board of directors of their corporations and therefore have access to direct channels of influence that could yield significant results in forging policies that would lead to progressive changes in South Africa.

On campus there is a small but growing number of students who are becoming cognizant of the existence and implications of the College's investment links to South Africa. Some of these students, in an effort to address the issue, have drawn up a set of proposals for corporate conduct. These proposals, which are modeled after the corporate codes of conduct set by the European Economic Community go further than the Sullivan Principles. They provide an effective base from which corporations will be able to meet their responsibilities to progressive change in South Africa. (See article on page one)

A difference of crucial importance in the investment policy proposals is the second provision of proposal one which calls for the legal development and recognition of African labor unions. Also important is the provision concerning Namibia.

Within the next two weeks there will be a petition campaign in an effort to gain support from the college community for these proposals.

Career Counseling ends managerial discussion series

Career Counseling closed down its January career discovery series last night, ending three weeks of panels, discussions and interviews that brought businessmen and executives to Williams from across the country.

Students aiming for managerial slots in the halls of IBM, CBS and Zerox met yesterday with alumni and managers from various New England health, arts and recreation businesses.

Representatives from the New York Yankees, Planned Parenthood, museums, a hospital and a racetrack together discussed the intricacies of management in their fields.

A highlight to last week's program was a panel on hiring tips. Virginia Snedecor of Time, Inc., compared the job application process to preparing a senior paper, and the job interview to a "sales process."

In these and other ways, students are more familiar than they realize with the techniques of impressing employers, agreed Snedecor, Dave Wilcox of New England Telephone and Jack Corridon of W. R. Grace and Co., as they gave tips on resumes.

"We are looking for a very strong beginner who has some evidence of across-the-board strength," Snedecor explained, praising the liberal arts preparation of Williams students.

The series, which began Jan. 3 with "The World of Management," was heavily biased to careers in management. Over the month, Career Counseling led meetings on consulting and business, communications, arts, health, sports and teaching management.

Alumni from Hartford insurance firms met Monday to outline qualities and preparations that their corporations look for in aspiring employees. Tom Anathan '66 and Rod Dimock '68 of Aetna and Hans Halligan '59, Jim Pilgrim '60 and Jeff Verney '77 of Connecticut General Life met with Howard Smith '51 to discuss qualifications, jobs, and hiring.

Other alumni from the Class of '77 returned to analyze their experiences in finding careers in the present job market Jan. 5 and 6. They analyzed their liberal arts preparations and new job experiences and gave hints on ways of finding jobs today.

Hans Biesecke '78 helped fellow undergraduates learn the keys to the interview, as he staged a mock interview for a teaching post with Ted Childs '51 of the Salisbury School Tuesday.

SciFi, poetry rate among Spring St. best sellers overlap such as The Joy of Sex. Among his bestsellers were The Woodburner's Encyclopedia by Jay Shelton of the physics department here, and How to Buy an Elephant, by John Krasuz, which Cassel described as an "oddball collection of facts." The New York Times lists neither of them.

As a category, SciFi-Fantasy is Renzi's fastest selling, apparently spurred on by the movie success of Star Wars and Close Encounters of the Third Kind. "Any book based on a movie is a guaranteed best seller," Renzi said, adding that many of them are simply like "monarch notes of the film." His top selling paperback is a book version of Star Wars. The hardcover bestseller at both bookstores is J.R.R. Tolkien's fantasy The Silmarillion, the success of which has boosted interest (i.e. sales) in other Tolkien books and in fantasy books in general.

Dewey's has benefitted less from the renewed SciFi-Fantasy interest because it stocks far fewer books in that category. According to Cassell, the store leans more toward "softcover art books and poetry." Poetry sales have picked up, he said, probably owing to Lawrence Raab's presence on campus. "He has quite a following," Cassel said.

Other categories that Renzi reported to be selling well were "current lifestyle" books, including books dealing with the women's movement such as Our Bodies, Ourselves; "pop psychology", such as Your Erroneous Zones (which Coussoule described as "just crap"); "life and death" books, and area in which interest has grown largely as a result of Raymond Moody's bestseller Life After Life; Humor books, especially cartoons from the New Yorker and Doonesbury, although not the old masters like Thurber, Benchley and Perelman; mysteries; and poetry.

Bestselling titles . . .

At Renzi's	At Dewey's
1. Star Wars	1. The Silmarillion
2. Passages	2. The Woodburners Encyclopedia
3. Even Cowgirls Get the Blues	3. How to Buy an Elephant
4. Trinity	4. As the Kid Goes for Broke (A Doonesbury book)
5. Raise the Titanic	5. The Psychopathic God: Adolph Hitler
6. Looking for Mr. Goodbar	6. The Joy of Sex
7. The Hobbit	7. Our Bodies, Ourselves
8. The Joy of Sex	8. On Death and Dying
9. Our Bodies, Ourselves	9. Roots
10. Complete Book of Running	10. Trinity

NOTE: Both bookstores emphasized that these lists are subjective and only approximations. Also, Renzi's list applies to softcover books only; he reports, however, that The Silmarillion is doing extremely well in hard cover.

Winter Study classes travel to NYC

by Sally Midgley

Over 35 Williams students from the Advertising and Stock Market Winter Study classes descended upon the Williams Club in New York last Thursday morning. The students travelled to the city to view the actual environments of their subjects under study.

The Advertising class, taught by Prof. Ralph Bradburd, first visited the prominent Doyle, Dane, and Bernbach ad agency on Madison Avenue. Identifying themselves as the "Nobody-does-it-better agency," DDB has many well-known clients including Volkswagen, Polaroid, American Airlines, and Mobil Oil.

After jokingly being instructed not to mention the "Tickle" commercial (a DDB campaign which was nominated as the year's worst), the class was shown a series of various TV commercials created by DDB. Following this viewing, an informal panel of Walter Gorino, Account Supervisor, and Lee Epsteen and Diane Tull, Creative Directors, gave first-hand insight into the work of an ad agency.

The panel explained the various steps involved in making an ad, placing particular emphasis on DDB's unique concept in which the art director and the writer work together for the initial brainstorming. The panel answered questions about subjects including public relations, cartoon characters, and cigarette advertising, and discussed Nielson ratings. "They're too important to us," Gorino said, "but what else is there?"

The class then toured the DDB headquarters. While observing the video department, several students were video-taped as they 'rehearsed' an ad for American Airlines. The audio and control rooms were also open for viewing.

Students were let loose Thursday night to visit NYC relatives or acquaintances, dine at Mama Leone's or McDonald's, stay out all night at Times Square, or simply sleep at the Williams Club. Students scattered, but a large contingent congregated at Wednesday's, a well-known disco. With the price of a pitcher of beer at $7.00, it was a sober crowd.

After an uncomfortable night of camping on the carpet on the 3rd floor of the Williams Club, the Advertising class visited the offices of the National Association of Broadcasters. A short presentation by Gerry Lansner and outlined the responsibilities of the N.A.B., which deal with advertising almost exclusively. A large part of the meeting entailed a discussion of contraceptive advertising on TV. Lansner said that the question of whether contraceptive advertisements should be broadcast had become an important issue currently confronting the N.A.B. Asked what they thought, students varied widely on this question, ranging from those oppossed to contraceptive ads based on religious grounds to those in favor based on educational needs.

Kate Moody, a member of Action for Children's Television (ACT) talked to the class about children's advertising on Friday afternoon. A strong opponent of such advertising, Moody claimed "There should be separate structures offered to them (children)." Stating that the average child sees 300-400 commercials a week, Moody advocates that "all advertising to children is unfair because children can't withstand the pursuading techniques of a Madison Avenue ad agency." The questions and controversies within advertising are clearly evident to Williams students as a result of their trip to New York City.

Flutist presents exciting, varied concert

Flutist Pamela Guidetti

Flutist Pamela Guidetti presented an exciting concert last Monday evening in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Throughout the concert Guidetti, with her fine musicality, amazed her audience with a fast and accurate technique. Her program achieved a varied representation of the flute repertoire.

New quartet violinist Mary Van Citters joined Julius Hegyi and the other members of the quartet in a virtuoso performance at the Music in the Round concert last Friday.

Guidetti opened the concert with a charming sonata by Giovanni Platti. Her tone was both sweet and rich; a lively and, at times, playful interpretation set a joyful mood. The solo Sonate by C.P.E. Bach followed, her interpretation leaning towards Romanticism. Guidetti's supple tone and control were particularly evident during the difficult slow movement. Georges Hue's Fantasie, with its movingly lyrical style, was precisely played.

Guidetti played the Sonata by Walter Piston, a most demanding piece, with bravura, displaying a powerful low register that projected distinctly. Elaine Greenfield, the pianist, played with feeling and a sensitivity to the flute. The following piece, Image by Bozza, contrasted well with the force and movement of the Piston Sonata.

Guidetti ended her concert with the very difficult Sonatine by Dutilleux. This piece exploited both the high and low registers, and the tongued passages were played movingly and with elan. Throughout her performance, Guidetti displayed an accomplished and virtuistic approach to her music. The audience justly rewarded her with warm applause.

French Hornist

Peter Gordon, French hornist of the Boston Symphony, and Christopher O'Riley, pianist, will give the third and final concert of the 1978 Young Artists Series at 8:30 p.m. on Monday, January 23, in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Admission is free.

Works on the program are Beethoven's Sonata in F, Opus 17 for Horn and Piano; En Foret by Bozza; Hindemith's Sonata for Alto Horn in E^b and Piano; Romance, Opus 67, by Saint-Saens; and Mozart's Concerto No. 2 in E^b

Peter Gordon, growing up in a large and very musical family, began studying piano at the age of five and, after a few years with the violin, switched to French horn at thirteen. He has been associated with the Philadelphia Chamber Orchestra, the Symphony of the New World, the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, the Royal Ballet and Stuttgart Ballet.

Aulos plays Bach

The Aulos Ensemble will play a concert of works by Johan Sebastian Bach and sons this Saturday night, Jan. 21, at the Clark Art Museum at 8:30 p.m. The performers will be using historically accurate reproductions of the type of instruments used by Bach and his sons during the Baroque and Early Classical periods.

Fourth Music in the Round delights listeners with difficult Bartok work

Music in the Round presented its fourth concert of the season last Friday night to the warm applause of an enthralled audience. Included on this fine program were works by Bartok, Mozart, and Faure.

Friday's concert boasted a new addition to the chamber group, Mary Van Citters, a new violinist. Van Citters gave a wonderful performance with the group, and it is hoped that she will become a permanent feature in future concerts.

The concert began with a terrific performance of Bartok's Quartet No. 5. Like all of Bartok's quartets, this piece is composed of extremely difficult music for the players. Virtuoso technique is all important to the piece. The quartet, composed of Julius Hegyi and Van Citters on the violin, Susan St. Amour, viola, and Douglas Moore, cello, may have made a few small errors here and there; but on the whole, they gave a fabulous performance of a most difficult and challenging work.

The Williams Trio, composed of Hegyi, Moore, and Charles Joseph, piano, continued the concert with a performance of Mozart's Trio in C Major. Mozart's trios, compared to his quartets and quintets, are relatively unknown works in the repertoire, which, on the basis of this performance, is a shame. The piece is wonderful. One must take notice of Joseph at the piano; he stood out throughout the piece with his dazzling keywork. He plays Mozart beautifully and obviously has a great liking for the composer and his works.

After a brief intermission, the concert concluded with a fine performance of Faure's Quartet Op. 15. Taken as a whole, the evening was a delight and should not have been missed.

Even cowgirls ... Talking Heads are talking to you

Talking Heads, Live The Main Point, Bryn Mawr, Pa. New Year's Eve, '77

Countless "unknowns" have appeared at Bryn Mawr's Main Point, later to become stars. Almost every name folk singer from Joni Mitchell to Jackson Browne has played this cozy, suburban Philadelphia club. Occasionally auspicious rock performers show up (Bruce Springstein once let loose on a grand total of thirteen). Ushering in the new year with one of New York's leading New Wave bands, Talking Heads should prove to be another memorable moment in the Point's rich history. More importantly, the New Wavers like Talking Heads, Elvis Costello, The Jam, and The Sex Pistols point to the beginning of a new era in pop-rock; a reunion of styles which made the Beatles and their proteges the mania of the sixties, and which will make "popular music" a very slippery term for program managers of AM stations to grasp in the next few years.

Talking Heads is not a punk band. What they are is much more difficult to say. The group exudes an intriguing tentativeness, occupying perhaps a middle ground between the "velvet" New York underground and the popular music of today. Visually reminiscent of the Shindig days of the mid-sixties, emotionally a cool reflection of the placid seventies, and musically a subtle, original blend of rock, pop, and traces of disco to ring in the eighties with, Talking Heads both perplexes and delights. Watching the Heads is like listening to rock 'n' roll caught in some kind of time warp where past, present, and future merge and converge. The music sounds familiar but distant, first a bit offbeat, yet soon quite danceable. Maybe the initial impact is akin to listening to Roxy Music or Patti Smith for the first time. Maybe not. Talking Heads appeals to people of all ages, striking fancies instinctively.

The New Year's Eve show opens with "Love Goes To Building On Fire," the Heads first single, and the sound is as lush and clear as it is on vinyl, yet fuller, David Brynne on keyboards and drummer Chris Franz lay down a concise, catchy rhythm. Jerry Harrison's vocals are precise, poised, and somehow concealing something—a feeling the whole band generates. Bassist Martina Weymouth, attractive in a masculine way with her page boy haircut, seldom moves a fraction from her corner of the stage, a picture of self-absorption or abnegation. Harrison invariably stands motionless, his head tilted slightly up to his microphone. Dressed in grey polo shirt, black pants, and black shoes, he stares straight ahead, only occasionally addressing the crowd with a perfunctory monotone ("The name of this song is . . ."). Brynne, mouth usually agape, looks about to yawn or explode. Our only real point of contact is Franz. Clad in a red alligator shirt, he adds some animation to the group with self-assured All-American boy smirks and quips like "Hold your horses, Jack" when a request for the FM "hit" "Psycho Killer" gets out of hand.

Set one includes many songs not on the group's debut album, Talking Heads: '77. The songs follow one another quickly, as if part of a larger whole. Most are snappy, elegant, and tempo changes occur with abrupt ease. The group plays very "cleanly". "Psycho Killer" closes the set and the Main Point comes alive. A rare guitar solo by Harrison at the end of the song inexplicably plunges us into psychaedelia circa '67. The tentative feeling persists.

The second set includes more songs from the group's first album. "Uh-Oh, Love Comes To Town" packs the dance floor. "Tentative Decisions" displays good chorus singing (something they should make more use of). "Pulled Up" is infectious with its classic sixties guitar bars, and lyrically asserts the sense of mastery the Heads tacitly convey:

I drift away to another land
Sleeping dreaming such a simple thing
I think of the things I might be
I see my name go down in history.

The encore is "Don't Worry About The Government", a song which to date best captures the tantalizing tight-rope between involvement and indifference Talking Heads dangles upon:

Some civil servants are just like my loved ones
They work so hard and they try to be strong
I'm a lucky guy to live in my building . . .
I will relax along with my loved ones . . .

Talking Heads: distinctive, elusive, intelligent, and musically talented. "They're talking to you."

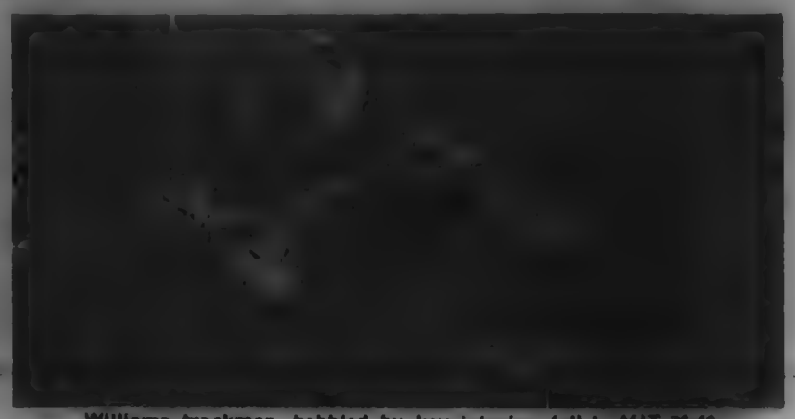
Injury-laden track team succumbs

by Phil Darrow

A Williams track team riddled by injuries and sickness met with defeat for the first time this season at the hands of the MIT Engineers last Saturday. The Ephs stayed close the whole way, but could not match MIT's imposing depth. The final score was 75-60, a margin of only one event.

Williams was without the services of star hurdler and tri-captain Ron White, sidelined with a strained knee, and several other key performers. As coach Dick Farley noted, the lost depth was crucial since "we had the same number of first place finishes, but six less second placers. That was the only difference in scoring."

Despite the loss there were some very strong individual efforts. In the field events, tri-captain Larry Tanner showed why he is considered a top contender in New England in the 35 lb. weight throw. After nearly mowing down two of his skinnier teammates with an errant toss, the burly senior got mad, wound up and promptly heaved the brass for a new school record of 56' 8¼". Though two Engineers had been holding onto a narrow lead, the final outcome was in no doubt as the margin of victory was a remarkable three feet. The throw was also a meet and fieldhouse record for Tanner.



The Ephs also came through in the other field events. Senior Greg McAleenan and frosh Dave Durell took first and third in the long jump with distances of 20' 8¾" and 20' 3" respectively. Tanner stepped back into the ring to take second in the shot put at 42' 7¼". Jim DeSimone was right behind in third with a put of 41' 5½". Jim Rouse also netted a third in the triple jump, touching down at 39' 6¼". Finally, the Ephs scored a shutout in the pole vault as the MIT man failed to clear opening height. Jim Holmes took first at 12' 0", and Scott Mayfield checked in at 11'0" for second.

Williams looked very tough in the two spring races. Although Vernon Davis has been overshadowed somewhat by his senior teammate in the hurdles, he showed his own excellent skill by blowing out the competition. His time for the shortened 50 yard event was a flashy 6.8 seconds. In the 50 yard dash, Glenn Harris smoked to a convincing first, also in 5.8. He was followed by frosh [illegible] Dee II eaves in second for a decisive scoring edge.

The Ephs had trouble in the middle distances, managing only three thirds in three events. Paul Uncth clocked a 57.6 440 on the miserable track, and Bob Tyler was just edged out by two Engineers in the 600, still turning in a fine 1:20.9 for the dirt surface and tight turns. Phil Darrow got dusted in the 880 to round out a middle distance effort that could see improvement.

The longer races were once again a strong point for Williams. Darrell Wallace ran a very smooth 2:26 in the 1000 to take second. In a slow mile with a blasting finish, Phil Darrow and Dan Sullivan teamed up for a first and third with 4:29 and 4:32 respectively. Tri-captain Joe Kolb and Frank Carr also came in first and third in their two mile, as Kolb followed MIT ace Barry Bayus until the final lap and then fried him with a scorching kick. Kolb's time was 9:39, again excellent for the track, with the sneezing Carr cruising in at 9:53. In the final event, Sullivan showed another tremendous kick in his anchor leg of the two mile relay which left MIT stunned despite their win.

The Tracksters will travel to Union tonight where they hope to regain momentum and beef up their 3-1 record.

Alpine skiers lead in local sweep

The Williams men's ski team moved into the second week of the season with its usual smorgasbord of activity in New Ashford, Mass., Hanover, and Berlin, N.H.

The Alpiners dominated local racing activity at Bousquet and Jiminy Peak as Andy Mikell, Donald Tarinelli, and Jan Dembinski led a 1, 2, 3, sweep of the slalom at Bousquet Ski Area on Saturday. Sunday at Jiminy Peak a Williams Duo of Roger Prevot and Chris Welch swept 1st and second place in a Giant Slalom at Jiminy Peak. They were followed by Donald Tarinelli in 4th.

The cross country skiers journeyed to Hanover, N.H. for the Hanover Relays, where Jeff Magoon led off the first leg for the Williams number one team and cruised in in sixth place. He was the first collegiate skier to finish this leg and only the 2nd non U.S Ski Team member in. Magoon was followed by Peter Wells who kept the team in seventh place as they finished the third collegiate team behind Dartmouth and U.N.H. Also skiing individually good legs for the Ephs were Dennis Desroches, and Rob Craig.

The jumpers traveled to the 80 meter tower in Berlin, N.H. and again freshman Jeff Hastings showed he is capable of jumping with the best in the country. Hastings along with two U.S. Ski Team members was in the top 3 in the Jr. A Class and in the top eight overall in a field which not only included U.S. and Canadian National team members but two members of the Austrian National Team.

Although most of the team moves to Easton, N.Y. next weekend in the St. Lawrence Carnival, Andy Mikell will be skiing at Burke Mountain in the North America Ski Trophy Series and Jeff Hastings will travel to Laconia, N.H. for a 70-meter international ski jumping meet.

Cross-country skiing becoming increasingly popular

by John Rindlaub

Cross-country skiing is the fastest growing winter sport in the country, and with the Old Farmer's Almanac predicting a January as snowy as last year's but warmer, the sport has already taken off at Williams.

The high cost of energy needed to create good snow conditions for downhill skiing and to move skiers up the slopes has brought the average cost of a weekday lift ticket in Vermont to $13.00. In response to the price increase, many people are hopping onto their x-country skis and heading for the wooded trails nearest their homes rather than driving north to battle long lift lines.

Downhill skiing is still highly popular among students and at $50.00 for a midweek pass at Brodie Mountain, it's not a bad buy. But Brodie is no Breckenridge and many students have decided to ski x-country on weekdays and save the more challenging mountains—Stratton, Snow, Killington and Sugarbush—for the weekends.

Much of the appeal of this Scandinavian pastime is being able to ski right out your door, anywhere there is snow. Williamstown offers a range of possibilities enabling both the novice and expert to enjoy touring in the Berkshires.

The Taconic Golf Course is the ideal spot for beginners. Its gentle terrain will let you get the feel for your skis and master the basic techniques. Night skiing is also possible, since the course is relatively flat and free of rocks and roots.

The trails of Hopkins Forest offer a more scenic trip and ensure any skier a good workout. Take Bulkley Street north until you come to the forest. Then just follow the trail signs and blazes. As you enter the forest, the left-hand side of the trails is reserved for x-country skiing.

The R.R.R. Brooks Trail in Williamstown ascends a beautiful brook valley to Petersburg Pass, and is 2.8 miles long. To reach the eastern end, take Rt. 7 south from Williamstown for about one quarter mile. Turn right onto Bee Hill Road and park on the left after the first bridge.

The Hopper Trail in South Williamstown (4 miles) should be avoided when it is icy or crusty but with substantial new snow it is suitable for intermediates. Turn left onto Hopper Road 2½ miles south on Rt. 43, at the entrance to Mt. Hope Farm. Continue for a mile, turn left at a fork, then drive another half mile to Haley's farm. The trail begins 100 yards beyond the second gate.

The Williams Cross-Country loop in Savoy Mountain and Florida State Forests (4½ miles) is suitable for beginners. It is marked on the right by red flags. For longer downhill runs, it is best to ski the trail counter-clockwise. Take Rt. 2 east about 4 miles, turn right onto Shaft Road. Continue to North Pond Recreation Area. The trail begins on the left. For a shorter loop, try the Spruce Hill Trail (2½ miles) which is marked by a sign at the sharp turn on Shaft Road.

For longer trips, southern Vermont offers many trails. Intermediate and advanced skiers might want to try the Dome Trail in Pownal (6 miles round trip) and novices, the Broad Brook Trail (8 miles). The Outing Club Trail Guide has directions.

Stratton and Mt. Snow offer a total of 37 miles of trails as well as downhill skiing. But experienced skiers agree it is best to stay clear of these spots on weekends, unless you enjoy paying for your skiing (about $2.00) or sharing your trails with dozens of others.

The Outing Club usually arranges a x-country trip or two for those students who wish to combine their interests in camping and skiing. The WOC also provides x-country touring for PE credit.

Don't let x-country ski technique bug you. If you want you can invent your own technique. But as for any sport there is a theory about what works best. Since the 1950's, the emphasis has been on the "diagonal technique"—the skiing stride where your arms and legs alternate. When you ski, just as when you walk, your left arm and right leg come forward together, then your right arm and your left leg. If you can walk, then you're off to a great start. The biggest difference between you and the experts is a little matter of conditioning. The hotdogs can ski at full speed for more than thirty miles.

Skiers come on strong

Members of both the women's alpine and nordic ski teams had successful races last weekend, with the alpine team dominating the field in a pair of local Tri-State Qualifying races, and the nordic team showing strength in the Hanover Relays in Hanover, N.H.

Freshman Julie Ernst of the alpine team put together two strong runs to win the slalom, held at Bousquet Ski Area, with Kathy Lane, also a freshman, taking third, Corrie Johnson fourth, and Alexandra Smith sixth. Williams team members swept the giant slalom, held at Jiminy Peak, with captain Marty Epstein finishing first, Julie Ernst second, Kathy Lane third, and Ashley Smith fifth.

The two teams travel together to their first carnival, at St. Lawrence University Friday and Saturday.

In the Hanover Relays, Cathy Allen skied an outstanding second leg of her three-person team, which included captain Rachel Potter and freshman Cindy Drinkwater. After her run, they stood in sixth place, eventually finishing 15th, still respectable in the field of 30 teams.

Cathy Allen provided the outstanding performance of the women's nordic team, skiing the second leg of the first relay team, which also included captain Rachel Potter and freshman Cindy Drinkwater. After her run they stood in sixth place, eventually finishing 15th, still respectable out of the field of 30 teams. Franny Todd and Polly Morrow, both in their first year of nordic competition, also had strong individual races, on the second relay team which finished 23rd, despite the binding problems which troubled leader Janet Lavin.

Icemen edge Holy Cross

by Tim Layden

Be it ever so humble, there's no place like the road—wait a minute, that's not quite right. At least it may not be quite right in the lyrics of a commonly sung American melody, but the Williams College Varsity hockey team showed Saturday night on the campus of Holy Cross College that there is certainly some basis for truth in the statement.

On paper, the Eph's chances for pulling off a big upset in the contest seemed slim, indeed. Coach Bill McCormick's charges had dropped a pair of heartbreaking one-goal losses on their home ice, consistently yielding demoralizing goals, and playing and losing with enough emotion to fill five seasons. Putting it all together on the road, against 8-2 Holy Cross, fresh from a 7-6 upset of Middlebury and earlier conquerors of Williams Holiday champ Oswego St., seemed unlikely.

Yet, through the wave of some magic wand, Williams arrived safely through a brutal snowstorm, and played like a team possessed. Purple-clad defensemen were seldom out of position, and offensively, the Ephs played a little opportunist hockey of their own. The biggest key of all, however, was the outstanding play of sophomore transfer goalie Mike Moulton, who turned away all but one of the Crusaders' 34 shots in a stunning 2-1 Williams victory.

The now 4-5 Ephmen battled Holy Cross through a scoreless first period in the spacious Hart Recreation Center. Both freshman center Mac St. Onge and senior Barney Walsh had good scoring opportunities in the stanza, but Crusader goalie Jim Stuart twice hit the ice for saves. Moulton registered ten saves in the period, one bordering on the spectacular, kicking a drive from the right boards away and preserving the tie.

Coach McCormick has either proven a genius or motivator through reverse psychology this season by the results he has gotten from his fourth-line players. Dave Phalen picked up a crucial goal in the Oswego game, and John Bessone and Brooks Tanner each pumped home breakaways in the Norwich loss. For Saturday's contest junior Chris Egizi's season-long scoring slump (with a fine New Haven game being the only exception) was rewarded with a fourth-line berth. Egizi answered with a pretty breakaway goal over Stuart's left shoulder for a 1-0 Williams lead. Eph players are reportedly now standing in line for fourth-line duty.

Steady Jim Daubert, a charter member of the All-red-faced team, made several fine defensive plays in the period and Moulton turned away 11 more shots as the fired-up Ephs headed down the stretch with a 1-0 lead.

The hosts knotted the contest at 8:43 of the final period as John Fulchino skated down the right wing boards and fired a centering pass in front of Moulton. The disc deflected off a defenseman's skate and into the net for the tying goal. It was the type of heartbreaking goal which had hurt Williams so often in the past, and Eph fans might have put their hands over their eyes and waited for Holy Cross to tally the next four goals.

Not quite, said the Williams goon line of Bob Duffy, Geoff Daley and Walsh. Nine seconds after the tying goal, Daley sent Duffy in on Stuart, and the intimidating senior, returning from a one-game suspension for being a naughty boy, slipped the puck through the netminder's legs for the game-winner.

Moulton turned away nine Holy Cross shots in the final ten minutes of the game. It was only his second start of the season, the first being that upset loss to Amherst early in the season. Though the play of Williams's defense was super in front of Moulton, the sophomore netminder played like he's been waiting since December to show his real skills.

Wednesday evening Williams took the gaudiest socks north of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers to Middlebury for another key Division II test. Tomorrow it's Division III Wesleyan in Lansing Chapman Rink. Note the revised 4:00 starting time for that one.

Mermen sunk by Southern Conn.

by Dave Amlicke

The losers in any sporting event are rarely satisfied. Nevertheless, the Men's Swim Team could not be displeased with its exciting, "down-to-the-wire" 57-56 loss to Southern Connecticut before a large crowd in Muir Pool.

The Williams team recorded one of its finest dual meet efforts in many years. Each race was a formidable challenge for all contestants and several races were decided by less than a half-second margin.

Williams jumped off to a quick lead after the Medley Relay team of Don Cameron, Paul Vom Eigen, Guy Hoelzer, and Phil Wild overwhelmed their opponents. Cameron's performance was particularly awe-inspiring as he blasted to a 56.2 split, nearly 5 seconds ahead of his closest competitor. Stuart Deans swam a strong race in the 1000 freestyle and again in the 500 freestyle but was defeated in both by a strong contingent of Southern Conn. distance freestylers.

The third event of the afternoon was the 200 freestyle. The lead changed hands several times as Dave Amlicke was narrowly touched-out at the finish and clocked a fast 1:48. Explosive performances by sprinters Tom Beckett and R. J. Connelly resulted in a 1-2 sweep of the 50 freestyle and gave Williams a narrow lead over Southern Conn.

After the diving that point spread had been considerably lessened. Flyer's Guy Hoelzer and Todd Piper responded by sweeping the 200 butterfly. Piper never faded from his initial pace and passed his surprised opponent 2 yards from the wall for the important second place. Phil Wild wasted all opponents in his 100 freestyle triumph and freshman Gordon Cliff followed up with his first collegiate swim victory as he churned to a swift 2:07 200 yd. backstroke.

Despite an admirable effort from Paul Vom Eigen, Southern Conn. won the 200 breastroke and first and second place triumphs in the diving ensured their meet victory. The 400 freestyle relay team of Heolzer, Amlicke, Cameron and Wild won the final event leaving the swim team one point short of a fourth consecutive win.

The Williams swimmers travel away now for a series of meets before returning home in February to face Division I Colgate.

Tough Yale team dunks women

Shooting only 26 per cent from the floor, the Ephs fell victim to a powerful Yale team 70-45. (photo by Holder)

A determined Williams' women's basketball team lost the Battle of the Boards Wednesday night, surrendering 70-45 to Yale University before a large crowd at Lasell gym.

Taking on one of the season's toughest squads for their home opener, the Ephwomen were unable to hit the shots or salvage the offensive rebounds to keep the score close. Missing 70 shots for a dismal 26 per cent from the floor, the powerful Williams scoring machine was unable to get in gear, suffering from the same lack of accuracy that cost them last week's 66-60 loss to Skidmore.

A strong Yale squad took control from the tap, putting an effective double post on the base line. The Elis then picked off the outside shot, feeding to fast-breaking guards to keep their score climbing.

Down 11 points at the half, Williams opened the second stanza with two key steals by Leslie Milne and Monica Grady to come within nine. Full court presses and a variety of zone defenses were unable to stop the sure-shooting Yale offense, who kept gunning them in from the inside. Yale center Barbara Leibowitz (18 pts) led a 13-4 spurt to put the Ephwomen out of reach with ten minutes left.

Eph center Maggie O'Brien led the scoring for Williams with 16 points and four steals on the evening. Grady and forward Lisa Capaldini followed with 8 points each while defensive stalwart Leslie Milne hit seven. Although co-captain Anne Youngling had a cold shooting night, she looked good for defensive play breaking for the Ephwomen.

Williams, now 0-2, look to capture part one of the first Little Three Women's Basketball Championship as they host Wesleyan University Monday night in Lasell gym at 7 pm.

Correction

In the Record editorial of January 13, the fourth sentence of the first paragraph should have read, "As a result, students will have no certain knowledge of their professors' fates until untenured faculty depart after the decision," not "As a result ... and tenured faculty are promoted a year and a half after the decision." Positive tenure decisions, but not negative ones, are announced after the trustees vote.

Also, the disciplinary proceeding referred to as "before the Discipline Committee" was dealt with by the Deans' Office and never reached the Discipline Committee, the Record has learned.

Grapplers pinned by strong W.P.I. squad

Wrestlers beat Albany State 28-27.

"It's the best win I've had since I've been coaching Williams Wrestling," exclaimed Coach Joe Dailey, after his team staged a thrilling 28-27 come-from-behind upset of Albany State at Lasell Gymnasium this Tuesday.

Heavyweight Jim Stewart performed the heroics that gave Williams its thrilling victory, providing needed points to pull off an upset with a pin at 4:30 in the second period.

Carl Webster's victory in the 177 pound weight class was the key to Williams' upset victory. After the Eph lightweights rolled up a 16-6 lead, it was clear that the team's weakest link, the middle and upper weight classes, had to come through with a win. Webster's pin in the second period sent the Ephs ahead in the match 22-21 and kept alive the hope of an upset.

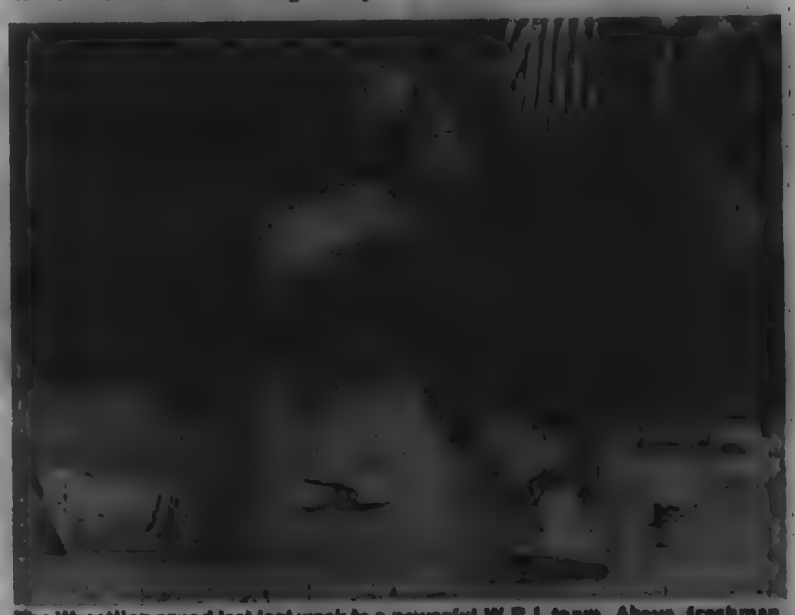
by Wayne Eckerson

W.P.I. decisively defeated the Williams' Wrestling team 46-4 last Saturday at Lasell Gymnasium. This loss gives the Ephs a slow-starting 0-4 record.

Captain Hal Zendle captured Williams' only points in his 126 pound bout. A stubborn W.P.I. wrestler frustrated Zendle's attempts to chalk up a pin and six points for his squad. He settled instead for a 12-2 decision.

From thereon in it was all W.P.I. Five Eph wrestlers suffered pins and two lost by superior decisions.

Freshman Steve Cox gave a gutsy performance in the 134 pound class. He faced one of W.P.I.'s top wrestlers and fought out of several difficult pinning holds.



The other half of the starting Freshman contingent, Scott Frost, also did not die easily. He fell behind 4-0 in the first period and was unable to make up the deficit. The final score was 10-5.

In the closest match of the day, Mark Walch dropped a tough 12-9 decision. Walch could not summon enough energy in the third period to convert his two-point reversal into a five point reversal—near fall combination that would have sent the bout into overtime.

The match marks the second time that Coach Joe Dailey's troops have lost by rather lopsided scores. However, Coach Dailey can't help but have mixed emotions. "We are in the toughest part of our schedule right now," Daley commented. "Coast Guard, W.P.I. and Albany, who we wrestle on Tuesday, are some of the top Division 3 teams in the nation. They do a lot of recruiting, unlike us."

It seems as if the team has a new attitude if not a winning record. Last year, Williams' lost most of its matches before any wrestlers stepped on a mat because the team failed to fill most of the weight classes. A good Freshman turnout, and some on-campus recruiting by Coach Dailey has boosted the squad's size.

"The situation is so much better, this year," says 118P pounder Joe Carrese. "Last year we couldn't even practice because we only had eight guys."

Draconian measures?

Trustees tackle sexism at Williams

by Buck Simon

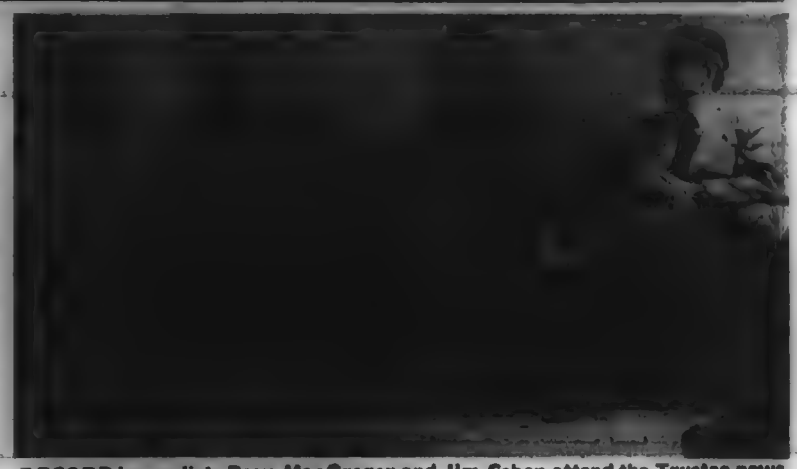
After long deliberation, the trustees have decided what to do with sexism at Williams. President John Chandler announced that beginning with the class of 1983 Williams will no longer accept women into the freshman class. The announcement followed a trustee meeting yesterday. Unconfirmed reports show that Skidmore College offered a $5 million gift to Williams contingent upon this decision.

An interview with members of the trustees produced several reasons for the change. "Look, boys will be boys, they're not going to change. We didn't have problems with sexism before we admitted women," remarked trustee Alexander Fetters '58. "So the simplest way to eliminate the problem was to get rid of the girls."

The newest trustee, Diana Strickler '73, liked the decision. "I like having power over men," she said, "and now I've got lots of them."

"Women shouldn't be in college anyway," another trustee concurred. "A woman belongs in one of two places, the kitchen or the . . ." She broke off, and asked that her name not be used in the article.

The reaction was not unanimous. Another trustee said, "We've been saying 'women are here to stay' for years, and now we've reversed ourselves. I think we should have gone all female."



Committee W, the faculty committee on hiring women and minorities branded the action as "sexist." They had proposed that the trustees make Williams a female college, a non-sexist alternative.

Many administrators were elated with the news. Now the College need not adhere to the Title IX "guidelines" on women's athletics or hiring. "We will save an incredible sum on paperwork alone," exclaimed Treasurer Francis Dewey. He further commented that the College endowment would receive an incredible injection from the policy change. "All those alums who held onto their checks will mail them in now," he smiled. When asked about female alumnae he said, "Naw, there aren't too many of them, and they're all housewives anyway."

Dean of the College Peter Berek expressed confidence that once women were eliminated from Williams the sexism issue would be defused. "Then we'll be able to return to more serious issues such as light bulb theft."

President John Chandler commented that several other colleges across the country which he had contacted by phone had dealt with the problem of sexism in a similar manner. Ted Stroll '78 refuted that claim, stating that he had maintained a tap on Chandler's telephone since December and had recorded no such telephone calls.

As the news of the possible change in admissions policy travelled the student grapevine, Rex Coons was beseiged with requests to offer his roadtripping winter study as a credit course for the second semester. Actually, request isn't exactly the word for it, said Coons. "These six guys came up to me outside of Wood—I think they were rugby players—and threatened to slit my throat if I didn't offer it. Strangest thing I've ever seen."

Chandler undergoes religious conversion

Following in the celebrated footsteps of Hustler publisher Larry Flynt and former Nixon aide Charles (Chuckles) Colson, College President John Chandler has gotten religion and been born again into Christianity, according to informed sources in the administration.

Mrs. Chandler confirmed the report, saying "I got the feeling he had undergone some sort of rebirth experience when he started babbling baby talk about two weeks ago. It was really touch and go for a while, but we've been working hard and have him back up to about a college level education." The President's wife added, "He used to teach a religion course called The Search for the Historical Jesus. I guess he found him."

The Religion department was unavailable for comment on the conversion as its entire membership fell on the floor in fits of hysterical laughter on hearing the news from a Record reporter; entire that is except for Professor and College Chaplain John Eusden, who said a brief prayer for the President before returning to his zazen.

The President himself was interviewed in his office and quizzed on what changes he thought his conversion would bring to the campus. "I think we could pep up this campus a little and especially faculty meetings. Faculty meetings are the most boring things in the world, with the possible exception of a Jimmy Carter energy speech. I think we might see a lot more music." The President then rose from his desk, danced out of his office and on to the sidewalk in front of Hopkins Hall singing hymns and spirituals.

Chased down again by the Record interviewer, the President was asked if he foresaw any other changes. "I'd like to see a return to some old time religion," Chandler said. Did that mean compulsory church going again? "I mean old time religion," the President said. "How do orgies grab you?"

The Religion Department was asked for its reaction to this latest comment and this time showed considerably more interest; again all except Eusden, who once more said a brief prayer for the President and returned to his zazen. The interest faded after a short time, however, and the department again fell into fits of hysterical laughter.

Pressed for a statement, Professor Mark C. Taylor regained his composure long enough to say, "From a strictly phenomenological view, the President's conversion involves a complexification of ontological relationalities promoted by an in-breaking futurity. But fundamentally, I think, the man's blown a fuse." Taylor added that the phenomenological view was probably best from Stone Hill, and not bad from Pine Cobble and a few places on the Taconic Golf Course. He concluded by dropping the names of three major religious philosophers of the twentieth century.

Phones at the News Office have been ringing constantly as word of the President's conversion has spread to parents and alumni. The Office has been telling callers that only people who have read War and Peace will understand the true meaning of Chandler's change of heart, figuring that that will keep alumni checks coming in for at least another three years.

Dean of the College Peter Berek could not be reached for comment. An aide said that he was out looking for work.

New grading emerges from joint CUL/CEP effort

by Bucky Simon

The Committees on Educational Policy and Undergraduate Life have joined forces to attack the grading problem. The combined group has designed a policy guaranteed to solve many problems inherent in the present structure.

The flaws of the current system, said CEP Chairman Gordon Winston are threefold. He cited grade inflation, differentials between departments, and differentials between sections of a multisection course as the biggest problems.

Bob Bell of the CUL added that though the CEP was good at defining problems, the CUL had solutions. Maintaining that diversity is the best way to handle every question dealing with students the CUL came up with the elegantly simple random grading proposal.

"We'll run it like house affiliation," he said. At the end of his first semester each freshman will apply to one of five grading groups—A, B, C, D, or E. He may apply alone or in groups of up to three other classmates. (Up to six if he opts for the fourth group "D.") The computer then assigns each group a random number, and then allots the freshmen to each group based on their number. In this way everyone has an equal chance of getting his first choice grade group.

He did not think everyone would apply to the "A" group. "That's where the strategy comes in," he said. If you get bumped from the first group then there will probably be enough people applying for B's and C's as first choices that they'll end up with their fourth or fifth choice.

Once in a particular grade group the CUL expects the "plus" and "minus" grades to go in a procedure like room draw. "Seniors will probably draw first," Bell said, "followed by the underclassmen. We want to leave this to the individual group as much as possible. We envision squatter's rights, transfers drawing after the class, and all sorts of little problems, but we want to foster group autonomy."

Transfers could be sticky, Bell admitted, but he thought that the new system adopted by the Housing Committee would work for them as well. Students wanting out of their group would be guaranteed the opportunity, but the committee would examine their applications only after freshman grade draw.

CEP members stress that the entire process is random, so differences between courses and sections will be insignificant. Against the argument that scholarship will decline, CEP member Larry Mitchell '78 argued that on the contrary students work entirely for the joy of excellence, and so this will have no effect. He added that this cures the grade inflation problem in that the College can open more places in one group at the expense of another to alter the College-wide average.

The proposal goes to the faculty next week, where the committee members suspect it will pass easily. It will come before the Trustees in spring, and will become effective with the next school year.

Town police bag big game in head hunt

* * You Pee I Report * *

At an afternoon news conference held today Williamstown police chief Joseph Zoito announced that after a three month undercover investigation his honchos had finally cracked the notorious "Tyler Pot Club" and arrested its ringleader. John ("Patton") Graham—alias "Johnny"—was dragged from his dribbling waterbed in the wee hours of the morning and arrested on charges of distributing the evil weed on the Williams campus, according to an observer named Harmony.

"At first we thought that Graham was merely a front because our informers told us that even the wimpiest bong hit would send him into uncontrollable coughing spasms," Zoito stated, "but later we learned that it was all an act."

According to Zoito, Graham controlled an elaborate distribution network in the Williamstown area. Zoito noted, "He apparently stored the stuff in a recently constructed barn in the town of Florida and then forced innocent Tylerites to peddle his wares." Zoito added that several ingenious methods were utilized to Frequently we at the Record are accused of taking ourselves too seriously. Sometimes in reporting the news that becomes necessary. This is to prove that we can have fun, too. The events reported in this edition are all fictional. They have not happened. Any resemblance to real people or events is purely co-incidental, sort of. We hope you enjoy reading this as much as we did putting it together for you.

A cheer for the CAP

Hurrah for the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. Once again they have shown that order and wiser heads are better than young impressionable minds when it comes to making tough tenure decisions.

Too often the student's mind sways with the unimportant considerations of personality or teaching ability. If it were left to us the College would have nothing but popular teachers! Horrors! Thank you CAP for interferring and setting matters aright.

Take the illusive goal of education. Why is the college here? Is it to educate undergraduates or the faculty? A student would probably make the mistake of opting for the former alternative, whereas a faculty committee obviously sees things in their proper light, offering tenure to those who write the articles that educate faculty members at other institutions.

The CAP acknowledges three categories in which it rates untenured professors: (1) teaching ability, (2) scholarly work, and (3) other considerations. It is time we brought the "other" category to light. The committee raises a number of important questions. "Does the candidate attend the Congregational Church?" "Does he attend faculty club parties?" "Has he purchased a home?" "Does he open his mouth at faculty meetings?" The latter two are the clinchers. If an unwary assistant professor does either, then ZAP, he's out on his ear.

Finally we come to the viability of student decisions. Look at the winners we've made recently: pro-sexual orientation, Herwitz for CC President, and anti-Dean of Beer. Do we want the irrationality responsible for these fiascoes having a say in who teaches here? Of course not.

So once again, thank you, CAP, for ignoring us. Continue in your merry way, doing what's best for . . . ?

To the editor:

It cheers me to see the coverage you give musical events on the Williams campus. Not only does the Record review regular happenings such as the fine Griffin Hall Concert Series, but you even report on its part-time performers. I only hope that your staff will be as good when I give my next recital in 1982.

Thanks, and keep up the good work.

Sex

To the editor:

We note with interest the discussion of sexual orientation in the pages of the Record. Quite frankly we don't understand the problem. We of the Tuesday Forum would like to say that we have very strong opinions on the subject. We are for it. After all, isn't that why we went coed? We believe that everyone should have one.

Sincerely,
The Tuesday Forum

Fleetwood Mac
[illegible] to W [illegible]

Legends come and go in the rock 'n roll world, especially at Williams College. First it was Cheap Trick, but now the penultimate! ACEC Chairman Steve Case announced today that Fleetwood Mac, "a big name group with great looking women," will play Chapin early this spring, March 24.

Asked why the Mac has condescended to play Williams, Case curtly explained that the group needs "new challenges. After all," he elaborated, "we all know the average Williams student would rather neck or play backgammon than go see a concert. Fleetwood knows this and they're viewing the whole thing as a test." As drummer and group-manager Mick Fleetwood put it, "If we can sell out Williams, we'll be psyched to tour the Humalayas, maybe even Mississippi."

Case though, is confident the show will sell out, given the right hype. Said Case, "We'll do a really thorough promo job on this one: radio, posters, wedgies, the works. Oh, and a lot of my relatives from Hawaii are visiting me that weekend."

Another "angle" Case mentioned as a possibility to boost ticket sales was the computer-date approach. If adopted, singles would be assigned to adjacent seats with sexual preference as the main seating criterion. "Extra males", Case regretted, "will unfortunately have to sit in the aisles."

The move to get Fleetwood Mac dates back to last summer and Case's Hawaii pineapple plantation. There a group of Williams rugger's, searching the islands for new talent, spotted two lathy females swimming in the buff. The polaroid pictures that ensued reached the hands of young Case. He immediately contacted Warner Brothers (Fleetwood's record label) suggesting that Columbia and Capitol might be "very interested" in using said pictures for bootleg albums.

Stevie Nick's Williams "connection" also has facilitated the negotiations. Until recently, his step brother, who attended Williams, working his way through school as an inflatable doll merchandiser.

But can Fleetwood Mac be a pleaser at Williams? I think they can. True, the group has had its problems of late. They get a lot of AM air-play and they sing a lot of boy-girl songs some might find offensive. Nonetheless, rumour has it that they've been priming up a few Linda Rondstadt and J. Geils tunes just for Williams. And besides they are Hawaii's top attraction!

'Dead' issue rises before campus

Down but not out after their defeat on the gay rights issue at a recent faculty meeting, campus liberals are regrouping for a new barrage. The new issue is discrimination against dead people.

"I don't know the exact statistics," said Ted Stroll, "but I wouldn't be surprised if their were more dead people in this country than live people. But how many do you see on the Faculty and student body? I'd like to see Chandler explain his way out of that one."

Stroll, who was not speaking for any campus organization but just "some concerned students", pointed out that traditionally dead people have been lax about defending their rights and interests. "They've been a pretty silent majority, there's no doubt about that," Stroll said. But, he believes, Williams can and ought to move into the vanguard in defending "dead rights."

He and other students are drawing up a proposal for the Faculty and Trustees asking that the catalogue's non-discrimination statement be amended to include non-discrimination on the basis "state of animation."

"Chandler and the trustees will probably object that a statement like that means that Williams will have to accept applications from clearly inanimate things like rocks or Jerry Ford," said Stroll. "But the way the present statement is worded, the College is obligated to consider things like tree, mosses, algae and what not. And besides, they could always define 'state of animation' elsewhere to refer to whether a human being is alive or not."

Professor Frances Oakley, Dean of the Faculty and also its affirmative action officer, said that the issue of dead people had been raised before but that qualified dead teachers are difficult to find. "Our affirmative action program is based on the number of Ph.D's produced by particular groups during a year, and dead people have traditionally been low producers of Ph.D.'s. I guess academia is not an attractive career for dead people right now."

Director of Admission Phillip Smith stated that "if qualified dead applicants apply, we certainly wouldn't hesitate to admit them, but they just aren't applying here. And of course we can't lower our standards just to admit dead students." He did, however, raise the possibility of accepting a dead applicant or two under the ten-per-cent program. "We wish we had more dead applicants," he said. "I guess we just don't have a very good reputation among them."

Stroll suggested that bringing more dead people on campus would help improve the diversity of the student body, and add new intellectual perspectives. He even raised the possibility of a dead studies program. When it was pointed out that the religion department was offering a winter study death and dying, Stroll replied, "It's not the same thing. It's like a man teaching a women's studies course. It's just not the same thing."

Tyler pots club?

transport the marijuana around campus including a fake leg splint, a violin case and floppy hats.

Although Zoito refused to comment on how his agents had managed to infiltrate the pot club, another source stated that the case had been broken largely due to the efforts of an undercover agent known only as "Boo."

Speaking on behalf of the College, Dean Peter Berek announced that Tyler House would be disbanded as a social unit as a result of the pot club arrest. "That pot club was one of the few really popular social activities at Tyler," Berek gushed, "and now that it's gone I see no reason for Tyler to exist." Associate Dean Christy Roosenraad claimed however that his own efforts had been instrumental in closing the house. "I've been pissed off ever since Graham cut off my supply," Roosenraad barked, "and I thought this might pressure him into rethinking that decision."

Graham, contacted by a Record reporter in his jail cell, said that no amount of intimidation could convince him to sell again to Roosenraad. "That turkey thought he could toy with my off-campus application," Graham mumbled, "but I'll show him who he's dealing with."

According to Zoito, Graham's arrest squashed the drug ring completely. Sources at Tyler, however, argued that Zoito was uninformed. "Graham was just a peon," said one senior who refused to give his name but said his initials were L.C.D. "As long as I'm around there will continue to be a pot club," this source claimed, "Because I do more pots at Tyler than anyone. Just ask Rabes."

Another senior known as IB commented, "We sacrificed Graham to take the heat off but the club will continue as usual. We figured it was the punky thing to do."

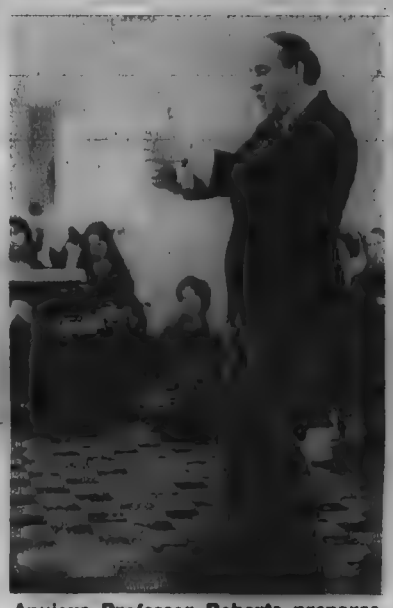
Hill and Roberts join for musical fireworks

by Ludwig Van

Victor Hill and Kenneth Roberts announced today that they will give a joint concert early in April. This announcement comes after months of secret negotiations between the Math and Music Departments, through an unnamed intermediary known only as Deep Bass.



Although Roberts has not given a solo concert in a good many years, both parties report that they are secure in their knowledge of the other's ability.

The program for the concert includes several works of PDQ Bach: The Echo Sonata for two unfriendly Groups of instruments rescored for piano and harpsichord; and the newly discovered Sonata for Harpsichord versus Piano. Several more works, as yet undecided, will also be on the program.

Roberts reports that he is very excited about the concerts. "I have wanted to have a concert with Victor for years," he said, "but in the past our schedules have always conflicted. Now, at least, the two of us can get together, and I'm really looking forward to it."

Hill, too, is pleased with the concert, coming as it does from a suggestion of his own from about a year ago. "I wanted Ken and myself to do a special concert last year in honor of our anniversaries as musicians. Most people don't realize it, but Ken and I started performing at about the same time. Since the two of us have such similar tastes in music, a joint concert seemed natural. Unfortunately, the time element just wouldn't allow it. But, at least now we can do something together. As the saying goes, better late than never."

At one point during the negotiations, a dispute over the concert's location nearly caused the cancellation of the concert. Hill preferred Griffin Hall and Roberts wanted the Chapel. After hours of debate, a compromise was settled upon. The concert will be held in the main gym of Lasell Gymnasium.

Anxious Professor Roberts prepares for upcoming concert.

Trustees meet demands

by Woodstock

In a somewhat unexpected move this morning, a spokeswoman for the College trustees announced that the trustees had unanimously voted to accept all of Gargoyle's recommendations concerning campus affairs. Among the measures endorsed by the trustees were recommendations calling for a non-discriminatory sexual orientation clause in the College catalog, the divestiture of the College's stock holdings in corporations which do business in South Africa and the elimination of sexist and racist college practices.

"We endorsed the sexual orientation proposal even though the faculty rejected it," stated Diana Strickler '73, "because we thought the Williams faculty didn't know much about sex anyway."

Another trustee commented, "We perceive our role as one of taking an active part in the affairs of this college. We're not willing to just sit around and rubberstamp decisions made by those who are less competent than us."

Speaking on the South Africa proposal, trustee Williams S. Sneath of Union Carbide Corporation noted, "I'm pleased as punch that the trustees have finally come to their senses regarding this mess in South Africa. I've been pushing for years now to get Williams to dump its Union Carbide stock but no one would listen to me." Preston S. Parrish, a member of the board of directors at Upjohn Corporation, added, "It's nice to see that the trustees aren't overly concerned with the Almighty Buck. For awhile it appeared that some of our younger contemporaries hadn't heard about corporate social responsibility."

In a news conference held after the trustee visit, President John W. Chandler said, "The entire administration seemed pleased that the trustees had overturned the faculty's decision regarding the sexual orientation clause." He added sheepishly, "Please don't print this but Peter Berek was jumping up and down on his desk and squealing with glee when he heard about the trustee decision."

Other faculty members were apparently shocked and chagrined by the trustee move, however, Sam Rosenberg and Rick Nuccio, among others, issued a statement calling the trustee divestiture decision a "fascist, Commie, pinko, ploy aimed at undermining the necessary and legitimate economic underpinnings of the capitalist system which made our country great." Ray Baker, apparently perturbed by the trustees' endorsement of the sexual orientation clause, added, "I don't know where those jokers got their silly ideas from but it must be due to outside agitation because the enlightened students and faculty here damn well don't support any of this bunk."

WSP China trip ends in tragedy (?)

Only nineteen of the twenty Williams students and faculty members who went to the People's Republic of China for Winter Study will return for second semester classes next week.

Michael R. Lissack, '80, co-planner of the excursion, will remain in Peking for an indefinite length of time pending a police investigation of the circumstances which led to Michael's abduction and mysterious return to a hotel room in that city.

According to members of the group, Lissack was reported missing early on the morning of January 12 when Jeff Kovar, '80, entered Lissack's room to find it ransacked.

"There was a large hole bored through the east wall," Kovar said, "perhaps four feet in diameter. Furniture was overturned. Windows broken. I reached up to light one of the lamps, but the bulbs were missing. The phone was off the hook. And Michael was gone."

Kovar also said that he and members of the group became convinced that foul play was involved when they found Lissacks' personal set of silver wear scattered about the bathroom. "He never went anywhere without them," sobbed Nancy Richman, '80, who said she was shocked by the tragedy.

In a communique received Monday morning, however, the Chinese government informed Williams College that Lissack had been returned to his hotel room sometime over the weekend but would remain in Peking for an undetermined length of time. According to the communication, Lissack had requested a bodyguard and legal aid in order to pursue justice "at any cost."

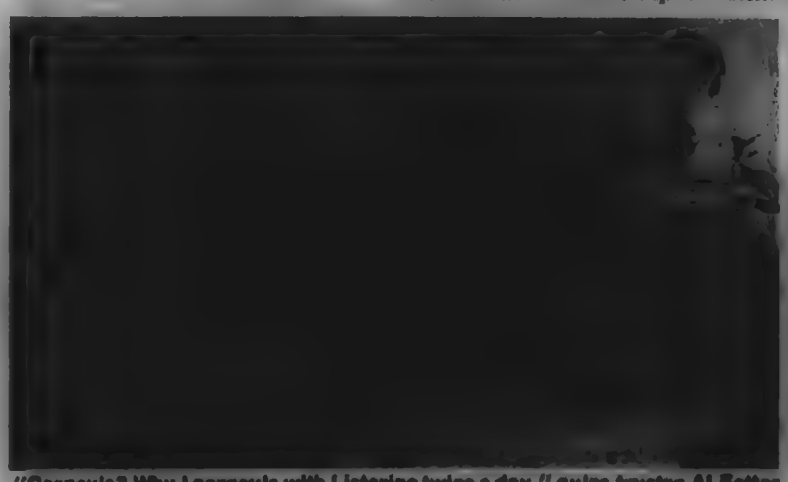
Chinese officials have offered extensive remunerations both to Lissack and the U.S. government if he leaves China within the next 24 hours.

Disciplinarians convene

by Mac David

The Discipline Committee will hear the case of two students caught putting Sugar Frosted Flakes in granola packages, according to an inorganic Record source.

"We view this as completely unacceptable behavior," wailed Dean of the College Peter Berek. "Students have a right to uncontaminated granola, and the infringement of that right by a small minority of prejudiced, insensitive Tony-the-Tiger fans can not be tolerated."



The Sugar Frosted Flake incident took place last week at 4 a.m. The perpetrators slipped into dining halls across the College, opening granola packages and filling them with Sugar Frosted Flakes. The crime was not reported for several days, and anonymous granola eating sources have revealed that they were keeping the switch secret until they finished all the Sugar Frosted Flakes.

Berek refused to name the conspirators, citing the secrecy of disciplinary proceedings. "However, we have encouraged them to publish a letter of apology in the Record," he added.

Berek told the Record that a group of concerned students were forming the Williams Granola Support Organization to fight prejudice and support granola eaters who could not discuss their problems with non-granola eaters.

The Prospect House Dry Cereal Coalition announced its support for the action, commenting that, "It's that much less cereal for the wets to put milk on."

"I'm glad to see the subversive granola movement resisted by this courageous group. However, it would have been more impressive if they had burned the stuff," praised a source who asked only to be identified as Crazy George of the Lissack for President Committee.

Garfield becomes a prison

by Andy Valeri

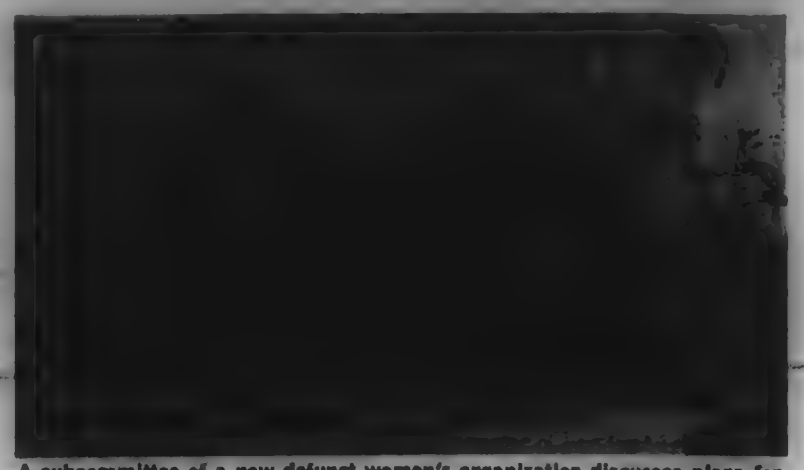
The trustees approved today a proposal to convert the Garfield House into a detention center for incorrigible sexists, the Record learned today.

The renovation began secretly a year ago, but was not announced pending final approval by the trustees.

The plan was originally proposed by a now defunct women's organization. Dean of the College Peter Berek commented that until he heard of the proposal, he had been considering various fates for Garfield House, and was negotiating with the National Organization of Women, who wanted to purchase the house as a national headquarters building. "Turning Garfield into a pen for all those sexists won't be quite as profitable, but the idea has promise," he gloated.

Berek also hinted that Garfield Detention Center could be used to house other incorrigibles such as the light bulb syndicate and the inflatible doll monopoly." The Justice Department Antitrust Division has been looking into the latter case," revealed Berek.

Director of Student Housing and Sexist Detention Charles Jankey told the Record that most of the cells are completed now, and lack only bars and locks. He estimated that the first sexists would be moved in by early March.



A Discipline Committee spokesman also hailed the renovation as "an opportunity for us to start nailing people to the wall instead of just giving them this worthless disciplinary probation bit."

Associate Dean Christ E. Roosenraad told a Record reporter that the conversion was the conclusion of a process that began three years ago when the Class of 1978 was included in upper class housing.

"We chose those men in the Class of 1978 that displayed the greatest tendency toward sexism, and placed them all in Gar-Wood House. We figured that they couldn't do any harm out in the boondocks and would all be in one place once Garfield Detention Center was completed. We continued the procedure for the Classes of 1979 and 1980," sneered Roosenraad.

Roosenraad chuckled when confronted with the fact that the inclusion process is random. "You didn't actually believe that garbage Jankey's been telling you, did you?" scoffed the housing czar.

Several members of the house wondered if Garfield Detention Center would be coeducational. "Since sexism has been outlawed, I'd hope that the Center would not be restricted to incorrigibles of one gender," said the File '78, a Gar-Wood incorrigible.

Athlete of the Week

Senior Don Toumey, known to his friends as "The Tool", has been named Record Athlete of the Week for his dazzling display of athletic prowess at Driscoll Dining Hall last Saturday. Toumey single-handedly led a massive retaliatory strike against the murderous horde of Fitch-Prospect at a devastating food fight launched at his person. Toumey allegedly fought for his honor and his manhood, after being verbally castrated by his peers for refusing to eat his Wheaties with milk.

Toumey emerged victorious after a long and furious battle which left Driscoll all but devastated. Standing proudly atop tuna bumstead and chicken cutlet encrusted bodies, Toumey was heard to declare, "Take that, you fascist wussies!!" Lynn Collins, president of Prospect House, while proud of Toumey's victory, had a few misgivings: "Who's going to clean up all this?"

Honorable Mention: Jeff Stewart for his display of superhuman stamina with his pet inflatable doll, and Don Perry and Scott Ketcham for their taxing contribution to the renovation of Garfield. Better luck next time, guys.

Editors leak "Lique"

Managing editors of the Record Keron Walker and Nancy Richman have announced that they will seek funds from the College Council to finance an alternative weekly news journal, tentatively called "Lique", which will begin publishing next semester.

"We were dissatisfied with the irresponsible reporting and editing policy of the Record," Richman said. "Any newspaper that knuckles under to the pressures of lobbying groups like the Williams Women—excuse me, the Williams Feminist Alliance—hasn't the character necessary to satisfy such a demanding campus as that of Williams."

According to Walker, the new paper will attempt to capture readership with innovative layout and interesting new columnists. "We will print on triangular paper, and make it our policy only to use round photographs. As for content, we have employed Jeff Stewart (formerly class '80) to write a column called "Reserve rooms not required" and we will also carry a weekly feature entitled "Short Shits" in which members of the college community will have a chance to publicly pus on one another."

The name "Lique" was chosen in a campus-wide contest from among the most blatantly offensive suggestions. "We wanted to make sure that someone would pay attention to us," Walker said, "and the only important happenings on campus seemed to be tarred with that epithet. Dean Berek has requested that we write a letter of apology in the first issue and advertise an open forum to discuss the matter, but besides that, we have encountered no trouble."

When asked of the Record's reaction to the defection of two top-eschelon executives, Editor Chip Buckner remarked, "Aw, they were just straw dogs anyway. Besides, 'Lique' will go under in less than one issue. Women don't know how to manage money."

"We've been had!"

Wesleyan whips Williams 20-1

by Chet Ahmad,
Super Student

The Williams College men's varsity hockey team jubilantly left the ice after last Saturday's game, thinking they had just won an awesomely convincing 20-1 victory over the hapless Wesleyan Cardinals. But those same smiling faces were staring in disbelief only moments later as Coach McCormick gave them the bad news: the always shifty Cardinals had done it again; they had deviously (but nonetheless successfully) beaten the Ephmen on a technicality.

It seems that the Wesleyan goalie, Joe Sivve, skated into position in front of the Williams goal at the start of the game. And for the next three periods the Ephmen proceeded to erroneously pound twenty goals past him. "I knew it was too good to be true," said a frustrated McCormick after the game. "I guess I should have suspected something when their goalie (Sivve) skated out with tape covering the eye-holes of his mask."

Wesleyan's "best laid plan" however did momentarily falter early in the second period when a Wesleyan reserve player, who apparently was in the can during the pre-game strategy session, dumped a goal past the Williams goalie, into what was in fact his own net. After the goal, the Wesleyan goalie was banging his stick on the ice; not out of joy, but out of frustration for having lost the shutout.

This is the third consecutive game the Cardinals have won from the Ephs through chicanery. Earlier this season the Cardinals shut Williams out 1-0. In that game the shutout was attributable to someone's stealing the red colored goal-indicator bulb from behind the Wesleyan net. In their last meeting of last year, Wesleyan had a plexiglass shield installed in front of their goal, and the Zambone operator undetectedly switched the shield between periods.

Despite the bitter loss, one Ephman skated his way into the record books. Matthew St. Onge, the freshman standout who scored five goals, broke his personal record, (which was previously four,) the Williams team record, the rink record, the Little Three record, the E.C.A.C. record, and the national and world records for the most goals scored into his own net by a skater, without an attempt on his life by a fan.

NESCAC introduces new rule for small college basketball games

by Peter B. Lipstz

"Basketball is entertainment. It should therefore be exciting—to increase crowds, not depressing." With these words, Robert Peck introduced the Home Court Cheat Rule to the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) at its annual meeting last week in Boston.

Most of the other participants at the conference quickly supported Peck's plan. The seventy delegates voted to enact the new rule immediately. "It should create a better atmosphere at the small colleges." Peck pointed out, "No one likes to see the home team lose."

The rule is designed to guarantee a home team victory, while still keeping the game exciting. The game itself will go on as usual, until there are only two seconds left. At that time, there will be an official time-out so that each team can plan its final strategy. The clock then alternates between two and one seconds until the home team takes the lead. "This would allow the home team to always make a dramatic finale," said Peck.

An interesting offshoot of the rule is that the home court advantage is given only to schools belonging to the NESCAC. Because Union does not participate in NESCAC events, it will not be given the home court advantage in its game against Williams next Saturday.

While discussing the new rule with the Williams basketball staff, Robert Peck also pointed out that we played far too many NESCAC teams. "We need more diversity," he said. Next year's schedule includes such exciting teams as North Carolina State (played at home), and fewer NESCAC teams on the road. Coach Tong tells us to expect a fantastic season.

The rule was enacted January 18th, which means it should have been in effect during last Saturday night's game against Brandeis. Coach Tong was surprised when he realized, as did the rest of the Williams team, that the two uninformed officials at the game would not allow Williams another chance at the basket. "So really we won," Tong affirmed, "and we'll carry that game as a victory on our record books."

The B-ballers plan another exciting victory tonight against Trinity.

College shifts endowment-no more S. African investments

by Fleet Scribbler

President John Chandler announced today that the College will sell all its holdings in corporations with operations in South Africa. Chandler characterized the decision as "a response to widespread student criticism of College investment in an immoral racist regime."

After lengthy deliberation, the Board of Trustees decided to invest the entire proceeds of the sale in Chile due to the absence of racial bias on the part of the Chilean government. "General Pinochet has shown a commendable lack of race prejudice in the treatment of his people," said Chandler. "Unlike the reprehensible racist regime of John Vorster, the Pinochet regime oppresses all races equally."

The trustees also considered investing in Cambodia, which Chandler described as "a society completely free of race prejudice." He commented, however, that a group of trustees sent to Cambodia to search for investment opportunities has not reported back yet. "We assume they were so impressed by their experience in Cambodia that they were unable to tear themselves away long enough to report their findings."

A group of students from the Friday Night Coalition announced their intention to go to Cambodia to investigate. "We suspect the trustee committee has discovered some immoral investment opportunity which they are trying to keep secret. We intend to uncover it," said a coalition spokeshumanoid.

Chandler praised the Chilean government for its progressive voting and citizenship policies. "In South Africa, only a minority holds full citizenship and voting rights. In Chile, on the other hand, the entire nation holds all the rights and privileges of Chilean citizenship, and is permitted to vote in General Pinochet's decennial elections," he commented.

Road rally

Wood House's roadtripping Free University culminated in a road rally to Skidmore last night. The winning entry, Bob Evans '78 completed the run to Saratoga Springs in less than 45 minutes, eclipsing the old record by 10 minutes.

Like the previous record holder Jack Maitland, Evans decided that a straight line was the shortest distance between two points, and drove across rather than around the frozen Saratoga reservoir. Three other cars attempted to follow Evans across, but his engine melted the ice behind him, making the journey increasingly treacherous. The names of the other drivers are being withheld until next of kin are notified.

Organizer Jeff Delisle commented on the interest in his program. "We knew some guys were hard core, but this guy Evans, well, he was hard up."

Frosh days forum meets

by Sue Luciano

At an open forum Jan. 23 to discuss Freshman Days, students focused on Purple Key Night and WOOLF trips as they expressed dissatisfaction with the way freshman days are run now to Dean of Freshman Lauren Stevens and members of the College Council's committee on freshman year.

Linda Smith, president of Purple Key Society, said the group recently voted to eliminate the freshman singing contests. A final vote on the subject will come at an upcoming Purple Key meeting.

Others at the forum expressed dissatisfaction with all of Purple Key Night. The alternative many favored was to have each organization set up a booth in the field house some time during Freshman Days and allow freshmen to go through and talk to representatives from groups.

Stevens said he felt the freshman singing contest was valuable in promoting entry unity.

Tom Black '80, organizer for the Williams Organization for Outdoor Living for Freshmen (WOOLF), said that while the program's opening last fall had drawn praise, because of administrative pressures there would not be an outing before Freshman Days this year as last.

Stevens said he felt one group arriving before another could contribute to divisiveness within the freshman class. Many trip participants spoke up to deny the trips had created divisions. They spoke of the trips as their most valuable experience during their first days at Williams, an alternative to the keg party in the Quad.

The forum was the fruit of the College Council's committee on the freshman year. The group coordinated by Galli and moderated by JA Chris DiAngelo '79, will report to the council soon.

CHARLES ROSEN, famed pianist and music educator, will give a free lecture at Williams College on Feb. 3 at 8:30. Rosen will also present a concert in Chapin on Feb 4 at 8:30.

Trustees raise fees

by Dave MacGregor

The Board of Trustees appointed Madeleine Korbel Albright to a three-year term as trustee, promoted three faculty members to associate professor with tenure, and approved a $450 increase in tuition and fees at their quarterly meeting last week.

The board also approved a budget for the 1978-79 year and formed a committee to advise them on voting the College's stock proxies on proposals "relating to social issues," President John Chandler announced Wednesday.

The trustees ratified the recommendations of the faculty Committee on Appointments and Promotions that Assistant Professors Raymond Baker, Zirka Filipczak, and Charles Karelis '66 be promoted to associate professors with tenure, effective July 1, 1979.

The 1978-79 budget will total $19.6 million, said College Treasurer Francis Dewey III '41. This year's budget, will show a small administrative surplus of around $7000, he added.

Tuition

The increase in tuition and fees was prompted by continued inflationary pressures, said Chandler, including faculty and staff salaries, supply costs, and energy costs, which have climbed 118 per cent in the past five years. Over that period, the cost of attending Williams has risen at approximately the same rate as the consumer price index. This year's increase is significantly less than the increase in average family income, Chandler noted.

Stocks

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Proposals "will study shareholder proposals relating to social issues and advise the Trustee Finance Committee on voting stock proxies," explained Chandler. The Gargoyle approaches trustees on stocks, sexism

by Scott Fenn

In an atmosphere which ranged from cordial bantering to terse debate, members of the Gargoyle Society—along with representatives from the Williams Feminist Alliance, the Thursday Night Coalition, the Williams Gay Support Organization and the Committee on Black Students—met with a group of trustees last week to discuss campus issues and problems.

Prior to the meeting, Gargoyle had decided to use its annual meeting with the trustees to address three major issues which had surfaced during the Fall semester—the inclusion of a sexual orientation clause in the College's non-discrimination policy, sexism at Williams and the College's investment policy with respect to South Africa.

Speaking to the sexual orientation issue, Gargoyle member Lisa Capaldini outlined the College Council's endorsement of the need for a sexual orientation clause and the Faculty's subsequent rejection of the proposal. "People keep asking why this needs to be done," Capaldini stated, "but the real question is 'Why shouldn't we do this?'" She added, "All we're asking the College to do is to publicly state that it is neutral with regard to the issue of an individual's sexual preference."

Responding to Gargoyle's call for trustee action, Trustee Martha R. Wallace questioned the need for formal administrative action. "If there's a problem here," Wallace stated, "you need a public relations movement among yourselves but not a statement from us that couldn't really carry any weight."

Capaldini, countering this reasoning, argued, "the legalistic approach can affect attitudinal change." She stated that a public and official assurance that the College did not discriminate with respect to sexual preference would be legally binding and would serve as a "catalytic agent", in promoting tolerance in the Williams community. Capaldini cited the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution—those which insured blacks of their civil rights after the Civil War—as an instance where legal action helped catalyze social change.

Trustee Robert J. Geniessee noted that he was concerned about the potential impact that such a statement might have on the College's image to prospective applicants. Another trustee added, "By putting this in we'd be opening up the College to a plethora of potential problems."

Addressing the issue of sexism at Williams, Valerie Andersen of the WFA spoke in support of a seven point proposal which that group had drawn up and Gargoyle had endorsed. The proposal called for:

1.) a concerted effort to hire and promote qualified women professors and administrators;

2.) the separation of the position of Affirmative Action officer from the Dean of the Faculty's responsibilities;

3.) curriculum changes in the form of the addition material by and about women to courses at all levels;

4.) expanded opportunities for older continuing education students;

5.) the hiring of a female gynecologist;

6.) the implementation of co-ed freshman entries; and 7.) the inclusion of the sexual orientation clause in the College's non-discrimination policy.

Trustee reaction to the Feminist Alliance's presentation centered almost exclusively on the question of the need for a separate Affirmative Action officer. Trustee E. Wayne Wilkins said, "I don't understand the logic of having an Affirmative Action officer who isn't on the faculty because such a person would have no authority." Trustee Charles H. Mott echoed this view stating, "You're going to get the issue sidetracked if you take it away from the top management people."

Representatives from the WFA argued that the present situation, where the Dean of the Faculty also served as the Affirmative Action officer, was conducive to conflicts of interest. They also noted that a separation of the position "would allow Williams to really look for qualified people instead of just playing a numbers game."

New law ups minimum wage campus-wide

by Ann McCabe

On November 1, 1977, President Carter signed legislation raising minimum wage as of January 1, 1978 through 1981. This January, the minimum wage went from $2.30 to $2.65 an hour. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act (commonly known as the "MacDonald" law), educational and non-profit institutions can pay less than minimum wage so long as they pay no less than 85 per cent of minimum wage or $2.26.

The main effect of Carter's initiative is a $0.10 across the board increase of the payroll. Those formerly earning $2.10 to $2.25 now earn $2.26 on the basic pay scale. The largest employer, dining halls, pursuant to a minimum wage policy, upped wages to $2.65. Not all student employers on campus followed suit though all increased wages at least 10 cents.

Student library and museum supervisors are among the highest paid ($3.10). The library has three positions: clerk, specialist (post freshman year), and supervisor. These positions augment hourly pay respectively from $2.35 as do other positions based on seniority around campus. Technical workers are now paid $2.70, non-technical $2.50. Monitors, clerical workers, and switchboard operators, who sit at a desk and can theoretically do homework, now receive $2.45, an increase from $2.25. Security monitors' pay amounts to $2.50 an hour.

Sophs propose co-ed frosh dorms

Personal adjustment problems prompted Sally Brown '80 and Eric Scheye '80 to devise the Morgan Experiment, a proposal which would introduce a co-ed entry system for a limited number of freshmen living in Morgan Hall next year. The Committee on Undergraduate Life is expected to consider the proposal later this Spring.

"The present entry system, although desirable for many, can be seen as restrictive in a social sense," explained Scheye and Brown. "Not all students feel comfortable in an all-male or all-female dormitory where great emphasis is placed on entry unity and interaction with members of the opposite sex," they continued. "We feel that the initial pressures to 'meet people' could be relieved more easily in a co-ed entry."

Specifically, the experiment would involve the placement of an equal number of men and women in each entry who would live on alternating floors in the dormitory. This would facilitate compliance with Massachusetts State law which requires separate bathroom facilities explained Brown who feels that "Morgan Hall is a desirable location for the experiment." She noted that "in conducting this experiment in a large, centrally located dorm rather than a smaller more isolated building such as Lehman, we anticipate that other students will be able to chart the progress of the entries."

"The present entry system can be viewed as one of the college institutions which perpetuates certain sexual stereotypes," observed Scheye and Brown. "By integrating Morgan Hall and creating a more natural living situation, we would hope that some of the traditional sexual stereotypes might disappear.

"In general, we feel that tension between the sexes would be relieved," they continued. "This alternative might also benefit the college economically," Brown added, "as damage bills resulting from water-fights would be reduced as less drastic courses for interaction would be available."

Wald outlines history of universe

"The planets are the dead ashes of this universe. But we and the stars—we're alive."

So Dr. George Wald, 1967 Nobel prize winner and retired Harvard professor, tied life on earth to the life of the universe in his lecture before a full Chapin Hall audience Jan. 23.

With no way to prove that extraterrestrial life exists, Wald first outlined the requirements for life: water, moderate temperatures, available carbon. Then he argued that since there appear to be a billion planets capable of supporting life, odds are high that it has evolved elsewhere in the universe.

Wald went on to tell the life history of the universe, from the "Big Bang" that cosmologists believe gave it birth to its present expansion into infinity. He also speculated on the lives of stars, and traced their lives from genesis as coalescing hydrogen clouds to their ends as black holes.

Narrowing his examination of life in the universe to earth, Wald recounted current theories on the evolution of life here, from bacteria in the "organic soup" of primitive oceans to social man.

Wald discounted the divine creation theory, claiming life evolved by natural selection. "The whole process is one of editing, rather than authorship," he said.

Definding his extrapolation of the beginnings of life on earth to all life in the cosmos, Wald said that while the basic requirements for life must be the same everywhere, the course of evolution is probably unique on each planet. "I think we are the only human beings as a species in the universe," he added.

The end of Wald's lecture and the questions following in both Chapin and Dodd House shifted the focus of the talk from a description of life to the Nobel prize winner's exhortations to defend life on earth and students' reactions to his exhortations. Questions continued past midnight.

"Begin to live politically," argued Wald, as he urged listeners to unite against the proliferation of nuclear power and atomic weapons. "Now we're told we can't live without nuclear power," he said. "We can't live with it."

Speaking on the problems of nuclear power and the chances for nuclear holocaust, Wald said, "It's not my problem—I've had my life." He added angrily, "If you're such fools as to allow this to happen to you, you deserve it."

Despite popular demand, co-ed showers would not be included in the Morgan experiment.

committee will consist of two faculty members, two students, Dewey, Provost Neil Grabois, and "one or two" alumni. Chandler will select the members in consultation with the faculty Steering Committee and the College Council.

The trustees also discussed several proposals by the Williams Feminist Alliance concerning sexism. However, said Chandler, the trustees felt that the problem "should be handled at the faculty and administrative level," and that the board should not intervene directly.

New Trustee

Albright, a 1959 graduate of Wellesley College, received a Ph.D. from Columbia in 1976. She is chief legislative assistant to Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, and is married to Joseph Albright '58.

Chandler confirmed the trustees' policy of increasing the number of women on the board. He added that Albright's background in government would be especially advantageous to the College with the federal government "looming large" in the managing of the College. Her experience in Washington would also be useful, with large numbers of Williams students seeking careers in the federal government, Chandler noted.

He commented that, while Albright was not an alumnus, her interest in the College was great, and she was prepared to devote the necessary amount of time to trustee duties. "She is undoubtedly busy, as are all the trustees, but we have discussed the matter and are convinced there will be no problem," stated Chandler.

Albright, unlike most of the trustees, does not have a corporate or financial background. Chandler agreed that the board, in its new appointments, intended to diversify the career backgrounds of its members.

The second phase of the Chapin Hall renovation is about one month behind schedule, Dewey revealed. He said he expected the construction to be completed by the fall deadline, or would be at most a few weeks late. The third phase of the renovation is not under active consideration at this time, he added, but is part of the College's "longer term" plans.

Letters: Trustees endorse amendment

South Africa

To the editor:

In an effort to dissuade students from signing the petition concerning Williams' investment policy in South Africa, a short quotation by Richard Lyman, President of Stanford University, was recently placed in many students' S.U. boxes. The gist of the quote was that if Williams were to use its investments in South African corporations as leverage to influence South African politics, the college would become a "partisan social agent" and not a "forum of free debate and research of issues."

The distributor of the short note failed to realize that taking a passive role and continuing to support corporations which are discriminating against Blacks is, in itself, a form of political involvement. In this case, a refusal to act constitutes a stance in favor of maintaining the status quo. It would be hypocritical to verbally denounce racism and other forms of injustice while similtaneously giving them financial support. As Williams has already made a substantial amount of investment in these corporations, the college is already involved. It is necessary to decide whether that involvement will continue to be in a form which supports the apartheid system, or one which improves the conditions under which Black South Africans live, and as rational human beings, members of the Williams College community must stop ignoring the problem.

Tauber rebuff

To the editor:

From an educational point of view, I have some difficulty understanding the Political Science department's "creed-blind" policy outlined in Prof. Tauber's letter of January 6.

Surely when the Political Science department searches for a person to fill a vacancy within the department, it is looking for the best teacher-scholar that it can find to fill the opening. One would expect that if Professors Greene, Brown and Baker left, the department would look for the best teachers-scholars it could find in the area of international relations, not in political science in general. The department seeks to fill holes.

The absence of a conservative from the political science department is an educational hole. As I learned this year by taking a Constitutional Law course from a conservative, classes taught by liberal professors who discuss conservative doctrines are inadequate substitutes for the intellectual challenges produced in a class which slants in the direction of a professor's conservative ideology. A devil's advocate is no substitution for the animal itself.

At least one other department on the Williams campus, has, I believe, recognized this to be the case. The Economics department during my four years at Williams made an effort to find and hire a Marxist and a University of Chicago economist.

I can see no reason to stretch the principle of equal opportunity to ideological preference when the result is the denial of important educational experiences to liberals and conservatives alike.

I would not expect the department to seek a balance in ideology or to hire a less than competent conservative. However, the department's attitudes toward hiring lead me to wonder if they explain in part the growing number of Economics and political Economy majors relative to Political Science majors at Williams over the last half decade.

Trustees

To the editor:

I am writing at the request of the Trustees to report that we have thoroughly reviewed the sequence of campus events relative to the proposed amendment to the College's official nondiscrimination statement. We are grateful to Gargoyle for the thoughtful and articulate manner in which the subject was presented to the Campus Life Committee Thursday evening.

The Trustees have asked me to inform you that they endorse the response of President Chandler to the College Council resolution which urged such an amendment and support the action taken by the Faculty in its meeting on December 14, 1977.

We assure you of the continuing interest of the Trustees in helping to maintain at Williams an environment of respect and tolerance for a diverse community of students, faculty and staff.

Sincerely,
E. Wayne Wilkins, Jr., M.D.
Chairman, Campus Life Comm.

Movie news

To the editor:

I would like to thank Matt Cole for information regarding the crucial scene that had been spliced out of Psycho. Until having read his letter I was not aware of the problem. The company has been informed of the misrepresentation; we were all led to expect the "uncut" version. The Film Society deals only with reputable film companies, who pride themselves in providing fine prints. Both their reputations and ours rest on overcoming the problem of pirated "classic" scenes such as in Psycho. The Film Society will be opening membership to all interested students at a February meeting. We invite everyone to attend, especially those with ideas of how the Film Society may best fulfill its responsibilities to the College Community. In any event, I hope that film goers will continue to inform the Film Society workers when any problems arise with any showings.

I would also like to take this opportunity to remind everyone of the new lottery which any Williams student can win. The lottery began on Tuesday. (Posters announcing the lottery have been posted all over campus.) For each film a new list of one-hundred student I.D. numbers, chosen randomly by a computer program, will be posted outside Bronfman Auditorium. To discover if you are a winner simply come to the Auditorium before the show with your I.D. and check the list. If your number was selected, you win free admission to the film. Since the computer chose the numbers totally at random, some numbers may appear two or even three times in the same week. If this should happen to you, you win not only admission to the movie, but also your choice of either our Moviegoer Special (six tickets normally sold for $5.) or our Cinema Connaisseur Deluxe (fourteen tickets normally sold for $10.)

If you happen to win on a night when we have a "full house" and don't get a seat, just let the Film Society member who is taking tickets know within twenty minutes of the show and you will be given a ticket which can be used to see any other Williams Film Society film.

If you have any suggestions or questions, feel free to contact me or any other Williams Film Society member.

Interest groups, Gargoyle debate with trustees

Concerning the issue of Williams' investments in corporations doing business in South Africa, Gargoyle member Steve Horton outlined the nature and extent of the College's holdings in corporations involved in South Africa and presented the trustees with two proposals. The two proposals, supported by the Thursday Night Coalition and more than 500 student signatures, called for the acceptance of seven corporate conduct guidelines by all corporations with South African interests which Williams invested in and the establishment of an investment committee to oversee the College's investment policy.

Responding to the first proposal's call for the public divestiture of investments in corporations which failed to comply with the seven guidelines, several trustees spoke about the ineffectiveness of the divestiture route and its costs to the College. Trustee Mott, Chairman of the Trustee Finance Committee, said that while he and his colleagues were sympathetic to the South African problem, "there probably is not any way to deal with this problem through the investment mechanism."

Gargoyle member Scott Fenn challenged this position arguing that "our present investment policy doesn't seem to take into account a moral factor at all." He cited evidence about what a number of other educational institutions were doing to cope with the problem, questioned what the College had done in the past few years to express its concern about social issues to corporations. Mott said that the College did vote on some shareholder resolutions and had written a letter to one company six or seven years ago.

Trustee W. L. Hadley Griffin commented that "the social good that they (American corporations) have accomplished in our country alone would make divestiture wrong and immoral." Trustee Wallace added, "If you bump out the progressive American corporations there, then you're just going to get less progressive European and North American corporations."

Countering the trustee's concern for a high rate of return on College investments, Thursday Night Coalition member Ken Bersch noted that the College was not involved in the lucrative dope trade and stated, "I would hope immorality isn't justified just because we can get a good return on it."

Thursday Night Coalition member Ben Blakney suggested that if the trustees were really concerned about the situation in South Africa then progress could be made. "I think we can begin something right here given the extensive business connections that this board has," Blakney said. "What you say would be heard and would have an impact in the business community," he added.

After a short progress report by the Committee on Black Students, Gargoyle co-chairperson Charles Sanders ended the meeting with a plea for continued communication and interaction between students, faculty members and trustees.

'Ladorvadora' - community pulse via Sawyer

As we at Williams look at a new year, we are being looked at by a new eye. It is called LADORVADORA, and compels a visit to its display in Sawyer Library. We spoke to Thom Gass '78, the Oz behind Ladorvadora, to ferret out the ferment that gave it birth and distribute the diet for its nurture.

Inquisitor: The prominence of Ladorvadora suggests you could hardly have done it alone.

Gass: President Chandler and Mr. Wickander also put their backs into it, as did the College Council. They had the sense of history, the vision, and the enthusiasm to lift Ladorvadora off the ground.

Inqu: What is Ladorvadora?

Gass: It's a spigot in the trunk of Williams' myths—the trunk in which the juice flows, not the one buried under dust and hat-boxes—and it will tap a legend.

Inqu: So you see it as something bound up with Williams?

Gass: What?

Inqu: Ladorvadora.

Gass: Nice name. It would be wonderful if Ladorvadora were to spring up in Shea Stadium, and the Boston Commons, and by the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, but in Williamstown is its most fertile soil.

Inqu: Why is that?

Gass: There's a trace element that induces the growth of heavy paper sheets printed in Bank Script.

Inqu: Who has been doing the calligraphy?

Gass: Melissa Talarico, a student at Berkshire Community College.

Inqu: Will you elaborate as to why Ladorvadora is particularly suited to Williams?

Gass: At Williams, we live in a society ringed in myth, and it's upon myths that the Williams Experience rests. We're surrounded by the Purple Myths; the Log stands in tribute to Mark Hopkins, buried on campus along with Ephraim Williams. The Amherst rivalry is a propelling myth. The whole College settles into a mythic frame to think that in a 184 year old tradition, we need only stroll past the portraits of thirteen men to arrive at the first President, Ebenezer Fitch.

Inqu: So in other words, if Dallas-Fortworth were hyphenated by a strong common tradition, we might see Ladorvadora there?

Gass: And if your grandmother had—-s, she'd be your grandfather.

Inqu: Is there to be a narrative line throughout Ladorvadora?

Gass: No. Each piece is to be a gem.

Inqu: Do you think the space limitation will be restraining?

Gass: Especially to the many epic poets in the area. But a lot can flower in a restricted form, the sonnet for example, or the ballet, or the bullfight.

Inqu: Who is creating these molecules?

Gass: Ladorvadora is a pulse of the greater Williams community; the students, faculty, staff, townspeople, and alumni are all a part of this myth. I'm sure that different cliques will discover Ladorvadora at times, as an elegant forum for allegories of pressing concerns. What a terrific chronicle.

Inqu: What should people do with their "molecules"?

Gass: Get them to the mailroom, the box marked Ladorvadora.

Inqu: Where do the stories go each week after they're displayed?

Gass: They are catalogued as part of the Library, and set in the Williamsiana Collection in Stetson Hall. Also there, will be a book with typed copies of the texts and on the facing pages the author's name and any biography or commentary hit would like to make. The first three stories, that appeared over Winter Study, will be repeated next week, two days each.

Inqu: Do you think of Ladorvadora as a clock?

Gass: How about an ever receeding canvas?

Inqu: Like a clock?

Gass: Exactly. It will certainly be more penetrating than The History of Billboards, and Nudes Through the Ages, which try to give some sort of spirit of the times.

Inqu: Don't you think time will eventually destroy Ladorvadora?

Gass: In an indirect way, by turning the sun to iron. In the meantime, Ladorvadora can cheat time. Its Realm has its own rhythm, a metabolism slower than ours. It will have fresh recollections of what will be irretrievable in our memory.

Inqu: What will be the end of Ladorvadora?

Gass: What will be the end of recorded time?

Student wages rise under new law

The college employs roughly 950 or half the student bodies: 565 dining hall workers, 443 miscellaneous, 173 work-study, and 118 teaching assistants. The latter are paid $300 for 10 hours a week a semester. Jeff Wood of OCC said that every penny increase in wage necessitates a $1000 increase in the student payroll. Thus, the $0.10 increase will cause the payroll to go up to $310,000.

Over the summer, student wages will be hiked further in anticipation of the 1979 jump to $2.90.

Reknown, local talent to perform

charles rosen

Charles Rosen, a major figure in the musical and intellectual world today, will give a lecture-recital in Chapin Hall this evening at 8:30. Tomorrow, also at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin, he will give a Thompson Concert of piano works by Schubert (Sonata in C Minor), Chopin (Nocturnes), and lecture entitled, "Fragmentation of Nineteenth Century Composers."

Internationally celebrated as a pianist, he is also acclaimed as a writer in the field of musical history and analysis. As a recording artist, he has numerous and unusual works to his credit, and as a teacher and lecturer, he has served music education in notable universities in America and abroad.

Born in New York City in 1927, Rosen displayed both talent and interest in music at an early age, leaving the Juilliard School of Music when he was eleven to become a pupil of Moriz Rosenthal, himself a student of Franz Liszt, and Mme. Rosenthal. He worked in composition and theory with Karl Weigl. Rosen is enormously popular both at home and abroad. In 1974, enthusiastic critics wrote from England: "Charles Rosen is not just a pianist, but a musical thinker: his playing proclaims that fact no less than his writing." Following a 1975 appearance as one of several principal participants in the New Zealand Arts Festival, he was re-engaged for a three-week series of concerts in Auckland.

Rosen's book, "The Classical Style: Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven," was published by Viking Press in 1971 and revealed another facet of his talent. Rosen's literary pursuit has continued vigorously with recent publications of "Arnold Schoenberg" and "Music—Public and Private, 1750 to 1850" and in "The Sonata Form".

Rosen's recordings make an impressive list: on the Columbia Masterworks label, he recorded all of the Boulez Piano Works at the invitation of Pierre Boulez, music director of the New York Philharmonic, the last six Beethoven Sonatas, which The New York Times called "a set any pianist would be justly proud of having made," Stravinsky's "Movements for Piano and Orchestra" and Elliott Carter's "Double Concerto"—both at the composers' invitations.

The lecture on Friday, sponsored jointly by the Lecture Committee and the Music Department of Williams College, is free. There will be a charge of $2.00 at the door for the Thompson Concert on Saturday.

judith reichert, james quitslund

Judith Reichert, soprano, and James Quitslund, pianist, will present a program of songs by Fran Schubert and Hugo Wolf Sunday, Feb. 5 at 3 p.m. in Driscoll Lounge. The recital, sponsored by Carter, Dennett and Gladden Houses, will begin with a brief discussion of 19th century German song. Works which follow will be sung in German, with English translations provided. The concert is free and open to the public. An informal reception follows the concert.

Reichert and Quitslund performed together in 1976 at Williams and at The Ancram Opera House in Ancram, N.Y. Reichert sings regularly in the Griffin Hall Concert Series and is a member of the Berkshire Lyric Theater. Her most recent engagement was a series during December of 16 performances of operetta at Ancram. Quitslund, formerly Assistant Professor of German at Williams, is Director of Continuing Education at Harvard University.

"Chop Your Mother," a comedic review of sketches written and directed by Craig Elliot '79 will be presented in the Studio Theatre of the AMT tonight and tomorrow at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are available ½-hour before the performances.

Singer Winchester talks of life, Williams

Jesse Winchester has been doing a lot of returning home these days. Ever since he first returned to the United States last spring, he has been touring this country not only as a singer but also as a returning draft evader. To his audiences he is a hero as both. The concert represented Winchester's return to Williamstown—his home during four years until his graduation in 1966.

But just as his return to the U.S. was more of a tour than a homecoming for the expatriate who is now legally as well as spiritually a Canadian citizen, his visit to Williams was an enjoyable rather than a joyous occasion. "There is some sentimental value in this trip, but the tour wasn't based around that. Economic considerations unfortunately came first," Winchester told the Record.

Tall and wiry, wearing forest green Levi corduroys and cowboy boots, Winchester was soft spoken off stage and statuesque under the lights. Only his face expressed his feelings—his eyes widened and almost seemed to burst every time his music spoke of fear or loneliness or love. Reminiscence is the heart and soul of his music—for people and places of his real or imagined past: Mississippi, Yankee Lady, or Bowling Green. His concert was pleasing but without any surprises.

Winchester's voice carries the show. He even slowed down the old ballads to accentuate their strength. His band is really just a group of backup musicians, only seldom striking out on their own. Winchester is deliberate about everything he does.

During the concert, Winchester shared a few of his thoughts about Williams. "It's a funny feeling being here tonight. I graduated in 1966. If that should worry you, take comfort in the knowledge that I was a very indifferent student," he told his audience. Upon discovering his yearbook picture taped to the piano, Winchester spoke of a friend who had come backstage after a Central Park concert this summer in New York. "This friend of mine, Mike Burroughs, was at the bottom of the class here. Now he's a criminal lawyer in New York operating under the principle that it takes one to know one." I asked him if he ever sees any of the old Williams boys. He said, 'yeah, Jesse, I see them all the time—they were assholes then and they are assholes now'."

It was the part of Williams that one experiences outside the classroom that Winchester remembers most. He put together a series of little bands with other students. They played rock and roll at Freshman mixers and fraternity dances. He also did some writing while at college. But it is the region itself which he enjoyed and misses most of all. "I love New England," he said. "I like the area, and the New England culture—the Yankee culture. It took me a long time to get used to it. I think it is one of my favorite parts of the US. It's civilized, that's what I like about it. It has a history. Time does good things for towns."

He also gets the alumni review now, which he didn't before this summer. "They called up my wife when I was out," he remembers. "They asked if I wanted to get it, and my wife said yes." I would have said no 'cause I would think it was pleas for funds for the alumni fund. Which it was.

"But there was something about me in it. It said that there was a singer named Jesse Winchester, who everyone would probably remember as James Winchester and all of that. And it said that you would probably like his music. With that I felt I really had to give them some money."

It is nice to be back in the U.S., but Winchester still loves his new found Canada. "We just don't have the money or the people to make as much mischief as the Americans even if we wanted to," he states simply. "People up there are live-and-let-live oriented. Northern people seem to have a rational outlook toward things."

Jesse Winchester is very much a man living in the present. And for the present he is working on music for his next album, and dancing his legs off to Rhumba Man.

Women's Art Festival held

This weekend, Saturday and Sunday, the Feminist Alliance will sponsor a Women's Arts Festival.

The festival was conceived and planned by Lauren Iossa '79 who saw a need for the female artists, musicians, and poets of the community and on campus to become more aware of each other's achievements.

The schedule of events includes more than 20 exhibitions of arts and crafts, a variety of workshops, and several performances of music and dance. All of the exhibitions and most of the performances will be held in Griffin Hall. The festival is free and open to the public.

The festival will begin Saturday morning at 10 a.m. Featured during the day will be jewelry-making, tapestry weaving, and quilting workshops. Several area craftsmen will discuss how to establish an arts business at 2 p.m. Also, there will be vocal musical selections and poetry readings.

More music will be heard Sunday beginning at 1 p.m. Selections include works from "The Three-penny Opera", a piano recital in the Chapel, flute duets, a trio for clarinet, horn, and viola, and guitar pieces. Also on Sunday will be a puppetry demonstration and poetry readings. The festival will end Sunday evening with dance performances in the Lasell Gym Squash Courts beginning at 8:30 p.m. Works performed will be choreographed by Beth Popik '79 and Joy Dewey.

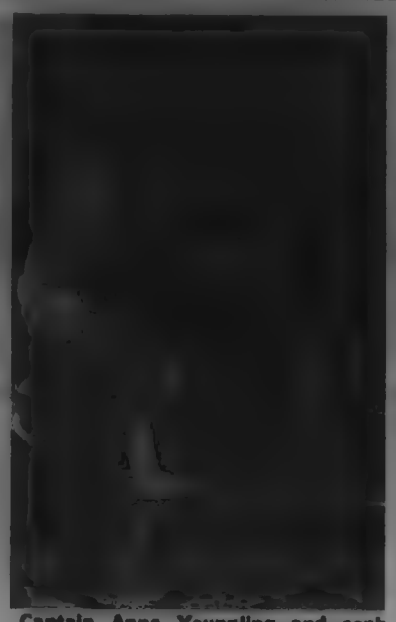
Wrestlers top tri-meet

by Wayne Eckerson



Five double victories spearheaded the Williams' Wrestling team's sweep of R.P.I. and Norwich in a triangular match held in Lasell Gymnasium Saturday.

Williams edged out Norwich 28-26 and overwhelmed R.P.I. 34-14. The wins mark Williams' third consecutive victory and sets its record at 3-4.

Joe Carrese, Hal Zendle, Scott Frost, Mark Walch, and Brian Plitt each registered double victories for Williams. Charlie Davis and Carl Webster split their matches.

Brian Blitt's double victory in the 169 pound class was a welcome surprise for the Williams' team. Plitt's victories were his first of the season. He also had the only double pin performance of the afternoon.

Coach Joe Dailey commented, "Our upset of Albany and the two wins today have given the team a shot of much needed confidence." Coach Dailey hopes the team's string of victories continues against Western New England College and M.I.T. next week.

Captain Anne Youngling and soph Monica Grady, shown here in practice, were key factors in Williams' 73-29 thrashing of Vassar Monday night.

Women thrash Vassar hoopsters

Proving that a good bench is a key to any successful basketball team, Williams' coach Sue Hudson Hamblin called on every player on her women's basketball team to lend a hand in the Ephwomen's 73-29 thrashing of Vassar Monday night.

Williams jumped to an 11-4 lead and used the remainder of the game to integrate less experienced players into the Ephs' running style of play—never looking back at the slower Vassar squad. Led by the pinpoint passing of Leslie Milne and the drive of high scorer Monica Grady (16 pts.) the Ephwomen repeatedly took the ball to the hoop and wore out their visitors with a bench of talented players.

The rebounding sideshow featuring forwards Lisa Capaldini and Anne Youngling expanded to three rings last night as Leigh Wilson came off the bench to join the senior duo. Once in control of the boards, the starters turned the ball over to fast-breaking Grady and Milne, who were back on the mark following a poor showing at UVM last weekend.

Comfortably ahead by 16 points twelve minutes into the contest, coach Hamblin called in her fearsome freshmen Laurene Von Klan and Roberta Tabell who went for 9 and 6 points apiece. Von Klan was hungry on the Vassar boards demonstrating the rebounding skill that made her stand out in the team's only other win to date, over Wesleyan. As in that victory, Williams scoring drive came off the bench, last night accounting for 35 of the team's 73 points.

Williams showed no mercy to Vassar's tiring nine man lineup, playing a full court zone trap in the opening minutes of the second half to keep the pressure on. Alex Pagar and Monica Grady were awesome on the defensive maneuver, stealing three passes for six points within 30 seconds.

A 25 point margin has separated Williams and its opponents in four of six contests this season, with the Ephwomen on the losing end twice, for a 2-4 record overall. This weekend could find the Ephs on the wrong end of that spread again as they head Eastbound to tangle with Tufts University and Radcliffe in a weekend of tough competition.

Student Course Guide questionnaires must be turned in on Monday, Feb. 6, or they cannot be considered for the forthcoming issue. They can be given to Guide representatives in each residential house.

Huskies bow to icemen

Don't bother calling them the Heartbreak Kids anymore. Williams' varsity Icemen, in posting two victories and a loss on its rugged Winter Break hockey agenda, demonstrated to friend and foe alike that it doesn't intend to accept any more pats on the back for nice efforts in narrowly lost causes. This team is starting to gel, and it demands far more of itself than a good effort in defeat.

Tuesday's 7-3 conquest of the Connecticut Huskies, the Purple's fourth win in its last six outings, provided Williamstown loyalists a good view of the recharged Ephmen. UConn took advantage of the Purple Cows' chronic first-period sleepiness and assumed a 2-1 lead on two easy shovel shots past a helpless Mike Moulton. Sophomore Jim Rooney notched Williams' only first-stanza score when he deflected Tom Hobert's knee-high centering pass into the UConn net.

The heavy Huskies made it 3-1 in the middle period and fans began to mutter in their scarves. They'd seen it many times before—if the Ephs held to form, it seemed, they'd probably stage a great catch-up rally that would leave them one goal short when time expired.

The Purples did stage that patented late rally against Connecticut (Williams has scored over 40 per cent of its goals in the third period this season), but this time there was a difference. The defense stiffened and didn't let go. Ephs swarmed on Huskies who dared circle behind Moulton's cage. Williams scored six straight times in the final 30 minutes on assorted shots by Chic Johnson (2), Rooney, Dan Sullivan, Joey Merrill and John Bessone. When they skated off victorious the fans were cheering loudly again.

What's gotten into the Ephs? A large share of the credit must go to sophomore goalie Mike Moulton, who has won the first-string position away from Ed Weiss. Moulton has been simply great since coming off the bench three weeks ago, winning four of five games, earning the ECAC Honor Roll distinction, and lowering his goals-against average to a cool 3.00. "He's red-hot for us now," says Williams mentor Bill McCormick.

Moulton got the Ephs off to a happy start on their crucial roadtrip to Maine last weekend, turning back 18 shots by the Mules to score an easy 7-4 win. Williams, once again, had to rally from a two-goal deficit to take the game, but came through nicely on two each by Geoff Daley and Pete Gonye.

Saturday night was the Big One against Division II chief executive Bowdoin (12-1). McCormick elected to go with Weiss against the Polar Bears, explaining that "Bowdoin is a rapid-fire, peppery team and Eddie is stronger in that kind of situation." Weiss and the Purple Wave put on a strong showing against the heavily-favored hosts, fighting back from a 4-1 deficit to tie the game at 5 before tiring at the finish to lose 9-6. Weiss turned in 19 saves, his counterpart Rob Menzies 30.

Racketmen rout MIT 8-1

by Evan Bash

The men's squash team, missing four first-string players who were being rested, routed M.I.T. 8-1 in a match played in Williamstown Saturday. It was the Ephs fourth win of the season against three losses, and gives the racketmen some needed momentum as they prepare for two important matches this week with Dartmouth and Army.

Arnie Cogswell runs circles around a Dartmouth opponent.

Dominating virtually every match, the Ephs outclassed the visitors with superior shotmaking and the court experience gained from previous matches against fine Princeton, Harvard and Yale teams.

Coach Sean Sloane's decision to rest some of his regulars did not harm Williams as three of the four replacements used in the contest came through with victories. Peter Thomsen, playing in the no. six position, and no. nine Bill Whitney both blanked their opponents 3-0. No. seven Wally Miller jumped out in front 2-0 and then held off a strong comeback to win 3-2, while Dave Simpson lost the Eph's sole match of the day 3-1 at the eighth spot.

For the Williams regulars that did play the afternoon was a relief from the usual top-flite competition. Captain Arnie Cogswell swept to a 3-0 triumph and Chip Lindquist and Martin Goldberg followed by identical scores. Jim Parsons and Jon Saunders rounded out Williams' victories with 3-1 wins.

The Ephs anticipate a close struggle with Dartmouth at Hanover, as the Big Green look to avenge several close losses to Williams in the past few years. Army perenially has a strong team, and in this match it will be the Ephs seeking revenge for last year's disappointing loss to the Cadets.

Field contenders did not fare as well as distance runner Dan Sullivan, who captured the mile in 4:20.3 in the tri-meet against Springfield and Lowell last weekend. Williams took third with 42 points behind Lowell, 47½, and Springfield, 52½.

Hoopsters rally belatedly; Panthers edge Ephs, 56-54

by Frank Pergolizzi

Playing the worst first half of basketball a team possibly could, the Williams basketball team rallied in the second half, but all was for naught, as a last second jump shot by Middlebury's Peter Murray from thirty five feet gave the Panthers a 56-54 victory over Williams in a game played at Middlebury's Memorial Fieldhouse.

With the score tied at 54 all and 1:50 remaining, Panther coach Tom Lawson went into a stall offense to play for the last shot. The possession was set up by an offensive rebound by Kevin Kelleher on the second leg of a one and one situation by Mike Waggett. Calling two time outs at the nineteen second mark, Lawson elected to put the sophomore Murray into the lineup. He is the designated long range shooter for the Panthers, but hadn't seen any prior playing time in the second half. Williams Coach Curt Tong countered with a man to man defense. Murray got the ball with 14 seconds remaining, and with Bill Whelan covering him like a blanket, drove to the corner, and threw up a shot. The ball went through with 1 second remaining. Williams immediately called time out but could do nothing on a full court inbounds pass to Andy Straka. The first half was a complete disaster. Totally inadequate on offense and lackluster on defense, Williams went into the locker room with only 23 points and a ten point deficit. The Ephs shot 22 per cent from the floor and were outrebounded 24-10.

Somehow Coach Tong inspired his troops in the locker room as there was a different team in the purple uniforms in the second half. Using a full court press and a new found team offense, Williams ran off a 13-2 steak to take a 36-35 lead at the fourteen minute mark. From there the game was on a seesaw, with Williams leading by four only once (49-45).

The Ephmen are now 5-7 on the season, having lost six of their last seven. They travel to Wesleyan for a 7:30 game Saturday night, as they seek to break the road jinx that has plagued them for two years. Hopefully some Little Three Action will get them rolling.

Tom Balderston goes up for two against Brandeis.

Women pucksters outshoot Union in second period

by Mary Kate Shea

After a sluggish start, the Williams College women's ice hockey team came on strong to defeat Union College 7-1 here in Williamstown. Leading by only a goal at the end of the first period, the Ephs turned on their offense, scoring 3 goals in both the second and third periods to make the close contest a rout.

Williams began its scoring splurge shortly after the 12 minute mark in the second period, registering 3 quick goals, 2 of which were short-handed. Co-captain senior Liza Olsen flipped the puck past the goalie's glove hand. Sophomore Cyn Willoughby pushed the puck in and Webber tallied her second goal of the evening; these two scores followed a hooking penalty to teammate Priscilla Buckley. With less than a minute left in the second period, goalie Lisa Halperin's shut out was broken as Gwen Young tapped the puck past the sprawled Williams goalie, to put Union on the scoreboard.

In the third period, the Ephs continued their attack on the Union net and racked up three more goals before the contest ended. Senior Priscilla Buckley lifted a shot past the goalie while her classmate, Cindy Hill, directed an errant pass into the net, slipping the puck under a collapsed Union net-minder. Freshman Julia Weyerhauser scored on a rebound from her own shot.

Williams tight defense kept the puck in the offensive zone for most of the game. The Eph attack outshot its opponents by a 4-1 margin and Halperin had to turn away only 8 Union shots in the course of the contest. In the 3 games played between the women's ice hockey squads from these two schools, Williams has outscored Union 25-1.

Single strengths result in 2 swim team wins

Men's

Freshman Bill Kelly clinched a splashing Williams victory over Bowdoin with a spectacular win in the required diving event as the swim team fought down to the wire in a 65-48 decision in Maine last Saturday.

All-American Phil Wild and backstroker Don Cameron led the Ephmen with three victories each, but Bowdoin was still within striking distance until Kelly and sophomore Gregg Roux took first and third in the event right before the final relay. Guy Hoelzer, Dave Amlicke, Cameron and Wild teamed up for the last race to add another seven points to the divers' cushion.

Williams swept two events during the meet to Bowdoin's single one-two event. The Beckett twins, Tom and Bill, placed first and second respectively in the 50 yard sprint, while Cameron and Amlicke were the winning one-two combination in the 200 backstroke.

Senior Paul VomEigen lost a close race to the reigning New England champion in the 200 breaststroke, but recorded his best time of the year, 2:17.8.

Sophomore Todd Piper swam strong 1000 freestyle and 200 butterfly races, picking up a third for Williams in each. Another sophomore, Brian Volpp, took a second in the 200 I.M. and a third in the 200 breaststroke.

Tomorrow the Ephmen will meet Springfield College in Springfield for what Coach Carl Samuelson thinks will be a close, exciting match.

Senior All-American Guy Hoelzer took second in the 200 IM at Bowdoin.

Women's

Although a lack of divers immediately set Williams at a sixteen point disadvantage, the women's swim team thundered back with victories in all but one event to whip Bowdoin 77-52 in Maine Saturday.

Linda Reed and Keron Walker had a share in four wins apiece for the Eph-women, as Reed captured the 50 and 100 backstroke and led off both victorious relays. Walker took the 100 and 50 frees and the 50 fly in Williams record time of 28.2 before splitting a fast 24.9 in the 200 Free relay.

Senior Sue Tuttle claimed both breaststroke events while junior Hilary Hodgeson took a second and a third respectively in the 100 and 50 yard events of that stroke.

Co-captain of the team Nina Murphy also swam legs of both relays and ran away with the 100 I.M. before being touched out for first in the 100 Fly, one of the few close races of the meet. Freshman distance swimmer Katherine Pearsall added two more Williams victories in the 500 and 200 yard freestyle races, with a fast 5:35.2 clocking in the 500.

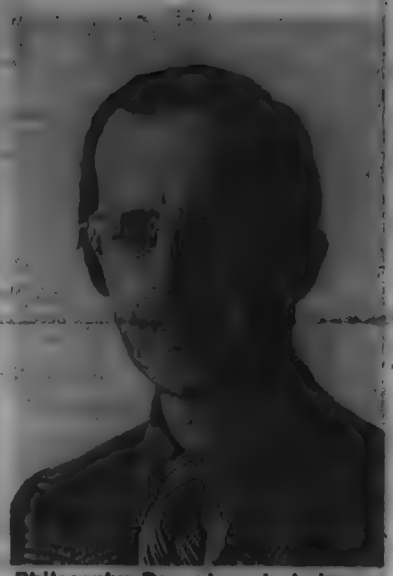
Williams will meet Tufts in Muir Pool for the final dual meet of the season tonight at 6:00.

O'Connor to serve as Dean of College

Daniel O'Connor, currently chairman of the Philosophy department, will serve as Dean of the College when Peter Berek takes sabbatical leave in July. President Chandler asked Professor O'Connor to accept the job Friday night after having consulted the faculty Steering Committee and the Committee on Appointments and Promotions.

The selection also involved a number of students assembled by College Council President Tom Herwitz and the deans' office, Chandler said.

The Dean-designate views himself as "kind of an oil to keep the machinery moving." He said that he intends to act "in some way as an advocate for the students," but primarily as a mediator between students, the faculty and the administration. The key, he believes is "to operate between groups and en-[illegible] their common interests."



O'Connor sees his new position as one in which he "will have the chance to have a greater impact on both the curriculum and campus life." His past involvement includes stints on the Committees on Educational Policy and Undergraduate Life.

On the subject of academics O'Connor hopes to "do something to raise the intellectual level of the curriculum, particularly of the freshman year."

O'Connor holds a great love for the arts. He has performed operas with Ken Roberts, dozens of concerts with Victor Hill, ballets with Joy Dewey and a play with Bernard Bucky. He would like to "see more students involved in the arts." The town, he noted, can seem very isolated and this would be one clear way to counteract that. He has not yet formulated any specific proposals.

Since coming to Williams in 1961 O'Connor has served on the CEP, CUL, WSP, Freshman Year and Discipline committees. He founded the History of Ideas program in 1970.

He holds a B.A. from the University of Detroit (1955) and was a Fulbright Scholar at the University of Munster, West Germany (1956-7). His advanced degrees include an M.A. at the University of Toronto (1958) and a Ph.D. at Yale (1961).

Philosophy Department chairman Daniel O'Connor will replace Peter Berek as Dean of the College.

Washington alums return for annual forums

"The opportunity to do good, the opportunity to do well, and the opportunity to exercise power or be near those who do" were cited by Robert M. Dunn '60, Professor of Economics at George Washington University and a consultant in international finance, as the main attractions Washington offers recent college graduates.

Dunn opened the panel discussion, "Several Perspectives Toward National Energy Policy," Saturday morning at 9 a.m., kicking off the office of Career Counseling's "Washington Weekend."

The panel provided a view of the diversity of Washington jobs available. All the panelists had jobs related to national energy policy. The panel was designed to show what the participants did, rather than to discuss what national energy policy is or should be.

The panelists had jobs approaching the energy question from several perspectives. Jim Bowe '77 and Kirk Renaud '75 both work for the Department of Energy. Bowe works in the Office of Administrative Review applying energy regulations to specific cases. Renaud works in the Solar Energy Office awarding government contracts. Ronald Lanoue '77 is an energy assistant to Senator Charles Percy. Lanoue helps with amendments and legislation, handles constituents and lobbyists, and writes floor speeches.

Representatives from two non-profit organizations were also included on the panel. Virginia Drewry '75 works for the Institute for Local Self Reliance, an urban oriented community economic development group. Thomas H. Fox '61, president of the Washington Alumni Association, works for another non-profit organization, Volunteers in Technical Assistance.

John L. Walcott '71 and Philip T. Walters '64 represented the field of journalism. Walcott is economic correspondent for Newsweek and Walters is a CBS television correspondent. Walters recommended not going from college to Washington. He said, "The thought of going from the happy purple valley to the Potomac River is like going from Knoxberry Farm to Disneyland."

Panel Discussion

Although "Living and Working in Washington" was the title of the panel discussion that followed the panel on natural energy during GCC's Washington Weekend, the event might have been more aptly named, "How to Find Work—In Washington or anywhere else."

Several panelists suggested that enrolling in a one-year masters degree program can greatly enhance the chances of landing an interesting and profitable job. John Walcott disagreed, claiming that the best way to break into the field of journalism is to work the unglamorous beat of a small-town newspaper.

The entire panel concurred emphatically in endorsing one job hunting tip: contacting Williams alumni for assistance in finding work. According to one panelist, alumni are "always delighted" to help out.

Speakers, grants, honors

Indian to speak

David Honyoust, leader of the Oneida Iroquois Warrior Society, will discuss native awareness and contemporary American Indian movements with Williams students at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in 106 Bronfman.

Based in central New York, the Warrior Society is dedicated to diplomatic action which members feel is necessary to preserve the identity of the Oneida nation in the face of encroaching popular culture.

Honyoust's public talk is part of the Free University course entitled Native American Studies, taught by Ron Reid-Hamel of the Berkshire's Native Rights Advocacy. Hamel has also arranged a lecture symposium for Williams in conjunction with the Sociology Department, which is tentatively scheduled for April.

Science grant

Dr. Fielding Brown, a physics professor and visiting scientist at M.I.T., has received a $59,000 grant from the National Science Foundation to study new applications of lasers. Brown's study is entitled "Coherent Far Infrared Sources and Nonlinear Processes."

The purpose of the project is to find new and different sources of infrared power and radiation for scientific purposes. Brown will study the properties of solid substances under radiation from powerful far infrared lasers. To perform the experiments he will design and build new lasers which will use heavy water.

Dr. Brown will conduct the study while on a year's sabbatical at the Research Laboratory of Electronics at M.I.T.

Oakley elected to church council

Francis C. Oakley, Dean of the Faculty and a professor of history, has been elected to a three-year term on the Executive Council of the American Catholic Historical Association, which focuses on church history and related subjects in both the United States and abroad. It publishes the "Catholic Historical Review," which began in 1915.

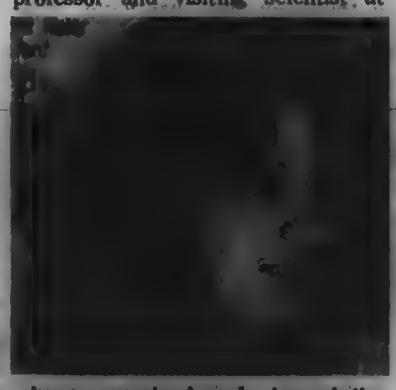
Oakley's most recent works in the field of religion include an article on the Papacy published in the 1974 edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" and a book published in 1969 entitled "Council over Pope? Towards an Interim Ecclesiology."

Oakley was elected to the Executive Council of the Catholic Historical Association late in December at its 58th annual meeting.

Council readies committee guide

Ladorvadora, Dance Society receive funding

The Elections Committee will distribute a guidebook of campus committees to College Council members by early this week, according to Vice-President Peter Friesen. Part of the report, summarizing the activities of the various committees, will go to all students. It will provide them with a "catalogue to use in deciding whether to apply for committee memberships," said Friesen.



Friesen made the announcement at the Council's most recent meeting on Jan. 24. According to Friesen, the report also contains a proposal suggesting that next year's Elections Committee require each of its members to oversee the activities of several council committees. "This is one of the most effective ways for the CC to become more in touch with its committess." he explained. "People will also be encouraged to work harder."

Friesen added that next fall, the Elections Committee will again submit in advance a list of all committee applicants to the council. This enables representatives to evaluate more effectively the experience of people seeking committee positions. By becoming involved in the actual selection process, the council will be able to act as more than a mere "rubber stamp" for Elections Committee decisions, Friesen explained.

In other action, the council approved the Finance Committee's $140 appropriation for Ladorvadora, a serialized mythology created by Thomas Gass '78 and currently on display in the library. This sum will be sufficient to fund 10 "molecules," or brief stories. Originally Gass sought $215 to cover the cost of sixteen stories. He referred to this appropriation as "cautious funding." "The council's generosity is matched by its timidity," Gass commented. He said he plans to appeal to the council again later in the spring when, he claims, "the success of Ladorvadora will make them more enthusiastic supporters of it."

Council representatives voted to provide the Dance Society with adequate funds for two performances sponsored by the Massachusetts Endowment for the Arts, to be held in February and March of 1979.

The Finance Committee is currently preparing a final report of its total 1977-78 SAT allocations. The committee's total outlays approached $100,000. Treasurer Harry Kelly said he hopes to include in the report a study of the committee's SAT expenditures over the past three years.

Timing, tenure, and trustees

Over the weekend President Chandler selected Professor Daniel O'Connor to replace Peter Berek as Dean of the College. The process is amazingly like a tenure decision. The President will take his name to the trustees in April, they will deliberate and then decide whether they should approve the appointment.

The appointment of a dean is of major importance to the College. The question of whether a specific professor gets tenure shrinks to insignificance in comparison. Yet the President will announce the appointment of Mr. O'Connor before the trustees meet, and he will not release the names of faculty members granted tenure until formal approval, weeks after the original decision of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP). Why? Because, they would have you believe, although the President's word is adequate for major decisions, the trustees might elect to reverse the mere minutae of a tenure recommendation, as tenure recommendations are not final decisions.

Who do they think they are fooling? When the President and the CAP make a decision, the students know the trustees will approve. The faculty knows the trustees will approve. The administration knows the trustees will approve. The trustees know the trustees will approve. Hell, one of the trustees admitted he voted for whatever the President recommended.

The students want to know who will not be returning, so why not just give us the CAP recommendations and let us plan our schedules so we can take courses with professors before they leave? It means more to the students, and certainly must be less controversial among the faculty and administration.

Letters: IBM, So. Africa, frosh unity

South Africa

To the editor:

With regard to the recent controversy over Williams' endowment being invested in corporations with operations in South Africa, I have a few comments I would like to share with your readers. While I agree that concern over the political situation in South Africa is justified on moral grounds, I feel that investment decisions should be made on economic rather than moral or social grounds.

A college endowment is not the appropriate vehicle through which to try and force political change. Moral and social issues might come into play when the corporations in question are themselves guilty of discrimination, but this is not really the case we are concerned with. Rather than meddling with Williams' investments, I suggest registering concern by writing Congressmen and-or directors of corporations with dealings in South Africa. Williams College is not at fault, so why should the College's investments be constrained in a manner which could financially hurt Williams?

To illustrate the absurdity of the proposed stock guidelines for the College's investments, let me use IBM stock as an example. At present IBM stock is the largest single equity holding in the Williams endowment. The only problem is in the company's willingness to sell its products to South Africa. These sales represent probably no more than .1 per cent of IBM's $18 billion in revenues worldwide. Nonetheless Williams would have to sell this stock. Proponents of the guidelines would now respond that there are plenty of other investments, so why should this matter? Well, apparently both of Williams' investment managers feel IBM is an excellent stock for the College to hold. To sell IBM stock would be to go against the recommendations of investment experts. Obviously there can be a cost associated with such action. For example Williams might have sold all of its IBM stock in January of 1976 and invested in other securities. Since this time IBM's stock price has fallen about 4 per cent while the Dow Jones Industrial Average is off 23 per cent. Holding other stocks might well have cost an added 19 per cent loss. Considering that Williams holds about $3.1 million in IBM shares, the added loss would have amounted to around $589,000 or $327 per student. I ask you, is it worth $327 to you to know that Williams College has divested itself of stock in a company which has a small part of its sales to South Africa?

If backers of the stock guidelines still feel that stock should be sold in companies merely on account of their operating in South Africa, I have one final question. What do they expect to gain by having the College sell this stock? Perhaps the College will be hurt financially, but let us assume this won't happen. Will the multi-billion dollar companies in which Williams invests be hurt? Perhaps the stocks will become depressed for a day or two as Williams liquidated its holdings, but any long term effects would be negligible. If the stock guideline proponents' ultimate goal is to work for changes in South Africa, there certainly must be a more direct and effective mechanism than forcing Williams to rearrange its endowment portfolio.

IBM Protest

To the editor:

Concerned students will picket the IBM recruitment meeting at Dodd tonight (Tuesday) at 7:00 to protest IBM's involvement in South Africa.

During this month, many companies involved in support of the South Africa apartheid system will be recruiting on the Williams campus. IBM has been especially guilty of support for this racist system by its provision of computers to the South African Departments of Prisons and Defense. Blacks are required by law to carry a passbook—a personal file which allows the government to monitor the bearer's every move. The IBM computers are used by the security police in the otherwise impossible administration of the passbook-laws.

Because IBM South Africa "is profitable and has a potential for future growth," IBM assumes no responsibility for restricting use of its equipment.

IBM controls 50 per cent of the computer market in South Africa. The technological sophistication that it and other American companies provide to South Africa could not be gained elsewhere. This further supports the system of apartheid that violates the fundamental human rights of the vast majority of South Africa's population.

Join us in protesting IBM's role in South Africa.

Sincerely,
Ben Blakney & Mary McCord

Woolf and unity

To the editor:

I do not understand how, on the one hand, Dean Stevens can advocate abolition of the WOOLF program because he claims it may contribute to divisiveness within the freshman class, and then turn around and support the freshman singing contest in the name of "entry unity". What is more divisive to the freshman class as a whole than "entry unity"?

Sincerely,

Viewpoint

Assessing higher learning

by Mitchell Reiss

Having completed two and a half years of my college education, it is perhaps to be expected that I should examine the process of my education up to this point. However, it is perhaps not to be expected that I should possess serious reservations concerning the degree of success in this project.

It goes without saying that Williams possesses an extraordinary academic reputation as well as an interested and articulate faculty. So then, what is the rub? It is one of dissatisfaction. At the back of my mind, there is the constant and nagging feeling of dissatisfaction with my education, dissatisfaction at the system that is shaping my mind into a design I neither desire nor can alter.

At Williams we are given books to read, papers to write, ideas to memorize. The books are by the noted experts in their fields, and we dutifully underline the relevant passages. Enough books and we have an amorphous conglomeration of what are labelled "concepts", to be reshaped, rechanneled, and rewritten in your basic 1,000 word not - to - exceed - five - pages essay.

In this process, intelligence, usually a term hard to define, takes on concrete characteristics. The "intelligent" person is the one who reads his material, takes class notes, extracts the relevant passages, and organizes it well on his essay or examination. Undoubtedly this individual is conscientious and hard-working, one who studies a great deal. (Perhaps the very word "study" is at the core of the problem.) And at Williams College the student is amply rewarded for these efforts.

But where is there room in this system for creative or independent thought? Where is there room for the person who actually takes the time to think? The person who is dissatisfied by the relative ease at which one consumes the material and then vomits it back up, in an organized manner of course, is left feeling unfulfilled, a possessor of a Pyrrhic A or B.

At every turn, the real student, not the one who studies, but the one who thinks, is frustrated.

Too much of what passes for learning, and what is passed off as knowledge at Williams, is in reality a type of transitory enlightenment of the basest kind, to be used, spit out, and then forgotten. The professor is pleased because he has covered the course material set forth in the syllabus, the student is pleased because he has received a grade commensurate with his ability to act within this system, the parents are pleased that their little Johnny or Joan is really LEARNING something, and the administration is pleased that the college is turning out educated young men and women into society.

If this be education, let me have none of it! Where is unique, individual thinking, yes, actual thinking? At every turn the real student, not the one who studies, but the one who thinks, is frustrated. Creativity is stifled, his or her intelligence is stifled, and eventually the student is stifled.

Certainly it is not easy to get people to think, especially those who haven't had to do too much of it. It's damn frustrating, and would most definitely take a tremendous and sincere effort on the part of the faculty. And no less would be demanded from the student body.

Is the goal worthy of the attempt? I believe so. Given the make-up of the college community, is it possible? I don't know. But as long as Williams College would like to be thought of as an institution for higher learning, and not as a vocational school for doctors, lawyers, and bankers, then it must be committed to this attempt.

Mystic Seaport semester beckons seafaring students

by Carol Newcomb '80

Mystic Seaport. The name alone has a romantic ring to it. On a crisp autumn afternoon as the wind shifts to the northeast, a heavy fog envelopes the town, obscuring from a landlubber's view the towering masts of the Seaport's whaling ships. Only the lighthouse beacon pierces the mist. On the river, a lobster fisherman religiously dons his foul-weather gear, while inside the Buckingham house a warm afternoon snack is being prepared in the coals of the morning fire according to an 18th century recipe. (At the Spouter Inn, Charlie Zacchardy, the Seaport's 93 year-old living relic, retells his past adventures.)

Aside from experiencing the charm this Seaport setting provides, participants in the Mystic-Williams program have the challenge of hard-core academics. Prof. Benjamin Labaree, formerly Ephraim Williams Professor of American History, directs the program and teaches history and seminar classes. Maritime literature, oceanography and/or marine ecology complete the schedule. Courses are brought to life by the Seaport and the surrounding area as students have immediate access to historical artifacts, nearby beaches, oceanographic facilities, and libraries. Despite the unacademic air of the Seaport, Connecticut College, the University of Rhode Island, the Coast Guard Academy and Woods Hole provide ample resources. The Seaport library contains an excellent collection of primary historical sources, Portuguese maps, and maritime literature.

In each course, the student is required to do individual research on topics of his own choosing. This provides the opportunity for English, history, and science majors to investigate the influences of the sea on a wide range of subjects. By no means is the program geared only towards oceanographers or historians. It is the perfect opportunity to explore a specific interest, and perhaps broaden the scope of any previous studies by including the sea as a relevant factor.

Seaport workers with first-hand experience in their fields teach maritime skills courses, including boat building, boat repairs, sailing, rigging and celestial navigation. For the novice, the sailing course introduces one to the elementary aspects of maritime maneuverability. For the experienced sailor, celestial navigation or boat repairs offers a novelty. For the adventurous, the Groton YMCA teaches a course in scuba diving.

Living arrangements are simple but adequate. Students live in small houses just a five minute walk from the library where classes are held. They do their own cooking, planning and shopping. The challenge of living so closely in such a small group is one not faced in college dorm life, and it is an important aspect of the semester. (I suggest investing in Peg Bracken's The I Hate to Cook Book!) Despite the gnawing fear the "That guy can't cook more than a hard-boiled egg and a hamburger—and I'm a vegetarian!" the meals were refreshing compared to Baxter's usual.

Halfway through the semester, we left books and household chores behind and escaped to sea for a week. On board the schooner "Westward," we were responsible for sailing the vessel, and in our spare time we conducted scientific experiments, including tagging sharks, estimating krill populations, and measuring the water conditions as they changed with our location. The mates were our teachers during that time. Twice a day they gave lectures on topics ranging from marine mammals to celestial folklore. Our illusions of a free and easy sailor's life were shattered—we came away with the appropriate nickname "leeward railers."

As an escape from academics, the Mystic-Williams program is a failure. As exposure to the sea and the knowledge man has gained from it, the program more than satisfies the appetite of the hungriest scholar. Be your interest in a career involving the sea, or merely in an attempt to diversify four years of college, the semester is an invigorating period.

The deadline for applications for the fall or spring semesters of 1978-79 is February 10, 1978, in the Dean's office.

The Mercury Column: Spectrum

Adlai Stevenson is quoted as saying that he did not find it necessary to be serious about serious things. Any resemblance between Stevenson and me is purely inconceivable but in that, at least, we can agree. The local humorist, writes E. B. White, is always mistrusted; gaiety represents truth in sheep's clothing. But so much has been said about energy problems being the moral equivalent of war that the stridency begins to wear thin.

Last week's fact was that, taking tuitions vis-a-vis the College's energy expenses, about one student in ten goes up the stack at the heating plant. Perhaps the way to dramatize this is to choose, like Shirley Jackson's Lottery, an actual student every other day to make the trip. Historical note: When I came here, then-President Baxter remarked that one assistant professor a year went up the stack. It may or may not be worth recalling that a) an assistant professor's salary was then about $6000 and b) the professor caused more air pollution than today's students do—the College burned coal. Actually, more than one assistant professor must have been lost that way. I recall that fuel oil then (20 years ago) was less than 17 cents per gallon, one-third of the present price. And even with fewer buildings (no Bronfman, no Mission Impossible, no Prospect, no Dodd, a quite different Greylock), the energy costs were certainly more than $6000.

Now statistics can be used to deceive (incroyable!) as well as to illumine, and none of us (I hope) is willing to sustain an equivalence between energy costs and waste. Some energy costs should be allocated to food service (preparation), some to the instructional budget (classrooms and laboratories), some to administration (the lights burn late in Hopkins Hall). Thus one may avoid the crisis mentality by observing correctly that much of our energy cost is inherent in the operation; that we are not trying to emulate the monk in the TV advertisement whose superior expects him to produce 500 manuscript copies with a quill pen by candlelight. Where do we find a viable compromise stand between the Chicken Littles ("The sky is falling!") and the Candides ("Things are for the best in this best of all possible worlds.")?

Professor C. Fuqua's final energy report to President Chandler estimates that we could save 5-8 per cent on our energy expenses, presumably without affecting the quality of campus life. He also estimates that energy costs will rise, on the average, 10 per cent per year. Putting these two figures together leaves us in the position of the southerner who reported to his commanding officer, during the Civil War, "Due to the lay of the land, they are retreating forwards while we are advancing backwards." Nevertheless, no matter where we come down in the Chicken Little-Candide spectrum, it is clearly worth our while to keep as many students as possible outside the stack.

I am the first to admit that the Energy Committee has no sure-fire way to do this. If we had such a way we would sell it to Washington, where they need all the help they can get. Hence this column, hence the open meetings of the committee, hence the articulation of the committee's work with that of the Physical Facilities Study Committee, and hence all of those other hences.

I promised an energy fact each week, but this one is more a top-of-the-head estimate. Given that the head it came off the top of was attached to C. Fuqua, and given his thoroughness in many other computations, I am willing to award it the degree of honorary fact, with all of the rights, honors, and privileges appertaining thereto. I asked him, "How much would we save per year if we dropped all of the campus temperatures 1 degrees?" His reply: "About $4 per student." Now two or three lines of algebra suffice to show a saving of 4 X 1900 equals $7500. In an $18 million budget, that's the smallest crisis response visible to the naked eye.

Note: The first open meeting of the Energy Committee will be held Thursday 26 Jan. at 3:30 in 200 Bronfman.

Pianist Rosen delights audience with an impressive performance

by John Libertine

Charles Rosen, pianist, amazed and delighted his Chapin Hall listeners last Saturday night with his dazzling display of keyboard virtuosity. Rosen played works by Chopin, Schubert, and Schumann to a receptive audience.

Rosen began his concert with two Nocturnes by Frederic Chopin, in which he proved himself an able interpreter of the composer. However, one got the feeling that the pieces could have benefited from a lighter touch. The following Schubert piece showed that he did indeed have such an impressive lightness. (Actually, what he really needed was George Sand sitting next to him).

Rosen next played the Sonata in C minor by Franz Schubert to a slightly over-enthusiastic audience who applauded just a bit too soon in the final movement. This little faux-pas did nothing to deter Rosen from giving a masterful performance of the sonata. This piece showed just how effective his lighter touch could be.

After a short intermission, Rosen returned to perform his piece de resistance, the Davidsbundlertanze by Robert Schumann. His interpretation of the 18 movements, contrasting between loud and soft, lively and somber, humor and sobriety, was superb. Rosen said in his lecture the night before his concert that Schumann was one of his favorite composers. After sitting through his concert, one could see the love and life that Rosen attempts to infuse into his playing.

Rosen's performance met with universal praise from his listeners. After the Schumann piece and encore, Chapin Hall exploded with thunderous applause. It was an impressive and unforgettable concert.

Pianist Charles Rosen acknowledges the applause after his virtuoso performance at Chapin Hall on Saturday night.

First student talent album to be released

Williams College is about to burst into big time music, with the March release of the first album ever of Williams College talent. The album, recorded in January in the WCFM production studio, and in a makeshift studio in the basement of Chapin Hall, is a collection of twelve songs, all performed by Williams students. Acts featured on the album include the Ephlats, Williams Octet, Jazz Ensemble, Scott Lankford, Andy Kelly and Company, The Library Incident, and Eric Pyenson's bluegrass duo.

A first for Williams College, credit for initiating the effort to produce the album goes to the ACEC's Steve Case. Although not a formal ACEC project, Case took charge of contacting record companies, organizing the talent on campus, and promoting the album. Also instrumental in the album's recording was sophomore Bill Beckett, who worked as a sound engineer. Beckett, aided by Stephen Benben, a near-professional studying sound engineering at Ferdonia State University, used sophisticated equipment to work with such complex techniques as overdubbing. Many of the musicians had difficulty in adapting to the professional techniques, Beckett said, but that had been expected. The purpose of the album was not to make money (all they hope to do is break even), nor to hit the top twenty, but to gain experience in recording, while discovering, or furthering, musical talent at Williams. "One thing's for sure," Beckett concluded, "everyone learned a lot this first time."

With more talent and material this year than could have been possibly used, Beckett says he looks forward to a big future for the album in years to come. Next year he hopes to increase the number of original songs from four to twelve. In addition, artists will also be needed, as plans are being made for a student designed album cover. Beckett envisions the annual cutting of the album becoming "an art event."

A musician's perspective, needless to say, differs from that of a sound engineer. Andy Kelly, lead singer and guitarist for the eight member band Andy Kelly and Company, described many of the problems that arose in the recording. "Very unorganized," he called it, as his band had to record between the hardly conducive hours of 1:00 and 5:00 A.M., in a thrown together studio in the basement of Chapin Hall. But even though the recording was inconvenient and uncomfortable, the band was able to perform two of Kelly's own numbers, "Mexican Heartbreak," and "Never Too Late." Kelly can't help but say that "it was a good experience, especially for anyone who wants to go into a career in music." As for himself, having played guitar for 12 years, been in bands for eight years, and performed at an untold number of guest meals, parties, house functions, and coffee houses at Williams, Kelly says he can't see a career in music. "Well, may be just for a while," he smiles.

Another twelve-year guitarist featured on the album is sophomore Scott Lankford. He performed two songs, his own "Sentimental Journeyman" and the traditional collegiate "Vassar Hygiene Song." Lankford, like Kelly, sees no musical career ahead. "I'm not wildly ambitious," he says. "Right now I'm just interested in doing things at Williams." Some of those things include running the Baxter coffee houses, managing concerts, and, of course, writing music.

The album, still untitled, is now being pressed; the release date is set for early March. A promotional coffee house, presenting all the acts on the album, will be held prior to its release. Seven hundred fifty copies of the album, recorded under Case and Beckett's own label, "Purple Cow Recording," have been ordered. They will be sold to students, alumni, and local residents for four to five dollars apiece. Williams students, though many may not know it, have already heard the album. It was played as students arrived to see Jesse Winchester and again during the intermission of the concert. For those who knew to listen, it sounded like a smashing success.

Salem State frustrates Icemen

by Mark Pogue

"If we can play them even for one period, we should be able to do it for 60 minutes. They're obviously a strong team, but I was still a little disappointed with our play overall."

So spoke Williams Coach Bill McCormick following his team's 5-3 home loss to Division II power Salem State Saturday night. The defeat lowered the Ephs' season mark to 7-8 and, more importantly, it loosened their white-knuckled clutch on eighth place in the Division II West standings. Only the top eight teams will be eligible for the post-season playoffs.

The hometown fans did their utmost to get Williams off to an uncharacteristically fast start Saturday, coming up with a shaky but stirring a cappella version of "Our National Anthem" when the machine that normally plays the tape broke down. Williams got the message, and jumped off to its best start in several weeks. It had to, because the 17-4 Vikings came out playing a hard and fast brand of hockey that left the Purple no room for error.

After six minutes of fast skating, sharp passing, and thunderous checking, Salem's Mike Clasby zipped in the puck off a faceoff to make it 1-0. Williams answered with three good shots of its own—including a point-blank blast by Dan Sullivan—but nothing much bothered Jay Palladino, the best goalie in Division II. "We knew he was tough; maybe we tried to make our shots too fine," hypothesized McCormick.

Fiery John Bolduc made it 2-0 for Salem when he ripped down the right wing and worked a two-on-two give-and-go past the Purple defense. Williams, unable to convert on any of four first-period power plays, continued to play well, and seemed content to take a two-goal deficit into the locker room after the first period.

But Salem's Bill Riley was tireless. The eager-beaver frosh swept up a rolling puck at the blue line, drove, and scored as the buzzer sounded. "I distinctively saw the puck not over the goal line when the buzzer went off," said McCormick. The refs disagreed, and counted the goal. 3-0.

Hard-working Geoff Daley got Williams on the board at 2:14 of the middle session, but the Vikes came back with two of their own to make it 5-1. This set the stage for "The Williams Comeback," also known as Period Three. In the final stanza Pete Gonye and Sullivan tallied for the hosts, the Ephs could come no closer.

Women play squash tourney

The Williams Women's Squash team participated in the sixth annual Howe Cup Squash Tournament, staged in the Yale University courts this weekend. Eight Williams women, including, Jane Garvey, Becky Chase, Laura Carson, Marcia Johnston, and Pam Hansen,—faced the Radcliffe-women first, in one division's competition for the cup, winning 3-2. Later that afternoon they easily downed Wellesley in a stunning 5-0 triumph, pushed further ahead beating John Hopkins 4-1.

With only one thought in mind—bringing home that Howe Cup—the women started play on Sunday against Yale, but their hopeful dreams were shattered as they lost 3-2; Chase won by default and Hansen bulldogged to grasp an 18-15, 8-15, 18-16, 15-11, 15-12 win over her opponent.

Worse was yet to come, however, when Williams faced Princeton. Only one game out of five matched was to be claimed by Williams as they were beaten, and the score was a discouraging 5-0. With Princeton and Yale finishing No. 1 and No. 2 respectively, Williams captured third place in a very commendable performance.

Women hoopsters win one, lose one

Although it has been said that you win a few and you lose a few, the Williams' women's basketball team would just as soon win a few more, following a weekend of play which put them 3-5 on the season. Williams headed east Friday to defeat Tufts University 67-46 only to suffer another big loss this time to Radcliffe, 66-39, Saturday.

Against Radcliffe, Williams played a strong game in the first half, staying within nine points at midgame. But missed shots in the second stanza cost the Ephwomen the chance to pull of the upset. Williams worked well against the Crimson 2-1-2 but once inside they were unable to get the shot off. Playing inside, Williams saw little use for their perfected outside shot, which had been so accurate in the Tufts victory. Hitting a meager 6 for 24 in the second stanza the visitors were outplayed 35-17, although coach Hamblin's crew were threatening on the boards, four rebounds behind Radcliffe's tall hoopsters. Late in the game Radcliffe's top scorers were in foul trouble, but Williams' inability to connect on the free throws put the game out of reach.

Offensive leader Maggie O'Brien (10 pts.) also led on rebounds grabbing 13. Forward Sue Wright, seeing her first action for Williams this weekend, had an excellent first half going 2 for 2 on the free throw line, stealing three, and picking off eight rebounds. Williams ran a fast break successfully due to the speed of Monica Grady with 10 points for the contest.

In the Tufts match the Ephwomen never let up, smashing their hosts 67-46. Shooting an improved 48 per cent from the floor, Williams took an early lead keeping Tufts out of range for the rest of the game. Once again it was O'Brien and Grady leading the scoring with 12 and 11 points apiece. O'Brien also dominated on the boards, grabbing 12 rebounds while Sue Wright had 7 in her debut.

Although the team record indicates a rather gloomy season, the Eph-women are looking to brighten their stance tonight as they take on Amherst College for the second half of the first Little Three Women's Basketball championship. Williams, having defeated Wesleyan earlier this season meet the debuting Lord Jeffs at 7 p.m. in Amherst.

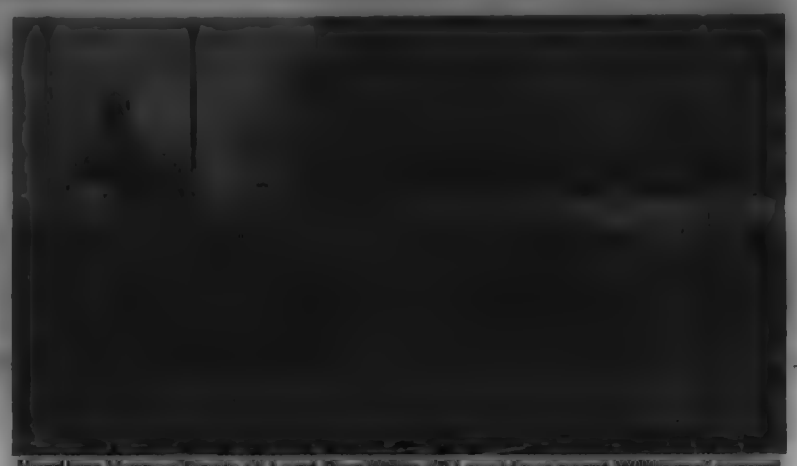
Wesleyan nips Hoopsters

by Frank Pergolizzi

Middletown, Ct. —

Suffering their fourth loss by two points or less, the Williams basketball team blew an eight point lead and lost to Wesleyan Saturday night, 61-59 in overtime. Wesleyan's John Majewski hit two foul shots with two seconds left in the overtime to lift the Cardinals to victory. The game was the opener in Little Three action for Williams.

Williams led by four with 26 seconds left in regulation time but Wesleyan's Tim Schroyer hit both ends of a one and one, narrowing the gap to two. When Williams tried to run the clock down, Wesleyan fouled Andy Straka. The sophomore guard missed the shot, and Wesleyan grabbed the rebound. John Francis fed Majewski under the basket for the tying shot with two seconds left.



The overtime saw only six points scored as both teams played deliberate offenses. Wesleyan won the tap, ran off a minute, then missed their shot. Williams ate up two minutes on the clock, but lost the ball as Matt Spangler and Gerry Kelly were called for traveling as they fought each other for an offensive rebound. Wesleyan's Mike Rierra hit two foul shots at the 1:22 mark, but Kelly came right back with a jump shot with one minute remaining. Wesleyan ran the clock down to six seconds and was forced to call timeout when the referee thought someone on the bench had signalled to stop the clock. Majewski got the ball on the inbounds, dribbled, and threw up a desperation shot that fell no where near the basket. But the referee's arm was up in the air, signalling another last second loss for the hard luck purple cagers. A closing shot by Tom Balderston was blocked as the buzzer sounded.

The first half saw both teams trade eight point spurts, with Williams going into the locker room up by one, 29-28. Schroyer had been hurting Williams early as he scored ten of Wesleyan's first twelve points. Williams then went to a box and one defense, putting Straka on Schroyer and effectively shut him off for the rest of the night. Meanwhile, the Ephs were shooting 60 per cent from the floor, by far their best halftime percentage.

It was a tough loss for Williams, as it was a game that they had in their hip pockets. The game marked the end of a four game road trip—a trip that has turned the season from success to frustration. The Ephmen are now 5-8 and return home Wednesday night as Clark University invades Lasell Gym.

Lord Jeffs squeeze by track team

by Phil Darrow

For the first time in the history of Towne Field House, the home crowd watched the Williams College Winter Track team go down to defeat at the hands of the Amherst Lord Jeffs last Saturday. In a quadrangular meet with unofficial but deeply felt Little Three status, the final tally was Amherst 70, Williams 67, Wesleyan 21 and Trinity 15.

The Ephs were making a desperate comeback attempt throughout the running events. After the field events the Lord Jeffs had a convincing 33-15 lead, and although Williams dominated on the track with a 52-37 edge, the Jeffs managed to squeak by.

Although the field performers were turned back as a squad, this was not due to lack of talent but lack of depth. Larry Tanner demonstrated once again the Ephs' individual power as he grabbed first in the 35 lb. weight with a 55' 3" throw. Forced to perform outside in frigid temperatures, Tanner and Jim DeSimone came back in the shot put to take third and fourth with 42' 2" and 42' respectively. In the long jump, Greg McAleenan came down with another fine 21'6" attempt, but was just edged out by a rival Jeff. The Triple Jump hurt Williams badly as the Ephs were unable to produce a contestant while mediocre attempts scored seven points for Amherst. The pole vault was a bit more heartening, as frosh Scott Mayfield, showing steady improvement, took second with a season best of 12' 6". Stan Parese checked in at 11' 6" for a fourth.

Moving onto the track, the meet took on new dimensions right away, as Tom Schreck and Dan Sullivan teamed for a convincing 1-2 finish. Schreck finished with 4:21.5 with Sullivan, a scant three tenths behind. Both have qualified for post-season competition at the Eastern regionals for Division III.

Williams also crushed the competition in the 60 yard hurdles, as Ron White and Vernon Davis also took first and second. Moving with flawless form through the qualifying rounds; the two knifed across the line at 7.5 and 7.8 respectively in the final.

In the 440, Amherst showed some of their "surprising middle distance strength" as the Jeffs grabbed 1-2. Still, frosh Dave Durrell ran a tough race, edged out of second by only two inches.

Amherst also took the 600, but this time there were two Ephs right behind as Terry O'Reilly and Bob Tyler finished 2-3 with 1:17 and 1:18.

Williams regained momentum in the 880 as Darrell Wallace copped a close second in 2:03.9 and Schreck returned to finish right behind in third.

The 1000 saw another Eph qualify for the Easterns as Phil Darrow came away with first in 2:19.

The two-mile was Williams all the way as Joe Kolb, Frank Carr and Mike Behrman took 1-2-4. Kolb jumped out to an uncharacteristic early lead and increased it along the way, finishing in 9:32. Carr hung tough and crossed in 9:38, with the Bear coming in at 9:53.

The two-mile relay team thus came out hot for revenge and as a result, the quartet of Schreck, Lee Jackson, Wallace and Darrow engineered a parting gesture of sorts by humiliating all three opposing squads.

Grapplers fall to Engineers

by Wayne Eckerson

After rolling up a commanding 19-0 lead, the Williams Wrestling team lost five straight bouts to lose a 21-19 heartbreaker to the Engineers of M.I.T. last Saturday at Lasell.

Despite a commanding lead in Saturday's game against the Engineers of MIT, Williams wrestlers fell behind in the upper weight categories.

A forfeit at the 167 pound class invariably provided the margin of Williams' defeat. "That was very unfortunate since the team wrestled especially well today," said Coach Joe Dailey.

Williams' early lead began with a forfeit in the 118 pound weight class taken by Joe Carrese, and ended with Mark Walch's 7-6 cliffhanger in the 150 pound weight class.

Senior captain Hal Zendle, wrestling in his last home match at Williams, extended his unbeaten streak to nine by blanking a top ranked wrestler, 8-0. Zendle now ranks at the top of New England's 118 pound weight class.

Steve Cox scored his third win of the season by a 10-5 decision. His freshman counterpart, Scott Frost, wrestled his finest match of the season overwhelming his opponent 11-0. Frost now boasts four wins in his last five matches.

Williams travels to Trinity in hopes of improving its 3-6 record.

Racketmen pound Dartmouth 6-3

by Evan Bash

Forget all the early season chatter about the possibility of the men's squash team improving on last year's fourth place national ranking for a moment. After suffering big losses to Princeton and Harvard, and narrowly falling to Yale 5-4, the task for the racketmen was plain and simple as they traveled to Hanover last Wednesday; beat Dartmouth or else consider the season a disappointment.

Faced with such a choice the Ephs knew what they wanted and they got it, downing the Big Green 6-3 in a tense and exciting match. The win raised Williams' season record to 5-3 and does indeed give the squad some hope of retaining the fourth spot in the national rankings.

Perhaps a little stronger on each end of the ladder than through the middle, the Ephs managed to sandwich the strong middle order of Dartmouth just enough. Coaching was a big factor in the victory as coach Sean Sloane always had his charges positioned correctly to chase three-walls and corners whereas the Dartmouth players often were not.

After Williams jumped to a 4-2 lead, Dartmouth seized early control of the three matches still on the courts. The tenseness grew as each match progressed, but no. three Martin Goldberg ended the suspense as he fought back after losing the first game and falling behind in the fourth to clinch the triumph for the Ephs with a 3-1 win. Jim Parsons then put the finishing touches on the Big Green when he took the fifth and deciding game of the final match 18-14.

Several Williams' racketmen scored impressive victories in staking the Purple to the early lead. Captain Arnie Cogswell played his best match of the season in scoring a 3-0 rout, while no. two Chip Lindquist breezed to a quick 3-0 victory. The Ephs also used some of their exceptional depth to good advantage as no. eight Pete Thayer won 3-1 and no. nine Evan Bash romped 3-0.

Mitch Reiss dropped a tough five game match in a fifth game overset, while both Jim Little and Jon Saunders fell victim to the overpowering middle part of the Dartmouth ladder.

Purple wave swamps Springfield College

by Don Cameron

The men's varsity swim team defeated last year's New England champion Springfield College last Saturday in what was probably the most exciting dual meet of the year. The Ephmen, rated as slight underdogs by most, mustered strong performances in nearly every event to clinch the victory 61-52.

The scoring resembled that of a very close basketball game, as the lead changed hands four times until Springfield was ultimately laid to rest.

Co-Captain of the team Stuart Deans was the Ephs' top performer in the contest. Stu won the 500 Free in an incredible mid-season time of 5:00.1, defeating last year's two-time New England champion, Mike McCoombs. He also turned in an impressive second place finish in the 1000 Free, cutting seven full seconds off his previous best time this year.

Before the 100 Free, the Ephs jumped out to an early lead in the meet, with the medley relay team of Don Cameron, Paul VomEigen, Guy Hoelzer and Keith Berryhill. The squad streaked to a quick 3:41.1, ranking them second in New England to date.

The combination of stocky sophomore Dave Amlicke and lanky freshman Gordon Cliff secured the only 1-2 finish of the meet for Williams in the 200 Backstroke. The powerfully stroking Amlicke took the lead from the start and never relinquished it. As a result of their performances in this event, both Amlicke and Cliff are rated as top threats in the 200 Back at the New England Championships next month.

Dependable Paul Vom Eigen once again pulled off a come-from-behind win in the 200 Breaststroke, followed in third by soph Brian Volpp. No one was disappointed with the excitement of the spring freestyle races, as Phil Wild charged from behind in the 100 and barely missed nipping Springfield sprinting ace Cline. In the 50, the duo of Bill Beckett and Wild took second and third respectively, each with fine 22.3 clockings.

Todd "too tough" Piper again proved strong in the 200 Individual Medley by winning it handily. Senior Guy Hoelzer also picked up valuable points with his second place in the 200 Butterfly.

Despite the excellent swimming performances, divers Bill Kelly and Greg Roux played a key role in the victory. Kelly and Roux broke up possible 1-2 combinations for Springfield in both the required and optional diving, by taking third and second respectively in the required event, and Kelly's fine second place finish in the optionals.

The Ephmen are now 5-1.

Women churn past Jumbos, finish at 6-1

Members of the women's swim team got a chance to try their hands at unfamiliar events Friday night as Coach Carl Samuelson revised the lineup after Williams overcame a sixteen point deficit in only the fourth race of the meet.

Without divers, Williams was down 16-0 to their opponents from Tufts before the meet started. However, the Ephwomen outswam the Jumbos 79-38, and won all but one event as they ended the dual meet season with an impressive 6-1 record.

Backstroker Linda Reed led off the victorious medley relay team including Sue Tuttle, Carol Buck and Nina Murphy, and then made an easy transition to freestyler, as she took both the 100 and 50 yard sprints of that stroke. Katherine Pearsall, the team's premiere distance swimmer, won the 500 free before doubling up with a victory in the 100 I.M.

Co-Captain of the team Nina Murphy swam a rare freestyle leg on the opening relay, and then extended her repertoire to include the 100 Backstroke and 100 Butterfly, both of which she won. Carol Buck, recovering from a week's absence, took the 50 Fly and a second in the 100.

Among the more entertaining races of the evening were the 50 Fly, in which freshman freestyler Amanda Acker managed to hang on for a third in her first attempt at the event, and the 200 Freestyle. Sophomore Keron Walker and freshman Molly Murphy were the Williams entrants under protest for the race. Walker, who has not swam more than 100 yards in a single race in her college career, took the event, with Murphy third.

Over Winter Carnival weekend the Ephwomen will participate in the New England Championships at Boston College. Top contenders will include Pearsall, Reed, Nina Murphy, Walker and Tuttle.

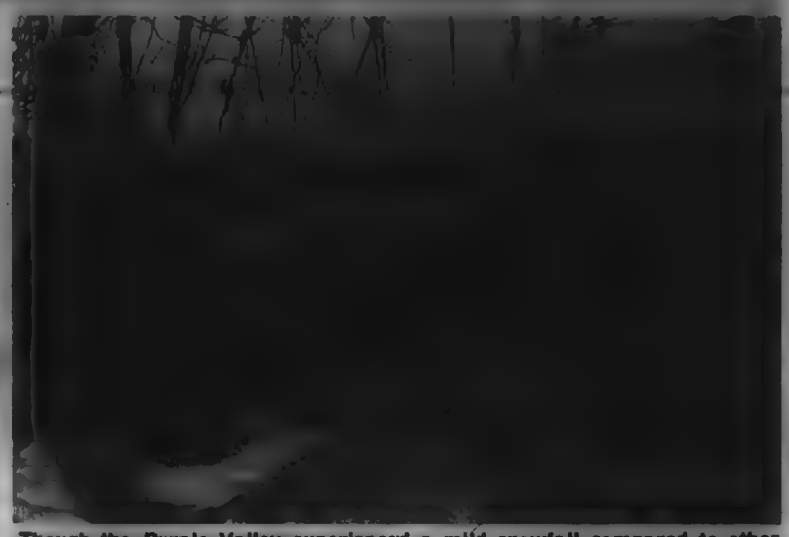
VOL. 91, NO. 30 WILLIAMS COLLEGE FEBRUARY 10 1978

Faculty pressure may alter present winter study projects

The Winter Study Program may be considerably altered as a result of several proposals slated to go before the faculty at their next meeting.

Larry Mitchell '78 informed the College Council of the proposed Winter Study changes at its meeting Wednesday, February 8. In addition, Beth Geismar of the Elections Committee disclosed the names of seven newly selected members of the Junior Advisor Selection Committee.



Mitchell, a member of the Committee on Educational Policy, outlined four different proposals, forwarded by the Faculty Steering Committee, that would change the structure of Winter Study. These suggested alterations include a reduction in the number of Winter Studies during which faculty must teach from two out of three to either one out of two or one out of three; or a relaxation of the present requirement that students participate in four winter studies; or a voluntary program in January whereby faculty who chose to teach would receive additional pay.

"Faculty feel they do not have enough time for their studies. In addition, Williams professors believe they are spending three more weeks teaching than their colleagues at other colleges," Mitchell explained. With faculty participation in Winter Study at its present level, 100 courses are offered each Winter Study and there are an average of 18 students in each class. Mitchell has calculated that with faculty teaching one out of three Winter Studies only 50 courses would be offered and average class size would rise to 36 students.

Faculty advisor Michael Bell explained another cause for faculty discontent which centers around the sentiment that, "Winter Study courses ought to have a syllabus and a work load comparable to regular semesters." At present, he said, "There's a discrepancy between faculty preparation for class and student preparation." For this reason some faculty see their time as being used unproductively. A reduced teaching requirement during Winter Study "will cool a lot of faculty dissatisfaction that could otherwise destroy the whole Winter Study Program," Bell added.

The names of the seven new members of the JA Selection Committee, chosen by the Elections Committee, were announced by Beth Geismar '80. From a group of 14 applicants the following were selected: Carolyn Brown '80, Jonathan Burbank '78, Harold Levene '79, Perry Nelson '79, Sheila Sullivan '78, John Svoboda '79, and Anna Waring '78.

Chris DiAngelo, the Purple Key Society's new president, told the Council that Purple Key Night and the freshman singing contest will be redesigned next year in response to recent criticism. Also, during Freshman Days next year, which have been extended to four days, Purple Key plans to sponsor a series of mini-seminars on "current news stories, and thought provoking movies and books, for instance, with the hope of presenting a more balanced social-academic first impression of Williams," DiAngelo said.

Though the Purple Valley experienced a mild snowfall compared to other eastern areas, the accumulation was sufficient to postpone sports games, lecturers, and IBM pickets.

Purple Key Society elects officers

The Purple Key Society elected Chris Diangelo '79 as its President for 1978 Monday night at the monthly meeting. The organization also elected Steven Davidson '80 as its new Vice President-Treasurer and Marcia Leous '79 as new Secretary.

The three assumed their new positions at the close of the meeting, which served as an organizational session to kick off the new year. The meeting also included elections of new committee chairpersons and the "State of the Key" message, a brief recount of last year's activities by former president Linda Smith '78. The Purple Key night was a topic of much discussion at the meeting. The event was attacked by both the Deans and the Thursday Coalition for the "objectionable" nature of skits staged by some of the clubs, and finalists in the singing contest. Because Purple Key Night was generally considered to be a useful exposure to the organizations on campus, the group decided to preserve it in its present format, but with two modifications. First, all clubs participating will be notified that the president of their organization will be responsible to the Deans for what is presented in their skit, and second, Purple Key Night will be moved forward to the final night of Freshman Days, allowing time for groups to rehearse their skits for the Deans and the president of Purple Key.

Several were attacked because some presentations were "objectionable," as a means to promote entry unity and give freshmen an opportunity to get acquainted. Purple Key will continue discussion and decide the future of the contest at their next meeting.

Pierre Wong '80 and Greg Roux '80 were elected to head the committee which organizes campus tours with the Admissions Office. Byron Walker '80 and Sue Luciano '81 will handle overnight, another method of familiarizing prospective freshmen with the college.

Purple Key also helps the administration to coordinate Parents' Weekend, both for upperclassmen in the spring and for freshmen in the fall. Lee Shackelford '80 will chair the committee which provides ushers, stuffs envelopes and hands out materials to parents during the two weekends.

Burr Hubbell '80 will prepare the sports program during this year and Shawn Burdick '81 will spend this summer in Williamstown soliciting ads and collecting the pictures needed to assemble next year's face book.

After summarizing the activities Purple Key sponsored last year, Linda Smith left next year's president with some traditional "sage advice." She suggested that they hold more meetings and improve organization.

WFA bemoans trustee action on recent proposals

The Williams Feminist Alliance expressed dissatisfaction with the Trustees' response to the seven-point proposal it recently presented. The group met Monday night at 7 o'clock.

Valerie Andersen '78, one of the group's coordinators, complained that the trustees had ignored the alliance's proposals, which suggested various means of enhancing the role of women at Williams. "The Trustees did not tell us anything," she charged. "We had to read about their decision which was to do nothing, in the Berkshire Eagle." Another Coordinator, Maryellen Shea '78, suggested an "informal" meeting with President Chandler to "understand why the trustees acted as they did."

The Feminist Alliance wrote Chandler a letter airing their complaints last Friday. According to Dorothy Kirkpatrick, Chandler's secretary, the president's answering letter will explain in detail why the Alliance's proposal was so handled. Kirkpatrick pointed out, however, that the proposal had been presented to the trustees without previous warning. "The trustees don't make snap judgments on small campus concerns," she added. "Those decisions are left to the college community."

Another item on the group's agenda is a boycott of Nestle and its affiliates. Nestle's antagonists claim that the company has pushed its powdered milk substitute on third world mothers without providing them with sufficient information on the deficiencies of the formula. The Food Service currently uses Nestle brand cocoa mix in all major dining halls. Unfortunately for boycotting purposes, the college bought enough of the mix to last the entire school year.

The Alliance is also investigating the possibility of creating courses devoted to women's studies. Several members talked of initiating such a course dealing with feminist theory; specific details were not presented.

Guide out by April

Response increases

The course guide for fall courses should be out by April, in time for pre-registration, according to Don Toumey '78, chairman of the Course Guide Committee. He views the results with "guarded optimism" as all questionnaires have not been returned.

The collection network this year was a dual system, including classes and residential houses. Those professors who approved of having the guide filled out in class allotted time just prior to reading period. For the remaining courses, the committee organized collectors for each house. The two systems produced approximately equal amounts of completed questionnaires, although both also had several problems.

The committee did not have time to pursue reluctant professors, as it was organized late into the fall semester. As a result, many courses could not be evaluated in class. Toumey felt that the house collection took too long, that a more concentrated effort would have produced better results.

The dual system also created confusion for some, who could not remember if they had or had not filled out a questionnaire in class. In addition, some students never got any questionnaires in their mailboxes.

The experience gained by the young committee, though, will be useful for next semester's guide. Lacking a Winter Study buffer period after finals, the committee last year was unable to produce a guide for spring courses. Toumey says that the committee will ask for the permission of professors earlier, and have an intensive house collection. Graduating students will be individually pursued during their senior week. He also suggested the possibility of passing out questionnaires at dining halls and at the Log.

The future looks good for the guide, according to Toumey. With experience in collection, the committee should obtain higher response rates. As it becomes accepted by the College community, he added, reluctant professors may change their point of view.

Fish addresses the misunderstood

by Sharon Nelson

In spite of the impossible traveling conditions on Tuesday evening, Professor Stanley Fish of Johns Hopkins University arrived only 25 minutes late to deliver his lecture entitled, "Normal Circumstances, Literal Language, Direct Speech Acts, the Ordinary, the Everyday, the Obvious, What Goes Without Saying, and Other Special Cases."

Fish, who received his A.B. from the University of Pennsylvania, '59; his Ph.D. from Yale, '62; and is the author of several influential books on Sixteenth and Seventeenth century poetry, opened his lecture by quoting the first seven words of a song by Randy Newman. The lyrics read, "Short people have no reason to live."

The song, which has been banned in Boston and been the target of a general outcry elsewhere, is the victim of misunderstanding, according to Fish. What Newman was in fact trying to convey was an attack on all discrimination and prejudice, using the ludicrous example of believing that short people are not fit to live to illustrate his point. The problem, said Fish, is how can one tell what an author means by a sentence or text. In other words, is there a literal meaning of a sentence which is immutable and subject to only one interpretation? The answer, according to Fish, is no. Any sentence or text is always subject to interpretation, though the interpretation may be so "ordinary" and "obvious" that the reader is unaware that he is making any interpretation at all. The word "literal," according to Fish can have different meanings depending on the context or situation.

To illustrate his point, Fish cited an example involving a sign on the door of the John Hopkins University Club which reads: PRIVATE MEMBERS ONLY. To some, the "obvious" or "literal" meaning is clearly that only members of the club may enter. Fish, however, asked several other people what the phrase literally meant and received several answers including, "Only those who are secretly and not publicly members of this club may enter it," or along other lines, "Only the genitalia of members may enter," or still further, "Only genitalia may enter."

"It (the sign) can only mean one thing," Fish explained, "but that one thing is not always the same."

Subsequently, Fish stated that he did not recognize the existence of ambiguous sentences because by doing so, he would imply that there are some sentences that "always and only mean one thing;" an implication which he contends is false.

"I am not saying that sentences always have more than one meaning," Fish concludes, "but that the sentence which is perceived as having only one meaning will not always have the same one."

Science grants skewed towards energy efficiency

Students from Williams amd other area colleges have begun applying for National Science Foundation (NSF) grants for six research projects to be conducted around Williamstown this summer.

The Center for Environmental Studies (CES) is sponsoring the grants, which offer a $900 tax-free stipend to students conducting research in Berkshire County for 10 weeks this summer. The projects are open to students who have not previously participated in NSF projects.

Quincy Adams Wagstaff

In Germany, when the editor runs out of news copy, he calls it the time of Sour Pickles

Wagstaff appointed new College dean

The inside track on next year's new Dean is that Professor Quincy Adams Wagstaff, formerly of Huxley College, will be taking the helm of the administration. According to anonymous source Cris Roosenraad, [illegible] was [illegible] filled room at two o'clock in the morning. "We were hashing the thing out at a poker game at Chandler's," said Roosenraad, "when we finally hit on Wagstaff's name to break a deadlock. Chandler said he was a distinguished scholar. Well, he certainly can be distinguished from any peculiar I've ever met."

Roosenraad said he wasn't sure what a Dean with a greasepaint mustache, greasepaint eyebrows, ever-present cigar, and Wagstaff's peculiar gait would do for the image of the College. "Berek looks like your typical refugee from Harvard Square, but this guy Wagstaff looks like something out of the Marx Brothers. Actually, though, the change won't be that great. Very few people know it, but Berek's beard is actually a greasepaint beard. It's very well done and you can hardly tell," he said.

In anticipation of the announcement of his appointment, Wagstaff was interviewed by the Record.

Q. Professor Wagstaff, why are you coming to Williams?

W. I came into this college to get my son out of it. I remember the day he left to come here, a mere boy and a beardless youth. I kissed them both goodbye.

Q. You're coming to a campus that has been grappling with the problem of sexism recently. How do you feel about that?

W. The only problem I have with sexism is that it's three letters too long. As Dean of this College I can state that my door will always be open to any woman who wants to come in. Of course, I can't promise that getting out will be that easy.

Q. How about gay rights?

W. I know young people. They want gaiety, laughter, they want to ha-cha-cha, and that suits me fine. The first thing I'd do to insure that is to ban all Bergman films from being shown within twenty miles of this place.

Q. What kind of courses are you going to teach?

W. I'll be doing a course on the role of the circus geek in ancient history, just up to the time of Socrates. I'll only be dealing with the pre-socratic geeks. Now as for how difficult, it will probably be a gut. But not an ordinary gut, a superior gut. It'll be a gut above the rest. I may get into philosophy and prove the unknowability of knowledge. Then all the students can go home and I'll take the tuition and flee to Canada where I'll wear a disguise and take on a new identity. I'll use a pseudonym and buy new pseudo-clothes to go with it.

Q. Can you tell us something about your educational background?

W. I lived a depraved childhood. I went to the school of hard knocks. Then my father joined the army and we moved to Kentucky, where I went to the school of Fort Knox. From there it was like a dream come true and I went to college. I was on the football team and wanted to play quarterback, but I spent most of my time playing flat on my back. I was an eager student and started off doing well, but then my grades began going down hill. For the last two years I was on a twenty per cent downhill grade.

Q. What did you do after that?

W. I went out west and decided to stake my fortune on ranching. Soon I was up to my ears in debt from stocking my ranch with buffalo. Yes, I ran up quite a buffalo bill. But that didn't work out so I switched to sugar farming and began raising cane. That didn't work out either, so I decided to stock the ranch with yaks, because you know what yaks reproduce like.

Q. What?

W. Yaks, and don't you forget it. Soon there were yaks all over. It reminds of this place. Yak, yak, yak where ever you go.

Q. What prompted you to give all that up?

W. I've always had a place in my heart for learning. Out west, I would spend quiet evenings reading Homer on the range. Then one day academia called and wouldn't you know it? It called collect. But I couldn't say no. At heart I'm just an academia nut.

Q. What do you expect to do when your tenure here as dean is over?

W. I suppose I'll just go back to my Yaks and sodomy.

Q. Sodomy?

W. Yes, I'll have one yak on the right sodomy, and another yak on the left. Together we'll watch the son rise, the sun set and the television set. Or better yet I'll read some books.

Professor Wagstaff will be taking over the Deanship at the beginning of next year.

Letters: freshman life, South Korea

Freshman days

To the Editor of the Record:

The Freshman Days Forum (22 January), developed an exciting idea, which went unreported in the Record. Sue Galli suggested asking upperclassmen if they would like to serve as discussion leaders, either during Freshman Days or thereafter. Freshmen would sign up for the topics that interested them. I think the idea is excellent and others at the meeting were equally enthusiastic.

Incidentally, a positive value of the freshman song contest, as I mentioned at the meeting, is that preparing for it gives people in an Entry a chance to get to know one another. In addition, unlike the activities' presentation, Purple Key can control the song contest through the auditions. On the other hand, it may be necessary to drop the song contest so that Purple Key can demonstrate its seriousness about changing the tone of Purple Key Night.

Finally, involving the WOOLF proposals: it seems to have slipped from people's attention, but WOOLF was endorsed by the CUL and will be an official part of Freshman Days next fall. (Last fall it had a temporary status as an extracurricular activity.) The WOOLF proposers are disappointed that the CUL stipulated that the outdoor orientation not take place before Freshman Days, but this feeling should not obscure the fact that WOOLF proved itself to be an exciting and successful venture.

Why rejection?

To the editor:

We have read Dr. Wilkins' letter notifying the student body that the Trustees have rejected the College Council proposal to include "sexual orientation" in the college's nondiscrimination statement. We are disappointed that Dr. Wilkins did not choose to inform us of the reasons for that rejection.

The only rationale that we have heard from the President's office for the Trustee action is that the term "sexual orientation" caused confusion. If this was indeed your reasoning, we find it difficult to believe that those of you who attended the Gargoyle meeting were listening. You may recall that we suggested two simple, clear solutions to the problem.

The first suggestion was to include a "Whereas" clause elsewhere in the college's general body of laws. This statement would make the intent of the language clear and thus preclude possible judicial misinterpretation. Such a statement would be a short, straightforward phrase to the effect of "Whereas Williams College does not discriminate against heterosexual, homosexual, or bisexual employees, faculty, or students, it has included a 'sexual orientation' clause in its official nondiscrimination statement." This option was suggested by a prominent attorney.

An even simpler solution would be to define sexual orientation right in the nondiscrimination statement as "choice of sexual partner according to gender."

We had assumed that the definitional objection had been dispensed with. If there are other, as yet unstated reasons why you chose to reject the student proposal, it is only common courtesy that we be allowed to hear them.

Taking action

To the editor:

Many students and members of the Williamstown community were disappointed with Dr. George Wald's lecture of January 24 because, although he encouraged many to begin to take their lives and their fates into their own hands, Dr. Wald did not offer any specifics as to how to overcome the pervasive feeling of helplessness which many of us feel. Well, now there is something that we can do. I quote in part from a letter that I recently received from Dr. Wald:

> I have just received and am sending to you a list of political prisoners in South Korea that is thoroughly up to date ... The request—it comes from Hiroshima—is to write a letter to all of these people. Why write those letters? Because they could save those people's lives. The contents of the letter hardly matters. The point is that the government knows that it is being watched, and that people are concerned. It is most important that such mail come from Americans. I have made copies of the South Korean prisoner list. Anyone interested in obtaining a copy of the list, or more information, should contact me at either S.U. Box 2404 or at 597-[illegible].
> Dr. Wald also enclosed the names of several organizations and agencies concerned with disarmament and nuclear power. Again, for more information, contact me.

> Make yourself heard—do something!

Richard Archer: In Memorium

To the editor:

The wonderful pleasure of my sabbatical stop in the Middle East was severely jolted by the tragic news of the death of my old friend and colleague of long years, Richard Archer, recently retired Librarian of the Chapin Library of Rare Books. Archer was one of those quiet people who may not have been known by a large number of undergraduates, but I can assure you that in many foreign countries if the name of Williams College is known at all it is often through the reputation of that library, which he did much to enhance.

Archer was a man of impeccable taste who knew printing as a historian and able practitioner. He raised the typographical quality of the College's catalogues, programs and brochures and fought a long, and alas, losing, battle to make campus posters attractive and readable.

Sure, he was an expert on food, wine, travel, jazz, old cars and how to select the perfect wife, but most important of all he was an excellent teacher and a fine gentleman. He was a loyal friend who loved the College and worked tirelessly for it. He will be greatly missed.

Frosh housing

To the editor:

As a current junior advisor who has become increasingly reflective in regard to the College's policy concerning the freshman year, I would like to respond to the proposal by Ms. Brown and Mr. Scheye, the "Morgan Experiment."

Ms. Brown and Mr. Scheye are, I believe, fundamentally correct in assigning at least part of the blame for "traditional sexual stereotypes" which exist at Williams to the present freshman housing system. Freshmen of both sexes have remarked to me that the single-sex entries (and entries are especially singled out, as opposed to the floor arrangement in Fayerweather and East) encourage more distance between the sexes than might be beneficial. As one freshman woman put it, "you can't just 'drop in' on a guy on the third floor of Williams." This same freshman noted that in her opinion, living situations such as those enjoyed by Mission Park residents would prove to be far more valuable experiences for freshmen.

However, the "Morgan Experiment," although in the spirit of coping with these problems, misses a very significant point: any such "sexual stereotypes" exist as a campus-wide phenomenon. Instituting a reform such as this on the level of a few entries, or even all of Morgan, could not prove successful.

Ms. Brown claims that "the progress of the experimental entries" could be charted throughout the year. "Progress" is itself here a questionable word, especially if it refers to these students' not falling prey to sexual stereotyping while does the rest of the class of '82. The measurement of such an intangible atmosphere would prove difficult.

It would also seem that the "fishbowl" effect would be very strong in such a situation. The freshmen in those few entries would not be unaware that their experience was indeed an experiment, and might tend to see the more traditional living arrangement for freshmen as the norm, and would feel compelled to adopt the same stereotypes held by the rest of their class.

Ms. Brown and Mr. Scheye's hope that "some of the traditional sexual stereotypes might disappear" with the proposal seems to me somewhat unrealistic. The problem allegedly affects everyone in all four classes, and cannot be solved even in part by a token reshuffling effort in Morgan Hall.

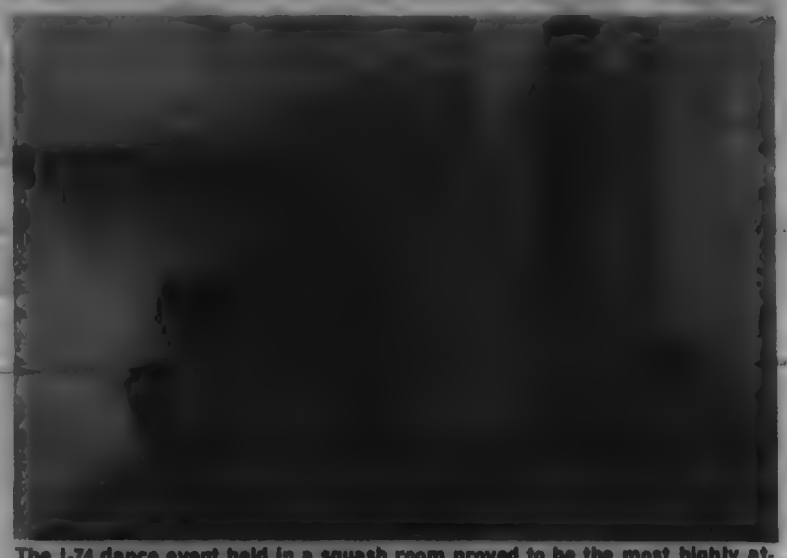
'Reel' film portrays social rigidity

Effi Briest [1974], directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, will be shown by Reel Vintage in Bronfman auditorium tomorrow night at 7:30 and 9:30.



"Many who have an idea of their possibilities and needs nevertheless accept the prevailing order in the way they act, and thereby confirm and strengthen it absolutely." Beginning here, R. W. Fassbinder's Effi Briest portrays the destructiveness of a society which consigns to its members a role that allows no one individual choice.

The title character, Effi Briest, is the vibrant and somewhat wild daughter of a turn of the century bourgeois German couple. At seventeen, she is promised in marriage to a social-climbing concillor, Instetter, who is twenty years her senior and who was once her mother's suitor. Following their marriage, Innstetter takes Effi to his rustic Baltic home—the locale of a fated love affair for Effi. Six years after they leave the Baltic, Instetter discovers this past fiasco; when he does, Effi is forced to leave her home and child and is rejected by her parents. Her expulsion lasts until she becomes seriously ill and is allowed to return home.

The plot shows Fassbinder's concern with the rights of all people, in particular, women's rights. Effi Briest is trapped by an identity which has been enforced upon her and subsequently condemns her. She feels no guilt about her actions, only fear and finally resignation at the reaction of others.

Effi Briest is based on a fontane novel. The actors are seen through mirrors as though they are engaged in self-introspection. This world of mirrors is shaded, distorted by screens and veils, and the action, viewed through doors and tight frames, materializes the restrictions placed on identity by society. The static camera takes are emphasized; as in the scene of Effi moving in and out on a swing while the camera remains still. When the camera does move—it seems to depart from the direction of the characters—as if it knew they would rather go another way.

Effi is afraid "that one's life can become so formal that one becomes formless," like the ghosts Instetter often talks about to intimidate her. In Effi Briest, the true ghosts consist of the iniquitous socialization of the community which denies one his autonomy from society.

Festival receives mixed response

by Ann Morris

The Women's Arts Festival, designed as an opportunity for Williams and community women to present their work without competition with established male artists, met with mixed response last weekend.

Student turnout was disappointing, according to festival mastermind Lauren Iossa, but community feedback and participation was "exciting."

Sponsored by the Williams Feminist Alliance, the festival featured craft and art exhibits, various demonstrations and workshops, and both music and dance performances. More than twenty students showed their work, joined by several artists from Williamstown, North Adams, and other nearby communities. The classrooms of Griffin Hall were used for the exhibitions; its halls for informal guitar playing and singing; Thompson Chapel for a piano recital; and the squash courts for a dance presentation.

This is the first year of such an event. Organizer Iossa explains that, originally, the festival was intended for Williams students only, but an announcement in the Register drew response from community women.

The arts are "thriving" in the Berkshires, Iossa points out, but few Williams students realize it. Students think the area is dull and dry, she says, but only because there is so little interaction between the college and the community. The festival was successful in it showed students this large amount of local talent, while providing an enthusiastic community women with a rare chance to show off their art.

Not only are students unaware of artistic talent in the Williamstown community, Iossa argues, but they do not see the amount of female artistic ability on campus. This may be because of the lack of a strong interest in the arts at Williams, she suggests, or maybe it is a further manifestation of sexism present on campus. Iossa says she had hoped the festival would demonstrate to the whole student body that art is still alive at Williams, and that many talented female students are involved in it. She regrets that "most of the students who came did so because they had friends participating."

Although the exhibits were not as well attended as had been hoped, the Sunday night dance performances in the squash courts drew crowds. Three separate dances were performed, the longest and most complex being "I-74, A Simple Process," a dance choreographed by Joy Dewey, director of the Dance Department. Modern improvisational dance, "I-74, A Simple Process" emphasized the dimensions of space and time, through the use of different shaped boxes, the walls of the squash court, recited numbers, and a film. The dance, open to various interpretations, seemed to center around themes of communication, human interaction, and frustration when these are impossible.

Ohio State philosophy professor joins department

Jonathan Schonsheck will be a Visiting Lecturer in Philosophy this semester. He teaches a course entitled the Philosophy of Law as well as a section of Philosophy 101S.

Schonsheck's courses were originally designated to be taught by Professor Nathaniel Lawrence, according to Daniel O'Connor, chairman of the Philosophy Department. Lawrence had to reduce his course load in order to prepare material for the Senior course in Environmental Studies which he will teach next year, O'Connor added. Lawrence is working under the auspices of the Mellon Foundation. The foundation provides funds for faculty members who do research in preparation to offer new courses.

Schonsheck comes to Williams from Ohio State University where he recently completed work on his second Master's Degree. He graduated from Valpariso University in 1971, and from there went to the University of Dayton. He received his first Master's degree from Dayton in 1973.

Schonsheck's specialty is the philosophy of law. He took courses at the Ohio State Law School while also studying philosophy. Schonsheck said that he was particularly interested in the areas of criminal law and jurisprudence.

Schonsheck taught at the University of Dayton and at Ohio State while a graduate student. He observed that one difference between Ohio State and Williams was that at Williams "the students are uniformly quite good". Such consistent quality could serve to make teaching both easier and potentially more difficult, he added.

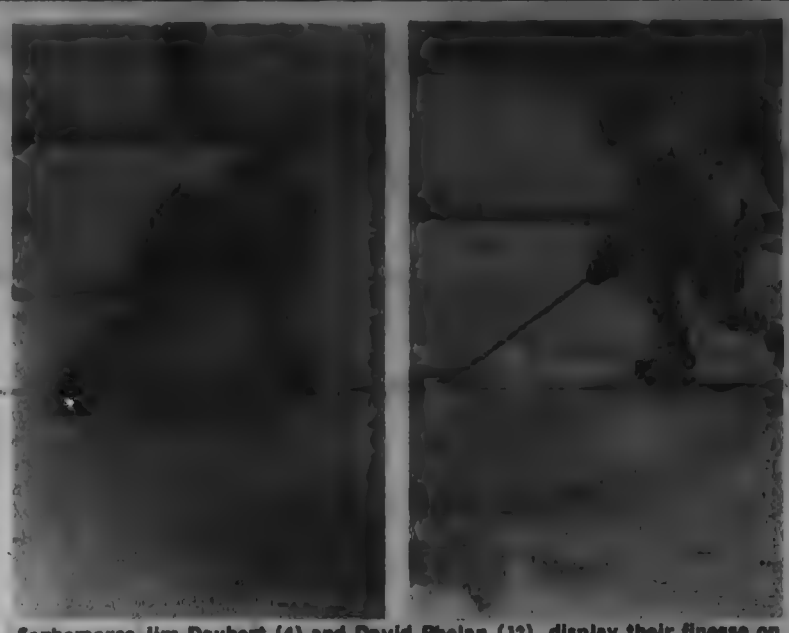
In Stowe carnival

X-country leads team

The men's ski team, after a rocky start in the jumping and Giant Slalom pulled into a strong fifth place finish at the University of Vermont winter carnival this weekend. The Ephs were beaten by host Vermont, Dartmouth, Middlebury, and UNH.

In the leadoff event at Middlebury, the Ephs jumping squad of Jeff Hastings, Tom Dodds, and Andy Kelly was only able to find one good jump each in three attempts. This led to a sixth place finish in the event and put the Ephs 14 points behind UNH whom they had hoped to battle for fourth place.

The events of Friday moved to Stowe where the cross country and Giant Slalom were held. Under ideal conditions and very close times the Alpine squad of Andy Mikell, Don Tarinelli, Jan Dembinski, Chris Welsh, and Roger Prevot did not seem to have the edge they had hoped for as Mikell was 12th, with Tarinelli 23rd and Dembinski 24th. These placings gave the Ephs sixth place in this event as well.



The afternoon following the G.S., the cross country ski group of Jeff Magoon, Peter Wells, Rob Craig and Dennis Desroaches took to the tracks in hopes of changing the sixth place trend. The afternoon saw what was to be the best Williams individual placing of the weekend as co-captain Magoon skied the strongest race of his career placing fifth. The fifth place along with a 19th by Desroaches and a 23rd by Wells was enough to place Williams fifth in the event and fifth for the three events.

With the Ephs now 30 points behind UNH but stronger in fifth, the slalom skiers took over with the hope of narrowing the gap if not overtaking the New Hampshirites.

The slalom skis did well, finishing in their best team placing of the weekend—third—due to the strength of a 10th by Mikell, a 14th by Dembinski and a 19th by Tarinelli. This finish narrowed the gap on UNH but did not close it as the Ephs wound up fifth.

Williams, which placed fourth in last year's UVM carnival, hopes to improve on this finish tomorrow as they travel to Dartmouth.

In other weekend competition, the jumpers skied in the Eastern jumping Championships in Salisbury, Conn. The meet was won by UVM's Roger Holden but second place, the longest jump of the day belonged to freshman jumper Jeff Hastings. Hastings jumped 62 and 64.5 meters on his way to second place. He became the first Williams skier to hold or equal a hill record.

Sophomores Jim Daubert (4) and David Phelan (12), display their finesse on the ice. Varsity defeated North Adams State in a crucial Division II game Tuesday night.

Route two ice kings

Pucksters take crucial game

by Mark Pogue

The scene Tuesday was Viet Nam Veterans' Memorial Skating Rink and the event was the first hockey game ever played between the Williams Ephmen and the North Adams State Mohawks. The result was a 7-5 win for Williams and the coveted "Route Two Ice King" trophy that goes with it.

It was not just another hockey game. Local bragging rights were at stake, of course—pride which for years had remained untested as a result of the two schools' traditional policy of mutual disregard. Both teams needed another notch in the win column. With the regular season drawing to a close soon and only eight playoff spots available in each of Division II's two conferences, tenth-place North Adams (4-6 in Division II before the game) and eighth-place Williams (5-7) each had its sights on a win.

Freshman Matthew St. Onge, though, whose goals come in spurts, scored twice for the Ephs before the period was over. Each tally was assisted by Chris Egizi, and each followed action in which it seemed that Williams would never clear the puck out of its own end. Senior Ed Weiss was masterful for Williams in that hot-and-heavy first stanza, turning back 20 shots and bringing one breakaway threat to nought.

Mohawk forward Ted Rand opened second-period scoring with an eight-foot flip goal, but Williams' "green" line—St. Onge, Chic Johnson and Egizi—answered when St. Onge and Jim Norton fed Johnson with passes culminating in a score. Dan Sullivan, playing with a badly bruised left eye socket, made it 4-2 when he beat goalie Bob Mastranni at the 10:55 mark. North Adams' Dan Sheldon responded with a marker of his own 18 seconds later to narrow the count to 4-3 after two periods.

Williams, as usual, poured it on in the last period. Chic Johnson scored from St. Onge at the 14:12 mark to make it 5-3. At 11:54 freshman Tom Resor registered his 27th assist of the season when he slung the puck to Geoff Daley, who scored. The Mohawks' Flaherty made it 6-4 when he blasted home a goal at 8:16, but Jim Rooney answered for the Purple two minutes later. With 55 seconds remaining the hosts scored once more to bring the score to 7-5.

More important Division II competition is in the offing for Williams. Lowell Tech will do battle with the Ephs at 7:30 tomorrow in Lansing Chapman Rink.

Women ski year's best at UVM

The women's ski team, competing against nine other colleges in the University of Vermont Winter Carnival at Stowe, Vt., completed the two days of racing with a solid fourth place finish. The winner was Middlebury, followed by the University of Vermont and Dartmouth. Despite the sub-zero temperatures, most members of the team produced their finest individual efforts of the year in Friday and Saturday's nordic and alpine events.

On Saturday the alpine team, paced by captain Marty Epstein, provided the strongest showing of the weekend by winning the slalom. Epstein finished third, Julie Ernst fourth, Kathy Lane ninth, and Ashley Smith twelfth, out of the field of 50 competitors.

The giant slalom, held Friday, was a little less satisfying. Epstein placed sixth, with Ernst next in 16th, and Lane 29th. Sophomore Kathy Allen led the cross-country team with her 17th place finish on the eighth kilometer course at the Trappe Family Lodge. She was followed by Cindy Drinkwater in 29th, Sara Reynolds 30th, Janet Lavin 32nd, and Frannie Todd 33rd. The team was in fifth place after Friday's events but moved into fourth after winning the slalom on Saturday.

This weekend the team will travel to Coach Judy Zimicki's alma mater, Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H., for the Dartmouth Winter Carnival.

Area explores fuel independence

The six grants allocated for this summer continue a series of grants begun five years ago. As in past years, the projects focus on the immediate area—especially Hopkins Forest—and involve supervisors from several departments. This year, faculty members from the biology, physics, economics, anthropology and geology departments will participate.

Many of this summer's projects will attempt to continue or synthesize previous projects. One of these will follow up Professor Jay Shelton's experiments in wood stove efficiency, testing the performance of different styles of stoves stoked with different grades of wood, and utilizing the "calorimeter room" in Park Hall.

Energy self-sufficiency for northern Berkshire County is the focus for another project. Students will examine the costs and benefits of transferring the Williamstown area from dependence on imported energy to the use of solar energy, natural gas from manure, wood, wind and hydroelectric plants. Students will design possible policies and set up a prospective timetable for greater self-sufficiency.

A historical study of land use patterns in Hopkins Forest will occupy the summer for another group of students, as they look at landholdings and piece together an archaeological survey map of the Forest, including cellar holes, fencelines, and gravestones.

Students with a background in field geology will examine the influences of topography and geology on vegetation patterns in Hopkins Forest. Animal biologists will continue a five-year study of population traits of deer mice in the Forest, and silviculturalists will examine the development and maintenance of the self-perpetuating forest using various timber stands.

According to Taber Allison of the CES, students have until Feb. 24 to apply for the NSF grants. Applications are available from Peg Wilson in Park Hall. Acceptance notices will come out March 15.

Pomphrey and Ndlovu talk about South Africa

Paul Pomphrey, an American political organizer, and Dr. Callistus Ndlovu, chief UN representative of the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU), began the Black Student Union's "Focus on South Africa" month Friday night. Both speakers emphasized the continuing reality of racist oppression and the need to combat it both in the United States and in South Africa.

Pomphrey the opening speaker, was a former member of, several activist groups, including the United Farm Workers and the Black panthers. He expressed disillusionment with American domestic and foreign policy, commenting that, "the history of this country is not like I learned at school."

The American past and present is full of examples of immoral policies, he charged, primarily conceived and implemented by powerful multinational corporations. "Due to huge profit being made by these corporations, the United States is the largest supplier of arms to fascist states of any country in the world today," Pomphrey said. Pomphrey charged that the U.S. is currently "exporting the technology of plutoniun, repression, and torture," while the American people are kept unaware.

"There is a long struggle ahead of us," Pomphrey emphasized. Unified effort, which succeeded in ending the Vietnam War, is again necessary to end racist oppression, he said. It must be made less profitable for huge corporations to "maim and kill people around the world." He charged the American people to "put an end to their ignorance" and not allow the government to continue to support racist regimes such as South Africa. The U.S. helps to support fascist, racist regimes too consistently for it to be accidental, Pomphrey concluded, and interest groups are the only ones profitting from the exploitation.

Ndlovu, who arrived late due to poor driving conditions, offered an insider's view of the revolutionary movement now active in Rhodesia (Zimbabwe). He described the present situation as one of civil war. Ndlovu emphasized that the war was a "last resort," noting the unsuccessful 1975 talks at Victoria Falls between Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith and members, including himself, of ZAPU. He emphatically stressed that this was a war not against white people but against the existing system of racist oppression.

Ndlovu maintained the need for a pragmatic approach to the anti-racism struggle. In response to one question, he explained the acceptance of Soviet aid in light of the fact that no African liberation movement has succeeded without such help. Victory is ZAPU's "supreme objective," he claimed, one to which "all other considerations are subordinate." If ZAPU attains power, he added, Zimbabwe would not become a puppet of any superpower and it would, "prefer mismanagement of affairs to being managed by anybody." Citing the futility of purely symbolic actions and support, Ndlovu, concluded his speech with a plea for material relief for Rhodesian refugees.

During a question and answer period, the two speakers enumerated four steps Williams students could take to help end racist rule in southern Africa. They stressed strongly the need for a campaign of material support to benefit persons displaced during the fighting. Both also urged students to keep abreast of current developments, and to organize discussions of the issue on campus. The petition and investment divestiture drive which the BSU is currently conducting was encouraged, but the speakers called it less pertinent to the immediate demands of the situation.

A spokesman for the B.S.U. said that the organization was pleased by the number of people who attended, although it had anticipated a larger turnout. The B.S.U. plans more events for next month with the goal of "educating the Williamstown community" to the specifics of the South African situation.

Paul Pomphrey, former member of the Black Panthers, accused the United States of supporting racist regimes in southern Africa and suggested ways Williams students could help promote change in the region.

Fund drive tops record

The Alumni Fund Drive has become the most successful in the history of the College, according to Jim Briggs, Director of Annual Giving. Contributions totaled $1,168,038.24, more than $56,000 above the previous record. And for the first time, contributions came from more than 60 per cent of all living alumni.

Briggs said the high percentage of alumni participation in the four-month campaign will keep the school among the national leaders in alumni giving. Sixty per cent participation was a major goal of this year's drive. Just four years ago participation stood at just over 53 per cent. Each year since then the percentage has increased, steadily upward, reaching a total of 58.5 per cent last year. This year's 60.69 per cent participation may be enough to make the Williams drive the most successful in the nation in terms of alumni participation. Dartmouth, the perennial leader in the category, last June reported alumni participation of 60.3 per cent.

The Class of 1929 had the highest percentage of alumni contributions with 88.14 per cent. Following closely was the Class of 1932 with 85.71 per cent. Briggs commented that he was "especially pleased" with the enthusiasm shown by members of the last ten graduating classes, whose combined participation totalled over 57 per cent.

Along with new records for the amount raised and the percentage of alumni participation, the fund drive hit a new peak in the amount of corporate matching gifts with $104,433, the first time the Alumni Fund matching grants went over $100,000. In addition, 657 non-alumni parents of Williams students gave $94,398.

The chairman of the Alumni Fund campaign was Andrew D. Heineman, a 1950 Williams graduate and a lawyer in New York City. He was supported by four vice-chairmen who worked with 66 class agents, a host of associate agents and a parent committee.

The contributions to Williams in the Alumni Fund Drive represent about ten per cent of the school's educational budget.

In other financial developments, Director of Development Willard Dickerson reports that the college Capital Fund for the seventies has reached the $32 million mark as of January, 1977. In contrast with a report he gave earlier in the school year, Dickerson was optimistic concerning the drive's progress. "The faucets just opened up in December," he commented. The goal of the Capital Fund is $50 million by 1980.

Staff proposes woodworking shop

How many students would use a woodworking shop if it were set up in the basement of Greylock Dining Hall, and how much are students willing to pay for the convenience of such a facility? These two questions will be the focus of discussion Wednesday night as the Finance Committee presents the College Council with a detailed proposal for a woodworking shop that would be open to students and faculty.

The proposal for the shop originated with a number of college officials who felt that there was a demand for a woodworking facility based on the number of students who are currently using the carpentry shop in Buildings and Grounds. The Buildings and Grounds Department has raised concern over this issue because the college carpentry shop is not designed to handle private student projects. Dean Eileen Julien presented the proposal for the construction of the shop to the Finance Committee of the College Council in October, of 1977.

The facility's projected costs are estimated at close to $20,000 for initial construction and equipment, and an additional $10,000 per year to cover regular maintenance and pay the salaries of qualified personnel to be on hand to assist students. The costs are not rigid, and could be lowered by cutting the hours that the proposed shop would be open.

According to Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly '78, there is "no effective way to judge student interest" in the proposed wood shop. He claims that a referendum on the proposal would not be a valid gauge of interest, since students might be inclined to favor the project without considering its costs and their long-range implications. Personally, Kelly opposes the measure, which he claims would require an initial outlay of anywhere from $2000 to $2500, which is currently some 12¼ per cent of the Finance Committee's total SAT allocations budget.

Jacobsohn relates science and law

Professor of Political Science, Gary L. Jacobsohn, explored the relationship between scientific advance and the judicial system in a lecture entitled "Science and the Constitution, the Fallibility of Progress," the second in a series of seven Faculty Lectures.

Jacobsohn discussed the uses and inherent problems with respect to scientific information as an aid to court decisions. Several controversial cases were cited where a scientific basis was used in place of legal standards. As Jacobsohn said, "The Underlying principles of science and constitutionalism are different." The case of Buck vs. Bell demonstrated this situation. In this case, a girl was sterilized without her consent in the effort to end a genetic line where inbecility was present. Jacobsohn enlightened his audience by revealing that such recognized members of the judiciary as Holmes and Brandeis decided in favor of the scientific viewpoint in this case. Jacobsohn noted that the scientific information used in formulating this decision was "questionable," and he said a problem exists in the "faith of judges in the reliability of scientific evidence."

The Brown vs. Board of Education case was referred to as another example of the misconceptions of scientific principles. Jacobsohn noted that the judges in this case did make the acceptable decision that separate but equal facilities were constitutionally unfair. However, he emphasized that the basis upon which this judgement was made was clearly not the best method. Psychological studies were used by the judges.

Jacobsohn concluded that the use of science has its merits in the judicial system, but added that it should only be used "secondary" to such democratic principles as due process of law.

Wizard of Oz to bewitch Winter Carnival days

Last year's winning Winter Carnival snow sculpture was the Lehman masterpiece, "Horton Cops a Brew." The 1978 Carnival theme is "The Wizard of Oz". (photo by Gledhill)

by Don Perry

"We would like to accomplish the complete transformation of Williams College from current reality to that larger and more intriguing realm of Fantasy, said Don Perry '79, chairman of Williams Health, Education, and Welfare Committee in describing the schedule of events planned for Winter Carnival 1978.

The carnival officially begins on Thursday, Feb. 16 at 4:15 p.m. when the first ski will be thrown from the balcony of Baxter Hall. A Carnival flag will be raised and a brief message from the President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, will provide inspiration for the gala weekend. Afterwards, dozens of helium-filled balloons will be released in a rainbow of color to usher in the 1978 Winter Carnival.

The real action begins on Friday, when WHEW sponsors traditional events at Poker Flats, beginning at 1 p.m. In keeping with the Wizard of Oz theme, some of the events will have unusual twists; including the Get-Toto-to-the-Sheriff Race, in which teams must negotiate a number of obstacles while tricycling on ice; the Kansas Traying Meet, which includes, the Dust Bowl Relay, which calls on teams to not only tray downhill, but uphill as well; the Twister, more commonly known as the funnelating event; Munchkin Building, in which teams must build a four-foot high munchkin with a discernible face and body (short people covered with snow do not count); and the Wizard-of-Oz, a massive free-for-all up Cardiac Hill, not unlike the ever popular King-Of-the-Hill.

Following these events, the action will move to the hockey rink at 4 pm, where the freshman class will take on all upperclassmen in the first annual Homer T. Philobert Cup Tug-O-War Championships. The Faculty will then take on the House All-Stars in the Golden Broomball Tourney. Each house and freshman entry is urged to send their best broomball player to challenge these tired old men of the ice, in this exacting and exciting sport.

WHEW's "Welcome to Hard Times, Warm Beer, . . . AND OZ" party-extraordinaire closes out the day with rock and roll provided by "Manakin." The affair is set to begin at 9:30 p.m. in Greylock Dining Hall (mixers and traditional refreshments will be provided). Perry says "dress will hopefully reflect the style of the period."

On Saturday, WHEW will provide bus service to the WOC Ski Events at Berlin Mountain. Buses will leave from Chapin at 12, 12:30, and 1 p.m., and return from Berlin at 3, 3:30, and 4 p.m.

Winter Study — Worth Saving

Williams' Winter Study Period (WSP) is a valuable addition to the College curriculum. The strength of Williams' January term rests on its support by the students and the faculty. Nonetheless, the faculty Steering Committee and the Committee on Educational Policy are investigating the possibility of weakening the valuable January term.

The attack on winter study is threefold. 1) Williams has a longer academic year than comparable colleges, although the annual pay is the same or lower than at these other institutions. Though few faculty members complain for themselves, they claim that this tends to discourage other people for applying to the faculty. 2) Students look at WSP as a recess, instead of as regular school. Why, some faculty ask, should we spend long hours preparing a course that no one will take seriously? 3) The faculty commitment to WSP cuts into valuable research time. If the faculty spent more hours in research and less in winter study courses, then they would be better educators during the semester.

Proponents of change concede that a reduction in faculty commitment, holding student time constant, will necessarily result in larger classes. This, they argue is the unavoidable cost of their improved system.

The first objection has some merit. If our faculty is indeed underpaid we should look for some method of compensation. The claim that this may drive away top notch faculty is not necessarily valid. Our faculty underrates itself if it believes this is the case, for certainly ours is among the finest in the nation, even if Williams does not pay top dollar. There must be something more here. Perhaps the intimate sense of community between students and faculty draws people to Williamstown. If this is the case, it is fortunate that Williams does not have the highest salaries, for this encourages the sociable scholar at the expense of the mercenary, whose presence would quickly undermine the special relationship we have here.

To the second objection there is no simple answer. Building snowmen, skiing and partying are more fun than studying. The more relaxed atmosphere of the WSP is conducive to play. On the other hand, the release from pressure also enables a student to take a course in a field in which he knows very little, without the fear of a low grade. It allows him to concentrate on rounding out his education rather than his GPA. Students probably should study harder, but making classes larger surely is not the way to accomplish this.

(Granted, the proposals have two methods of reducing student involvement as well. Both are totally unacceptable. Option No. 1 calls for a forced WSP off campus. The problem at other colleges is that with such a large segment of the campus gone, WSP becomes a dreary month. Option No.2 calls for voluntary participation with "financial incentives." In other words the WSP educational experience becomes a rich man's option. Neither of these alternatives have worked successfully elsewhere.)

On the third point, obviously the additional time-off could contribute to scholarly research. This might in fact make a professor a better educator. But how much? The proposals as they now stand would add an extra month or two of time every six years. When taken in conjunction with the fact that the faculty periodically take a semester or year of sabbatical leave for this same reason, the marginal benefit of a month seems mighty insignificant.

The faculty conceived WSP ten years ago to enable students to concentrate on a specific problem with a professor for a month. It quickly developed into a system wherein a student could learn about areas outside his area of expertise. These were and are valuable educational goals. Fortunately the matter is now in the hands of the Committee on Educational Policy. If they resolve the matter on those grounds, Williams will maintain the strong program of education during the month of January.

Sour Pickles

Thom Gass, '78, (which may seem kind of old for a college student) is quite correct in saying that Williams is a school founded on myths. Many people don't know, for example, that the existence of President Chandler is a myth, dreamed up many years ago when the trustees couldn't agree on a candidate the last time the Presidency was up for grabs. What actually happens is that senior faculty members pass around a John Chandler suit and take turns playing him at faculty meetings, panel discussions and so forth to create the familiar persona. In fact one of the unpublished tenure criteria these days is whether or not the suit fits.

But dissatisfied with the static nature of this traditional stock of Williams myth (none of which has South African connections—I checked), Mr. Gass has decided to add one of his own: Ladorvadora.

I'm not sure Gass or anyone else realizes what kind of monster he has let loose on this campus. What we have here is a real crisis and no doubt it won't be long before,

THE MYTH THAT ATE NEW YORK

Scene: Midafternoon. A grey haired reference librarian is filling a routine request for materials from the Williamsiana collection. A peculiar sound can be heard from behind the locked door leading to the materials, but the librarian ignores it and tries his keys on the lock. It turns freely; the door, however, remains jammed shut. Finally he forces it open and is immediately engulfed by an immense molecule which seizes him like a huge digestive enzyme. He is gone before he can produce a sound. Moments later, we hear a gentle burp.

CUT TO: The display case for Ladorvadora in the library. The camera pans across lines from the latest installment, including a description of a grey-haired mendicant appearing as a background figure.

CUT TO: Late evening. Professor Linda Sanders, sandy haired and thirtyish, is in her Stetson office working over a stack of Homer papers from her classics class. The only light source is her desk lamp, which gives the office an eerie, half-illuminated pallor. The door is ajar, and the hinges creak softly as it is slowly forced open by a creeping, softly glowing ooze. She turns toward the source of the noise, starts momentarily, then watches trance like as the ooze climbs up her bookcase and begins devouring books on Greek and Roman myth, Homer, the Aeneid and others. She hurriedly dials security.

CUT TO: The basement of Hopkins Hall. A sleepy switchboard operator answers the call.

Switch board operator: Security.

(Voice of Professor Sanders): Hello, this is Professor Sanders in 508 Stetson. I'm working late in my office tonight and just a few moments ago some strange ooze crept in and began devouring my bookcase.

Operator: (incredulously) A what began what?

Sanders: It's this strange ooze. It just came in and went straight for the mythology. It seems to be leaving the philosophy and criticism alone, but no it's going for that now too.

Operator: Can you describe this ooze?

Sanders: It's very amorphous but I think I can make out a small scene taking place in it. It looks like a group of troglodytes with funny beards and pointed ears are sitting around a fire discussing allegorical symbolism The Joy of Sex. I know that sounds crazy, but . . . Just a moment; now it's no! no! . . . it's . . .

A scream is heard and the line goes dead. The operator stares at the switchboard a moment, then turns to the radio.

Operator: Base to cruiser . . .

CUT TO: Daytime. The camera pans over another installment of Ladorvadora. In the scene being described, a group of troglodytes with funny beards and pointed ears, along with one sandy-haired, thirtyish professor of classics, is sitting around a fire discussing allegorical symbolism in The Joy of Sex.

THE MYTH THAT ATE NEW YORK CITY will be continued next week.

Ivory Crypt

To the editor:

The degree to which the student body functions in a vacuum in Williamstown has never before been driven home to me quite so succinctly. Having kept up on the latest goings-on, via the Record, (which I appreciate your sending me), I am amazed at the amount of energy and passion being expended over the "sexuality and sexual orientation" question. I am even more amazed, in light of the fact that I have followed this "controversy" while travelling across South Asia. While surrounded by disease, pestilence, privation and hunger (on a level I was once unable to even imagine), I see that the luminaries of American society, those sterling minds in Williamstown, are concerning themselves (endlessly) over pure trivia.

The colossal waste of effort, of intelligence, of time is just appalling. If only the energy being expended on such a useless matter could be harnessed to do something productive. In India, in Afghanistan, people are literally starving to death, as they go to sleep on the streets each night. While we have the potential to do something, the recent Records indicate to me what we choose to do instead. What a waste!!! I once thought that Williams College was an Ivory Tower. Today I realize I was wrong. It is instead, an Ivory Crypt.

Smoking

To the editor:

Perhaps you could clarify once and for all (if that is possible in this era) the official Williams College smoking policy. I am greatly distrubed about having to suffer through up to two hours in smokey classrooms, where teacher and-or students nonchalantly light up and puff away, while the non-smoking majority silently gags. Steve Martin, budding comedian and-or public speaker (in the uncommon sense of the term), drew an accurate parallel in his sketch "Mind If I . . . ?" It goes like this:

Man No. 1: "Hi! Mind if I smoke?"

Man No. 2: "Sure. Mind if I fart? I tried to give it up, but I just couldn't handle it."

Recently, public places have increasingly come to be protected from such discourtesy by our brothers in law-making offices. Classrooms, like restaurants and trains and movie theatres and museums, are shared by smokers and non-smokers alike. I presume, therefore, that the classroom is just as much a public place as the others. Could we, as a college, prove our progressiveness in social justice, for those of us in the fresh air cult as well as for those of the gay persuasion? If the college already maintains a policy, maybe those who aren't aware of it should be alerted, and we'll all breathe a little easier.

Concert features rock'n'roll with Jay, Yvonne, Fotomaker

The ACEC will kick of Winter Carnival Weekend on Thursday night with a triple-bill concert at Chapin Hall. The concert features Jay Ferguson and Yvonne Elliman, both current hitmakers, plus a special guest rock 'n' roll band.

Jay Ferguson is currently riding high on the charts with his hit "Thunder Island." Ferguson led two of rock's classic bands, Spirit and Jo Jo Gunne, and has two solo albums. In concert, he's a lively, piano-pounding rock 'n' roller. According to the Los Angeles Free Press, "Ted Nugent may well be the madman of the guitar, but it can and will be said that Jay Ferguson is his counterpart when it comes to keyboards."

Yvonne Elliman starred as Mary Magdalene in the original cast of "Jesus Christ Superstar," and sang the hit "I Don't Know How To Love Him." She has toured and recorded with Eric Clapton as a featured performer. She has five solo albums, and had two Top 40 hits last summer: "Love Me" and "Hello Stranger." Elliman's appearance at Williams coincides with the release of her latest album, "Night Flight," which contains the hit "If I Can't Have You" (the song also appears on the soundtrack for "Saturday Night Fever.")

Fotomaker, a hard-driving rock 'n' roll band which recently signed with Atlantic Records for $2-million, will appear as a special guest. The group is comprised of Dino Danelli, Gene Cornish, Wally Bryson, Lex Marchesi and Frankie Vinci. All five are seasoned musicians (Cornish and Danelli were founding members of the Rascals, and Bryson was the lead guitarist for the Raspberries.) The New York Post recently wrote: "Ever hear of Fotomaker? You will, believe me, you will."

The concert will begin promptly at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are still available, and are $4.00 for Williams students ($5.00 for the general public) and are on sale at The Record Store (on Spring Street) and Baxter Hall (from 11 to 1).

Coed for the weekend

Entries exchange JA's

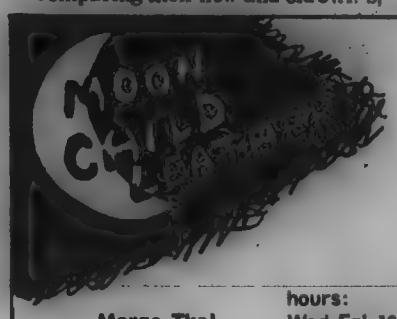
by Sally Midgley

On a seemingly ordinary Friday night during Winter Study, Tom Cox and Tom Gardner, J.A.'s in Williams D, walked into Baxter Hall, surrounded by five or six girls from Morgan Mid-West. Adorned in red T-shirts lettered "Morgan Mid West—Where the girls are the best," the two were quickly bombarded with food and jokingly called traitors. This was the first public advertisement of the J.A. weekend exchange between Morgan MW and Williams D.

The idea of a J.A. swap originated with a visitor from Union College, where the Resident Advisor exchange is an annual campus-wide tradition. Morgan Mid-Westers picked up on the idea and planned to switch J.A.'s with Williams D.

Betsy Jeffrey and Mary Lou Cardwell, J.A.'s in Morgan MW, arrived at Williams D ready for action. They were greeted by a quiet entry and a "Welcome" sign on the door. After dinner, however, they returned to a room strewn with magazines and dog biscuits. "There wasn't an inch of floor space," said Betsy. The visiting J.A.'s were then given complimentary toilet paper and more dog biscuits, which they were forced to eat. Terry Henaghan's room service was hospitably offered to them.

Comparing their new and old J.A.'s, Williams D members began their traditional Friday night activities to see if Betsy and Mary Lou could surpass Tom and Tom in hard-core partying. Forced to have a beer at all times, Mary Lou said, "'No' was not an acceptable answer. Those guys were relentless. The visiting J.A.'s were later privileged with a private performance by "The Four Tips." This oddly clad group of Freshmen have since become famous for their own disco dance called "The Yank."



After proving themselves as new J.A.'s, Betsy and Mary Lou were finally allowed to sleep for the remainder of the night. Woken up by room service, they enjoyed a nourishing breakfast in bed: stale beer from the night before and Cheerios, followed by a fresh beer and a dog biscuit.

The weekend continued in similar fashion for the Morgan MW J.A.'s in Williams D. "I'd love to have guys in the entry," said Betsy. "We really became good buddies. It was a different experience."

Wearing the Morgan MW T-shirts to Baxter was "the most embarrassing part of the weekend," said Tom Gardner. Overlooking that incident, both J.A.'s from Williams D claimed "We got the better end of the deal. It was definitely a good idea." Morgan Mid-Westers also did do their share of destruction: a toilet-papered room, perfumed gym bags, alarm clocks set at 20 minute intervals and beds filled with dog food. "The demos were incredible," commented Tom Gardner.

Friday night the visiting J.A.'s were escorted to the Williams Inn. "The [illegible] was great," said Tom Cox. At 1 a.m. Saturday morning, Debbie Hailey and Roe Noce paid a nocturnal visit to Tom and Tom. "I screamed—it scared the hell out of me," admitted Tom Gardner. Saturday afternoon the J.A.'s attended the Varsity women's hockey game "to support the girls in our entry," Tom Cox said.

A late-night party and a raid on the Tyler House kitchen were the highlights of Morgan MW action Saturday night. A 4:30 a.m. attack of the munchies drove the J.A.'s and a group of Mid-Westers on a search for food. Unable to find the donut man in Baxter, the contingent journeyed to Tyler. "We were like vultures looking for food," Jackie Logan said. The exchange was enthusiastically accepted by the majority. "Mary Lou and Betsy are very agreeable people," said Yoshi Belash. "They never said 'no.' We taught them a lot." Terri Henaghan admitted, "We miss them now. We're ready to have them back. This time we'll party more." Overall consensus in Williams D was that the Morgan MW J.A.'s are "definitely more heavyweights than Tom and Tom."

Hoopsters' time elapses as Clarke wins 59-51

An insufficient warm-up cost the Williams women's basketball team another loss Friday night, this time at the hands of Division III Clarke University. The Ephwomen, following an abbreviated ten minute pre-game drill, took the remainder of the first half to get rolling, losing the contest 59-51 after trailing 14 points at midgame. The contest then turned into what might have been a "come from behind victory" according to Williams coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin for "given three or four more minutes we would have won."

"Three or four more minutes and we would have won. . ."

Coming onto the tartan court for an expected victory, Williams suffered through a dismal first half, going for only 6 of 28 from the floor. Although the squad had a slightly better average from the foul line, Clarke was hot in the first half, making the shots which have brought them to a 12-1 season record.

Ready to roll in the second half, Williams came on strong, led by guard Monica Grady who racked up 19 points in the contest. The Ephwomen outscored their hosts 36-30 in the second half as the squad lifted their percentage to 37 per cent from the floor. Co-captain Maggie O'Brien saw a good second stanza with 12 points while frosh Cathy Gernert sank three baskets along with Leslie Milne who also had 6 points. On the boards, Anne Youngling retained possession of her rebounding crown, pulling down 14 in a performance which pleased Hamblin.

Midway through the season, Williams stands 4-5 looking ahead to Tuesday's contest with Mount Holyoke and onto Dartmouth Thursday, also at 7 pm in Lasell gymnasium. The Ephwomen hope to repeat last year's upset of Dartmouth, although several new Green hoopsters will make the challenge tougher. According to coach Hamblin, should Williams "put our offense together shooting wise", eliminating the forced shot situation in which they are now trapped, the remainder of the season will be bright, with the squad qualifying for Division II tournament play at the season's end.

Eight advance to Easterns

Trackmen clinch season

In their final regular-season meet of the year, the Williams College Trackmen thrashed both Westfield and Worcester State to close out the schedule with a 10-5 record. The meet was never in doubt, as the Ephs displayed a balanced attack in the field and running events. Seven seniors also turned in some fine individual performances in their last meet at Williams.

In the field events, senior tri-captain Larry Tanner again dominated the weight throw, outdistancing his nearest opponent by 13'. Tanner's season will continue Saturday, as he has qualified for the Division III Easterns. In the shot put, Jim Desimone finished with a strong second, followed directly by Tanner. Senior Greg McAleenan took his usual first in the long jump with 21'6", with Dave Durrell in fourth at 19'11". McAleenan will also go to the Easterns. The pole vaulters made another strong showing as Scott Mayfield, Jim Holmes and Dee Reeves took 2-3-4 respectively. McAleenan returned to take two fourths in the triple jump and high jump to close out the field scoring.

The Ephs were absolutely devastating on the track, as they held a 70-17-13 edge. In the mile, Phil Darrow and Mike Behrman went 1-2 with 4:19 and 4:34. The 60 yard hurdles went just as easily to Williams as senior tri-captain Ron White raced to a relaxed first in 7.7. Vernon Davis was again right behind with 8.0. Both men will be competing Saturday. Durrell came back in the 440 to take second in 54.2, while senior Paul Untch grabbed a third in his last indoor race with 56.0.

Senior Terry O'Reilly led a string of four Ephs to the tape in the 600. O'Reilly finished with 1:17.8, followed by Lee Jackson, Bob Tyler and Calvin Schnure, all finishing the year with personal bests in the event. Reeves, Davis and Al Gentry teamed up for a 1-2-4 finish in the 60, as did Tom Schreck, Darrell Wallace and Jeff Coombs in the 880. Though Schreck qualified for the Easterns in the event, he will run the mile instead, joined by Darrow and Dan Sullivan. After Darrow returned for a second in the 1000, the two-milers moved onto the track led by seniors Joe Kolb and Frank Carr. These two were not happy with their final times, yet they destroyed the competition with an easy 1-2 finish. Frosh John McCammond grabbed a fourth in the event. Tri-captain Kolb will run the two-mile Saturday.

In the relays, Durrell, Untch, O'Reilly and White teamed for an excellent 3:35 in the mile and an easy first. The Two mile composed of Wallace, Jackson, Schnure and Schreck settled for second, but a team has qualified and will be entered Saturday.

While eight trackmen will go on to the Easterns and possibly the more competitive New Englands, the remainder of the squad will break for an intermediate training period while preparing for what promises to be a successful outdoor season.

Diver Bill Kelly took third in both of his events as Colgate outclass the Ephmen, 82-42, last Saturday.

Wrestlers trounce Trinity

by Wayne Eckerson

Williams College Wrestling team soundly trounced Trinity by a 32-15 score last Saturday at Trinity. The win avenges last year's 33-15 loss and boosts Williams record to 4-6, its best in several seasons.

"It was a really good win to have before the Little Three Tournament," says Captain Hal Zendle. "We know we have a good chance to bring the Purple Pail back to Williams."

Zendle backed up his optimism with a 27-2 thrashing of his 118 pound opponent. He now boasts a 10-0 record and is Williams' best prospect in the upcoming New England Tournament.

Williams' domination in the lower classes continued as it grabbed four consecutive victories after Zendle's bout. Two Trinity forfeits in the upper weight classes insured a Williams' victory.

Rick Goodell defeated Trinity's captain 6-2 and is unbeaten (2-0) since he replaced Hal Zendle in the 126 pound weight class. Steve Cox has rebounded off a mid-winter slump to win his last two matches. Cox eked out a 7-6 decision in the 134 pound weight class.

Scott Frost registered the only pin of the afternoon. His win marks his fifth victory in six matches. In the 150 pound weight class Mark Walch improved his personal record to 5-5 by scoring a 7-3 decision.

Williams will face a strong Wesleyan team and an injury depleted Amherst squad in the Little Three Tournament which will be held at Wesleyan this Saturday.

Dartmouth carnival fifth disappoints Eph skiers

In collegiate ski competition over the weekend, the University of Vermont won the Dartmouth Winter Carnival in Hanover, N.H. The win marked the second carnival victory for UVM in as many weeks.

For the Williams College men's ski team, who placed fifth, the weekend proved to be one of mediocrity. The carnival started out on the wrong foot Friday morning when only three of the five-man alpine team could finish the first run of the slalom. The three that did finish the first run, Don Tarnelli, Andy Mikell and Roger Prevot, also managed to negotiate the second run on two feet and finished 12th, 16th, and 23rd. Their performances left Williams in 5th place with 49.5 points, over thirty points behind Middlebury, the winner of the event.

In the cross country Friday afternoon, co-captain Jeff Magoon was the top Williams finisher in eighth position. Magoon covered the 15 kilometer course in 52:44, just two minutes behind winner Mark Wagner of UVM and the U.S. Ski Team. Dennis Desroches and Rob Craig finished in twentieth and twenty-second to round out the Williams effort.

Saturday morning the Ephs hoped to get things turned around with a good showing in the Giant Slalom, but it wasn't to be. Don Tarnelli, Chris Welch and Andy Mikell were all within .5 seconds of each other but three seconds out of the lead in 21st, 22nd, 23rd places.

In the jumping competition that was observed by over 2,000 people, Chris Berggrav of Dartmouth continued to dominate the Eastern jumping circuit as he handily won over Bob Zinck, also of Dartmouth. For Williams, Jeff Hastings placed 5th, Tom Dodds 16th and Andy Kelly 27th.

Though there weren't any particularly outstanding performances over the weekend Fisher "knows the potential is there" and plans to have the team fired up and ready for the Williams Carnival this coming weekend in Williamstown, Mass.

Jeffs, Clarke beat hoopsters

by Frank Pergolizzi

Before an SRO crowd at Amherst's Alumni Gymnasium, the Amherst College basketball team used a second half explosion to defeat Williams, 63-48.

The second half opened with the Lord Jeffs leading by five, 29-24. When guards Calvin Malone and Mark Martland found they had left their shooting touch in the locker room, baskets by Williams' Gerry Kelly and Dean Ahlberg cut the margin to one. After Malone finally swished one through, a foul shot by Matt Spangler and a basket by Ahlberg tied the score at 31 with 14:50 remaining. This was the turning point of the game.

With Amherst unable to score consistently, Williams had four opportunities to take the lead, and perhaps swing around the momentum enough to change the complexion of the game. But each attempt resulted in a missed shot or a turnover. The Lord Jeffs regained their touch and baskets by Martland and Bill Swiacki put them up by four. A few minutes later, leading by six, 48-42, Amherst ran off six consecutive points to seal the victory. The finishing touch was a driving dunk by center Dan Griffin that brought the crowd to its feet and drove the final nail into the Williams' coffin.

The first half was closely played, with Amherst once opening up a seven point lead. Malone and Martland seemed to have radar in their shots, but Kelly and Ahlberg managed to keep Williams in the game. At the end of the half Williams got back in the game using a half court press that forced Amherst into mistakes. Kelly had a chance to cut the margin to one just before the intermission but was called for an offensive foul while driving the lane. Amherst took the ball down the court and Griffin connected at the buzzer to make it a five point margin compared to one.

Williams missed guard Andy Straka, who had just left the infirmary after a bout with the flu. The sophomore did see some action, but was ineffective. Without Straka, averaging 12.7 ppg, the Ephmen in effect had only one scoring guard on the floor. This hurt them offensively, as Amherst could concentrate their defense on Kelly, without the threat of another shooter working with him.

Williams has lost six in a row, eight of their last nine, and their first two Little Three contests. They must get back on the winning track Wednesday at W.P.I. before Saturday's Winter Carnival rematch with Wesleyan. The score:

Winter Carnival begins today

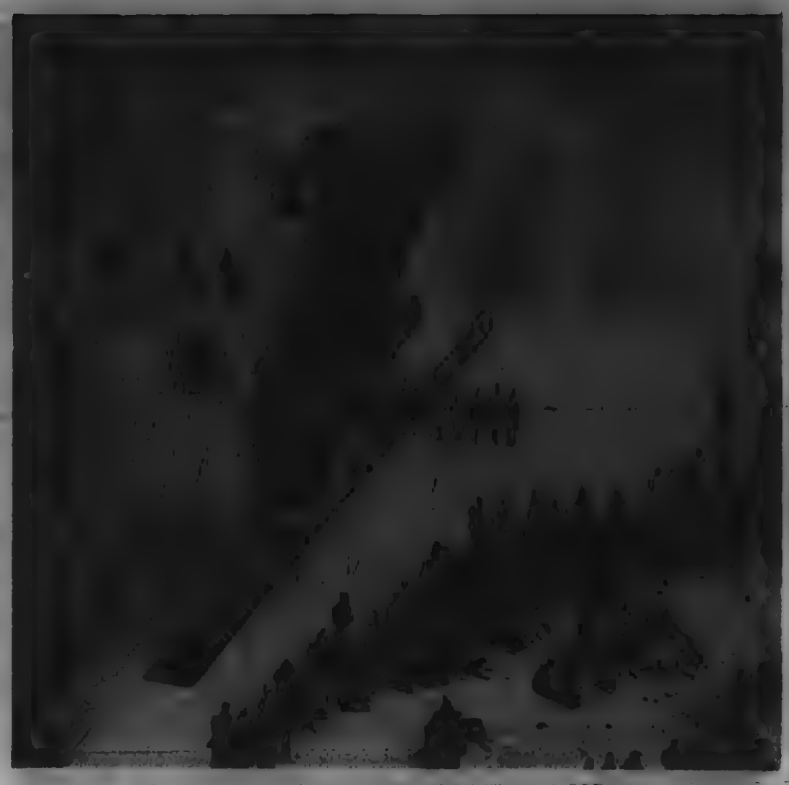
The top collegiate skiers in the Northeast gathered at Williams this weekend for the annual Winter Carnival. While ski racing and jumping are a highlight of the weekend, there will be a host of other activities tied into the Carnival, adding up to the busiest three days of the winter at Williams.

Students in residential houses are at work on ice sculptures, a traditional part of the Carnival festivities. This year the theme is the "Wizard of Oz." Huge mounds of snow piled up in front of the residential houses will be converted into characters like the Straw Man, the Tin Man, and the Wicked Witch of the West. Judging begins tomorrow morning.

Williams Health, Education, and Welfare will sponsor an all-College party tonight at 9:30 in Greylock on the theme, "Welcome to Hard Times, Warm Beer, [illegible] and OZ." Music will be by "Manakin," and admission is $1. Appropriate costumes are encouraged, and prizes will be awarded for the best costume.

The Social Co-ordinating Committee is sponsoring an all-College party, "A Beatlemania Extravaganza," in Mission Park at 9 p.m. tonight. Music will be provided by "Walrus," and admission is $1.

About 20 men's and women's ski teams are on campus for the Winter Carnival skiing competition. In addition to teams from Williams, there are skiers from schools including the University of Vermont, Dartmouth, Harvard and Middlebury. Ski action began this morning at 8:45 a.m. with the women's giant slalom, followed by the men's slalom at 11 a.m. The racing events take place on Berlin Mountain.



Cross country ski racing events followed this afternoon with the women's races at 1:45 and the men's at 3 p.m. The cross country action was in the Savoy State Forest near Route 116 southeast of Adams, Mass.

The men's and women's slalom races will begin tomorrow morning at 9 at Berlin Mountain. Ski jumping will be at 1 p.m. with a $1 fee for students and $1.50 for non-students. Saturday afternoon a bus will run from Chapin Hall to Berlin Mountain for the ski jumping. The buses will leave at noon, 12:30 and 1 p.m., returning at 3 p.m., 3:30 and 4 p.m. The bus ride will cost $1 for students and $1.50 for non-students.

The list of other things to do during the Carnival weekend shows almost non-stop activity ranging from other sporting events to theatre productions, films and concerts.

Those who prefer indoor activity may enjoy the Williamstheatre Production of Anton Chekhov's "Three Sisters." There will be performances tonight and tomorrow evenings at 8:30 in the Adams Memorial Theatre.

Athletic events include a hockey game tonight at 7:30 against Middlebury in the Chapman rink. Tomorrow evening the basketball team plays Wesleyan in the Lasell Gym at 8. The men's squash team is at home at 2 p.m. against Williams alumni. The women's squash team plays Penn at 11 a.m. The women's club hockey team is host to Dartmouth at noon on Saturday.

Ski jumps will be only one of the many events scheduled Saturday on Berlin Mountain. Racing begins at 8:45 with the Women's Giant Slalom.

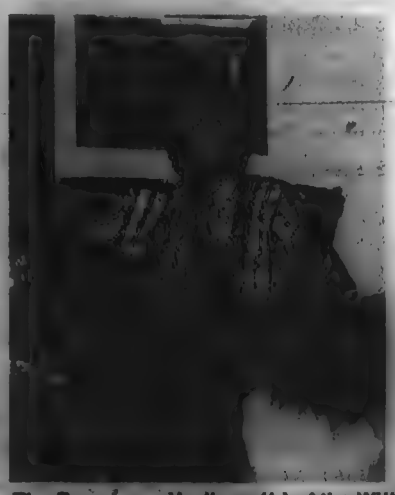
Panel on homosexuality explores current dilemmas

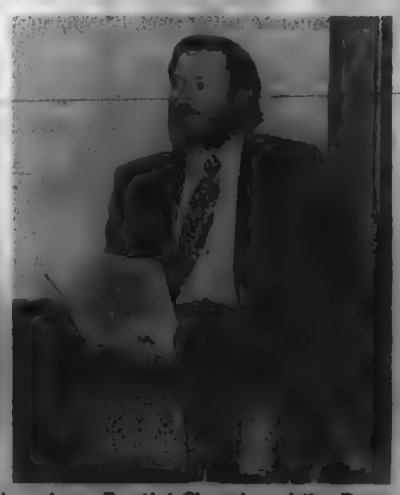
by Fred Thys

"Homosexuals are as sick as heterosexuals", according to Dr. Richard Ford, a psychoanalyst at the Austen-Riggs Center and one of the members of Monday night's panel entitled "Homosexuality: Current Perspectives and Future Implications."

The panel, which was sponsored by Phi Beta Kappa and organized by Peter Sachs '79 and Lilli Scheye '78, dealt with issues including relationship between the Church and homosexuals, the causes and the nature of homosexuality, the causes of homophobia and the treatment of homosexuals by the law.



Ford said that there was no well-established psychological ideology concerning homosexuality. He pointed out, however, that there was a general consensus that "the homosexual pattern is not biologically or genetically favored". Ford quoted Freud's description of homosexuality as a "variation of sexual functions produced by a certain arrest in sexual development".



The Rev. Jerry Heslinga of the Baptist Church of Williamstown, emphasized a need for compassion and humility, warning of the danger of applying labels. "The Church must be repentent," he added. "We have created homophobia." He pointed out, however, that he believed that "heterosexuality is God's intention for sexuality." When another panelist, the Rev. Robert Moore of the United Methodist Church of Williamstown, pointed out that the New Testament made no mention of homosexuality, Heslinga replied that it also made no mention of nuclear warfare.

Moore admitted that he did not favor the position of his church on the issue, saying that homophobic fears had entered into its refusal to condone homosexuality. He continued to say that the Christian ideal is to "live what we are" and that homosexuals are capable of love. According to Moore, homosexuals "learn to think of themselves as being sick. We force promiscuous forms of relationships."

Barnett cited the fact that a wide range of laws impose serious constraints on homosexuals. "The law does not do what the law should do in civil rights generally", he said. He added, however, that laws against homosexuals, are being struck down by the courts as unconstitutional on the basis of equal protection under the law, and as a protection of privacy.

In response to a question from Kenneth A. Bertsch '78 about the proposed sexual orientation clause in the College's non-discrimination statement Barnett called the essential problem "vague language." Barnett claimed that his proposal that more specific language be used was rejected. When Bertsch asked Barnett if he would take it upon himself to introduce a motion with more specific language at the next faculty meeting he was cut off on the grounds that the panel had not been intended to discuss homosexuality at Williams or be a forum for political issues.

Elections

The Elections Committee announced today that self nominations are open for a number of College offices. Interested parties should leave name and office sought in the dean's office.

CC: President, Vice-President and six at-large representatives.
CEP: one representative from each major division and one at-large.
CUE: one representative from each class and one at-large.
Honor and Discipline Committee: two representatives from each class.

The deadline for applications is 4 p.m. March 1. The elections are March 6 and 7.

CC subsidy defrays Carnival cost

The WHEW obtained an $810 subsidy from the College Council Wednesday night to cover a portion of its anticipated Winter Carnival expenses. In addition, Sarah Mersereau '80 explained to the Council the schedule for residential housing applications.

John Duffield of the Finance Committee informed the Council that the $810 grant will be used to pay Winter Carnival expenditures on public relations, entertainment and refreshments at tonight's dance, and transportation to the ski events. Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly mentioned that this allocation to WHEW will reduce the SAT buffer fund to $3500.

Concern was expressed by Bonnie Schindel of Prospect that the Social Coordinating Committee (SCC) is billing each residential house $50 to defray the cost of its dance in Mission Park tonight. Similarly, several representatives were dismayed that two large parties are both scheduled for tonight. Jeff Wright of Tyler explained that the SCC, at a previous meeting, "wrongly formed the impression that the house social chairmen agreed to the idea of a second party on Carnival Weekend" and that they would support it with house funds.

According to housing representative Sarah Mersereau, option housing, commonly referred to as co-op housing, was recently given tacit approval by the Housing Committee and the Committee on Undergraduate Life. Those interested in this form of housing should attend the Housing Committee meeting in the Makepeace Room of Greylock, Monday at 7:30

164 seek JA positions

One hundred sixty-four sophomores have applied to become Junior Advisors for incoming freshmen next fall, the largest number to do so in the College's history, according to Lauren Stevens, Dean of Freshmen. The total includes 106 men and 57 women.

Stevens said that 28 men and 23 women will be chosen this year to serve as J.A.s. In addition, a small number of applicants will be placed on a waiting list as alternates. Last year, 92 men and 45 women filed applications for Junior Advisor positions.

Two possible explanations for the record number of applications were offered by Bronson Fargo, President of this year's J.A.s. Some people apply because they had good experiences as freshmen and want to emulate their former J.A.s. Others desire to become Junior Advisors because they had unpleasant relationships with their J.A.s and wish to help incoming freshmen avoid similar problems.

Junior Advisors are selected by a committee composed of eight student volunteers, five current J.A.s, twenty-one seniors and the Dean of Freshmen. The J.A. application consists of a personal statement written by the applicant and a recommendation from both a peer and a former J.A. All applications are first read aloud to the committee as a whole. Next, each applicant is represented individually by a member of the committee, and some are then eliminated by a vote. Those chosen randomly from the pool of remaining applicants will be next year's Junior Advisors.

Stevens and Fargo both rejected the Number applying for admission falls

by Randy Wang

According to Philip Smith, Director of Admissions, the Admissions office has received about 4450 applications this year, a drop of 5 per cent from last year. Regardless of the slight reduction in the number of applicants, Smith still expects that the College will end up with the largest number of applications for small colleges.

The number of female applicants remained essentially constant at 1900, a drop of perhaps one per cent this year from last. Male applications dropped from 2800 in 1977 to about 2550 this year.

Smith expressed no surprise at the overall decline in applications, since numbers have been high for the past few years. In addition, he noted, the national population of eighteen year olds is on the decline.

This December, the college accepted 145 out of 539 candidates through the Early Decision process, down from 161 last year. The drop was deliberate, claimed Smith, in order to provide "leeway" for the regular admissions system.

This year, for the first time, outright rejections were sent out to one hundred Early Decision candidates. Smith explained that he felt that this was a fairer, more orderly system, and added that it would be continued in the future.

Imminent WSP change not forseen

by Lisa Hartigan

"Any proposals for changes in the present Winter Study format lie at least one-and-a-half years ahead of where we are now," stated Prof. Gordon C. Winston, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP).

Gary Jacobsohn, chairman of the faculty Steering Committee, agreed with Winston that no changes in Winter Study are imminent. "There are no proposals, as such, for any changes in the Winter Study program," he emphasized.

Explaining the source of recent concern about possible change in the Winter Study program, Winston said, "Questions have merely been raised concerning the sharp differences in our teaching schedule and those of schools we normally compare with Williams, such as Amherst, Wesleyan, and Swarthmore."

The Steering Committee presented those questions to the CEP in the form of a one-page paper outlining several possible alternatives to the present system, including a reduction in the number of Winter Study courses taught by faculty from the present two of three to either one of two or one of three. Other alternatives are a relaxation of the present requirement that students participate in four Winter Studies and a voluntary January program that would offer professors additional salary for teaching.

Representative Jane Garvey '78 explained that the CEP would consider the implications of changes in the present Winter Study format as a result of the Steering Committee's

Letters: Investment policy, WSP, and 'Junta'

Divestiture

To the editor:

Concerning the letter by Melville Ireland '77 (Feb. 7) on the college's endowment investments in firms with operations in South Africa, I was outraged at Mr. Ireland's distorted economic model and disregard for his fellow man.

Mr. Ireland has the amazing ability to draw an economic model that totally neglects any "moral or social" influences. Ever since men have cooperated in a social sense, the survival of an individual has been interwoven with those around him. Constraints on the immediate and harmful, self-centered impulses of men have developed in every society. These constraints, in the form of political frameworks and religious morals, were the way men communicated to each other their sensibility regarding thoughtless actions.

Today we witness, on a world-wide scale, the breaking down of this type of communication. Diplomats, philosophers, political scientists, theologians and politicians are constantly attempting to patch this communication gap, or to institute more viable methods. On the other hand, I believe Mr. Ireland—and he is by no means alone—is exploiting this communication gap. He simply picks and chooses, according to his personal and financial goals, to whom he wants to admit a social responsibility. Mr. Ireland is able then to sit back and watch South African blacks suffer under the tyrannical and terrorist rule of the white minority with "no hard feelings". At the same time, he justifies indirect co-conspiracy of the President, the trustees and the entire faculty and student body with corporations supporting the South African white minority, which exploits a horrendously unequal and unjust factor market.

What of Mr. Ireland's proposal to seek more "direct and effective mechanism(s)" to bring about a South African state with fewer inequalities and less internal suffering? He suggests "registering concern by writing Congressmen and/or directors of corporations." In a slightly different context, I would like to pose the same question that Mr. Ireland asks. Will the multi-billion dollar companies in which Williams invests be hurt? I can assure you that they will not. South Africa is a valuable economic partner to corporations with interest there, and they are not about to change this profitable relationship. It is a result of the simple economic model that Mr. Ireland proposes, and I find it at fault.

At the risk of contradicting Mr. Ireland's obvious knowledge of the stock market, I believe that Williams' endowment investments in corporations involved in supporting South Africa's present minority regime could be worked out of the portfolio without considerable losses. The same wise investors who recommend the present portfolio could most likely rearrange the endowment portfolio over a few years with a very limited loss.

The well being of humanity being the unquestionable goal of education at Williams seems to indicate that everyone here would take issue with the personal involvement implied by our investments in corporations supporting the injustices that run rampant in South Africa. The argument of the necessity for secure financial investments in the existing world economic system will doubtless be the final stand for the ultra-rational close-minded businessman. I open my argument by saying that in the present world economic system which promotes a disregard for mankind, I find no security. Even if the college were to eventually achieve financial alienation with firms interested in South Africa, we would all still be equally involved in the problems of the injustices to humanity taking place there. The first steps towards a world in which every man may live an active, fulfilling life seems, though, to be a cessation in supporting such injustices as are found today in South Africa.

Mitchell corrects

To the editor:

I would like to clarify some of the issues reported in last Friday's article on Winter Study.

First, and most important, are two corrections. I was quoted as saying: "Faculty feel they do not have enough time for their studies. In addition, Williams professors believe they are spending three more weeks teaching than their colleagues at other colleges." It is unfortunate that the reporter chose to describe this as the major argument, for it does a great disservice to a large majority of the faculty. In fact, I said that this was the context in which the issue was first raised on the CEP last Spring and this Fall. While it is true that at least one faculty member sees this as the major issue, it has come before the CEP, and will come before the faculty, as an educational issue, for it is in some of the educational aspects of Winter Study that some faculty members perceive problems.

The second correction concerns a quote by Michael Bell which, taken out of context, totally misrepresents the position which he took at the College Council meeting. Bell said: "Winter Study courses ought to have a syllabus and a work load comparable to regular semesters." In so saying, however, he was merely describing Winter Study as it was originally intended to be. In fact, he supported a very different point of view, and spoke out in favor of many of the aspects of our present Winter Study.

The reason I brought the issue to Council last week was because of the unfortunate manner in which it was presented to the CEP the preceding Monday. The chairman handed out an outline of the proposal and informed us that it was urgent that we discuss it at our next, already overloaded meeting, as it was to come up for discussion at the next faculty meeting. The student members of the committee were, naturally somewhat alarmed, and as College Council representative on the CEP I felt it was my duty to inform the Council of the issue. In subsequent discussion with Dean Brock I was reassured that the consideration of any alterations would be a fairly long and thoughtful process, and that the faculty, at the next meeting, would only be informed of the fact that the CEP was discussing it.

Let me then take this opportunity to ask students and faculty who have ideas regarding this subject to please see any of the CEP representatives over the next few weeks as discussion continues on this important issue. Only if this is done can the CEP act as a productive, enlightened forum to promote the best interests of the college.

Larry Mitchell '78
Member, CEP

WSP proposal

To the editor:

Larry Mitchell's calculation that the offering of 100 Winter Study courses means an average of 18 students per class is obviously incorrect; it ignores the fact that a substantial number of students do 99's for WSP. Hence the reduction of course offerings to 50 would not raise the average class size to 36 as Mitchell suggested. This miscalculation does however, suggest an alternative solution to the WSP problem.

If each student was required to undertake at least one 99 during her or his college career, the required number of faculty teaching courses would be substantially reduced. Furthermore, such a requirement would be desirable in that it encourages individual intellectual creativity, something that few courses at Williams truly encourage.

Granted, such a requirement would require more faculty time (as advisors) than the proposals suggested already. It would, however, maintain the highly desirable features of WSP, something the other proposals cannot do.

Mini-seminars

To the editor:

I am afraid that I did not make myself very clearly understood in my remarks to the College Council last Wednesday in regard to the proposed "mini-seminars" idea. The suggestion was, as Dean Stevens' letter pointed out, made by Sue Galli '78, and not by The Purple Key Society.

The Key has, at present, no plans regarding the sponsoring of such seminars. However, I am sure that we would not be unresponsive to such a proposition, and would be more than willing to help in any way we could.

Chris DiAngelo '79
for Purple Key

Friday group

To the editor:

So far this year, Williams has been rocked by controversies: newspaper advertisements, library pranks, sexism, homophobia, and the Purple Key Night controversy to name but a few. Leading the debate on all of these issues has been the job of that mysterious and mystical organization—the Thursday Night Coalition. Who are those courageous souls, and how have they managed to reach a position of such prominence that the Administration quakes when their very name is mentioned? Could it be that the TNC'ers (or for those who prefer more pronounceable acronyms, the Tinkers) are the real power elite of Williams College?

In order to avoid further study of the pressing questions facing Williams enumerated above, we wish to announce the formation of a new campus organization: the Friday Morning Junta. Lest any come to the false conclusion that its members are apathetic ignoramuses who could not care less about the issues raised by the Tinkers, the Friday Morning Junta had adopted the following motto: "We care enough to think it's stupid." So if you are tired of the proto-puritans who find newspaper ads which show girls in bikinis "objectionable," write to the Friday Morning Junta care of its secret S.U. Box No. 2492. Naturally your name will be kept confidential. Defecting Tinkers are welcome.

Staff Promotions

Record Editor Chip Buckner recently announced the promotions of six staff reporters to Associate Editor. Buckner named John Libertine '80, Stu Massad '80, Tim Jones '81, Sally Midgely '81, Anne Morris '81, and Randy Wang '80 in his appointments.

Libertine, Buckner explained, served as acting Arts Editor during winter study and did an "outstanding job." Stu Massad also assumed department editor responsibilities during the month of January and was promoted as a result of his "good work" in News.

Randy Wang and Tim Jones, both Record staff news reporters have been, as Buckner explained, "the backbone of that department." Sally Midgely and Ann Morris have been active in the arts and features departments where, according to Buckner, "we've especially been needing new talent."

Associate editors normally continue writing on a regular basis although they are given the added responsibility of editing copy. The news editors expressed satisfaction with their appointments although Libertine noted that his new-found fame became trying at times." Flu becomes mild epidemic

Dr. Robert A. Goodell, Jr., director of health, said Tuesday that Williams has been experiencing a mild influenza epidemic for six to eight weeks with only a temporary drop off a few weeks ago.

Usually, the Infirmary sees one or two sick people a day. In the last eight weeks, eight to ten people have sought attention daily.

Goodell was unable to specify the specific strain as it takes "sophisticated studies and weeks to learn the final answer." The epidemic afflicting many students behaves like influenza, stated Goodell, as it is a viral chest infection in the bronchial tubes, accompanied by fever, cough, sore throat, and hoarseness. He added the campus influenza was relatively mild in spite of what some students may say; it could be worse.

The infirmary can hold 20 people "if pushed;" at this time it has about 15 students. So far, no one has been turned away said Goodell, though they have been discouraged to come to the infirmary unless quite ill. Students have been sent to the North Adams Hospital for reasons not flu-related.

The flu has affected the whole eastern coast. Sports events like the Amherst and UMass hockey games have been cancelled. The Dutch swim team brought only half a team as a result of the epidemic. Goodell describes our flu as "pokey and persistent" not "explosive." North Adams State is an example of the latter; the doctor there saw 20 patients in one hour Monday.

NEWS BRIEFS

Archaeologist Leakey speaks Monday

Dr. Mary Leakey, a renowned archaeologist who participated in the discovery of the oldest traces of man on earth, will speak of her findings Monday night at 8 p.m. in Jesup Hall Auditorium.

Mary Leakey is the wife of the late Louis S. B. Leakey, who gained international fame for his discoveries in Africa of traces of prehistoric man. Excavation sites at the Olduvai Gorge and Laetolil have yielded skeleton fragments dated at between 3.5 and 3.7 million years old. Since the death of her husband, Mary Leakey has led expeditions to Laetolil and supervises the field team at Oduvai.

The Leakey lecture is sponsored by the Anthropology Department, the Laboratory of Prehistoric Archaeology and the Lecture Committee.

Poli Sci Review holds essay contest

All students are invited to submit papers pertaining to political science, economics, or history. No contest theme has been selected. Likewise, there are no limits on article length. The winning articles will be chosen on the basis of content and grammatical precision.

The deadline for all articles is March 1; papers may be left with the Political Science Secretary. Any student desiring more information is urged to attend one of the editorial board meetings held Wednesday evenings at 6:00 in Greylock A.

According to Stevens, the most important traits in a potential J.A. are the willingness to make an effort to develop relationships with freshmen in the entry, and to be what he termed "approachable". Fargo said he was pleased that so many sophomores had filed applications because it insured a diverse group to choose from.

The committee should finish the selection process before spring vacation, according to Stevens.

concern for faculty interests.

Jacobsohn said that he presently does not know the extent of faculty discontent with the January program, but that he has received complaints from individual professors. Williams' teaching schedule averages one month longer than that of comparable academic institutions, and Jacobsohn commented that the matter "deserved looking into."

Jacobsohn said he realizes students are sensitive about preserving Winter Study as it is and there is a strong possibility that, after a more thorough investigation of the matter, no alterations will be made in the present format.

"Three Sisters" opens on Friday

Visiting with the Prozorovs

by Thom Gass

Russians do not say, "We're going to see a production of The Three Sisters," but, "We're going to visit with the Prozorov's tonight." "That is the greatest thing anyone can say about a play," said Gregory Boyd, director of the upcoming visit with the Prozorov sisters.

The title, like The Godfather, doesn't quite tell the story. "It's the most 'family' of plays," Boyd explained. "It's about fourteen people." Chekhov fretted a delicate lace whose threads and whose spaces equally amaze. "If you look for a plot, you won't find one. If you look for events, they all take place offstage. Everything you need to know is there, but not as exposition."

Three Sisters is not a show for a spotlight; characters carry their own candles. The play "counts on you seeing all the people, all the time," which is lost, Boyd pointed out, in the movie adaptations and in reading. His task has been to mix and modulate, to "create an atmosphere where the family can happen . . . . To know these characters, it's important to see who's listening to whom as opposed to who's speaking." This makes extraordinary demands on the actors. It's easy to act when you have lines," said Stanislavsky, "the test of a great actor is to be able to listen well." "And," added Boyd, "to not listen well."

I admit to taking far less care in rending Stanislavsky's words than did Greg Boyd in rendering Chekhov's. Professor Nick Fersen wrote a translation against which Boyd measured about eleven others. The play is virtually uncut. "Everything is important." "In approaching Three Sisters, if you've got a knife in one hand, you need a stethoscope in the other. Every line is so close to the heart." Boyd forced a shrug at the inevitable loss of "the million and one literary jokes." Just as Godot plays with lines from the Bible, Shelley, Milton, Shakespeare . . . so Three Sisters gathers and undercuts much of Russian literature.

Overheard in the lobby after Stanislavsky's initial production in 1901:

"What's all the fuss? They're three intelligent upper class women. If they want to get to Moscow, why don't they buy a train ticket?"

"Ah. But you can't buy a ticket to this Moscow."

"You could call this play, Waiting for Moscow," suggested Boyd.

After watching the play in rehearsal, I expect radiance in the lobby. Each character has quiet access to a churning enthusiasm, and Boyd's direction is confident and unintrusive. The hands of this ensemble are strong enough to hold the piece lightly.

"Some people have a 'received' notion of what is Chekhovian," Boyd pronounced the last word as if a doctor had stuck a tongue depressor down his throat and said, "Open wide and say Chekh-ohhh-vian." "A Chekhovian play, they think, is something turgid with lots of pauses. Chekhovian acting, sentimental with lots of breastbeating. But the play is full of life, comedy—Everything!" Chekhov wrote in a letter to Olga Knipper, who played in the original production (and then married Chekhov), "Don't make a mournful face in a single act. Angry, yes, but not mournful. People who have borne grief in their hearts for a long time and are used to it only whistle and often sink into thought."

Ibsen, called the father of modern drama, "wrote about people naturalistically. Chekhov writes about people with love. He never makes judgments. Everything is contradicted, almost every line." As Boyd spoke, I just then began to write down what he had said at the start of our conversation, "It's the most beautiful play I've directed. And it has the most in it. At every rehearsal new discoveries are made."

Chekhov is one of those geniuses like Shakespeare or Browning or Henry Miller, who can let his characters peer with their own eyes. He only wrote six full length plays, four are pillars of Drama. "Despite the Cherry Orchard, being one of the most significant symbols of theater, Three Sisters is richer in symbolism, more intricate, more subtle, more—give me a word . . ." Boyd continued, "A play like Comedy of Errors lends itself to a lot of stuff. With Three Sisters we're trying to conjure from it what sound is there."

The music metaphor is often applied to Chekhov. Chew them up and swallow most plays, and the crises which propel them will lay stern in the stomach like stepping stones. Three Sisters travels by tone.

A visit with the Prozorov's, their friends, loves, and servants, is like a concert by the Modern Jazz Quartet. If you like, you may listen only to the string bass. It is unexpectedly clear and lyrical. The vibes, equally distinct, are no less emphasized than the piano, which is easily listened to alone or with percussion. Put together any combination or concentrate on what John Lewis is laying down with his right hand. The greatest joy of all is finally to sit back and take it all together.

THREE SISTERS, Anton Chekhov's great drama of lives in transition, will be performed by Williamstheatre February 17, 18, 23, 24, and 25 at the Adams Memorial Theatre on the Williams College campus. Tickets may be reserved at the A.M.T. Box Office (458-3023) between 12:00 noon and 5:00 p.m. weekdays. Performances are at 8:30 p.m.

Richard Archer

Tribute paid to former librarian

H. Richard Archer, Librarian Emeritus of the Chapin Library, died Thursday, January 19, 1978, in Boston. He was sixty-six.

For four years Archer worked at the College Book Co. and the Argonaut Book Shop in Los Angeles, before earning his B.A. and M.A.L.S. degrees from the University of California, Berkeley. In 1944 he was appointed supervising bibliographer of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library (UCLA), and in 1952 became curator of graphic arts in the special collections division of the UCLA Library. In 1954 Archer became librarian for R. R. Donnelley & Sons in Chicago, and that same year earned his doctorate in library science from the University of Chicago.

Archer succeeded Thomas R. Adams as Chapin Librarian in 1957. Substantial growth occurred during the twenty years of his custodianship, reflecting in many instances Archer's special interest in English and American literature and the graphic arts.

Archer had been visiting lecturer at the library schools of Simmons College and the universities of Oklahoma, Southern California, Michigan, Illinois, and SUNY-Albany, and in 1967 shared the Clark Library Seminar lectureship with Ward Ritchie. He was also the author or editor of many articles and reviews in his two areas of professional interest, fine printing and rare books.

A devoted amateur printer, Archer operated his Hippogryph Press since 1951, and in 1957 was given the Award of Merit from the Society of Typographic Arts. Upon his retirement in June 1977, friends and associates established at the Chapin Library the H. Richard Archer Book Fund for the acquisition of choice examples of 20th-century printing.

Preview: Bergman's "Smiles"

by Don Frazier

The now-famous still of exaltant lovers proclaiming: "This is the life—there's none better!" focuses the light comedy Smiles of a Summer Night upon the wistful melancholy at its core. In removing a series of romantic sketches to a lushly appointed turn-of-the-century setting, Ingmar Bergman transforms ribald boudoir farce into an exquisitely stylized comedy of carnality.

The film's fin de siecle visual richness emphasizes love's easy and capricious oscillations between sublimity and ridiculousness. Or as said by moonstruck Anne (Harriet Andersson) as she joyfully chooses a dress for the theater: "The white one! It's suitable for laughter or tears."

Odd we've come to think warily of Bergman's exclusively cinematic sensibility, for Smiles is a broadly theatrical work, betraying its director's early, well-hidden career in the theater. He subtly imbues the film with an ethereal, translucent beauty; scenes of transient love are elusive pipe-dreams in tones of unearthly sensuality. Bergman rigorously maintains this conception throughout the film. The lovers' illusions never verge into reality, but stay where they belong, in fantasy.

Bergman's conception of character and situation are equally theatrical: In Smiles life is a fleeting and brittle if well-burnished procession of masks, subterfuges, roles, and stagey coincidences.

Only later would Bergman try to mold the actors of his magnificent repertory troupe into the figments peopling his imagination and visions. He elicited compelling performances from every member of a massively talented cast; all are fully-fleshed and—passioned. Spirited dialogue and interaction sparkle along with the brilliant precision of these fully confident stage actors. Only the most sensitive ensemble acting can weave a properly convoluted mesh of conflicting desires and intentions, and Bergman's actors intimately sense the marrow of each other's bones. Eva Dahlbeck plays Desiree, the statuesque heroine of other Bergman comedies, spanning the gap between enthusiastic ingenuous innocence, and a wistful autumnal acceptance. Her unhappily married target, Engerman (Gunnar Bjornstrand) wanders through similar levels of emotional and erotic complexity. He personally realized the film's theme, love as a series of exciting if haphazard imaginative leaps. The entire cast breathes vervy life into the entire range of Bergman's erotic spectrum.

Reel Vintage presents Ingmar Bergman's "Smiles of a Summer Night" in Bronfman Auditorium at 7:30 and 9:30 on Saturday night.

Music in Round presents Brahms, Hiller, and Ravel

MUSIC IN THE ROUND, the chamber music series sponsored by the Williams Music Department, will give its fifth concert tonight, February 24th, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The music on the program spans just over a century of composition, from Brahms' Sextet, Opus 18 in B♭ Major, written in 1860, to Lejaren Hiller's 1970 Sonata No. 3 for Violin and Piano, with the magnificent Ravel Trio coming in between, having been composed in 1915.

The Williams Trio, Julius Hegyi, violin; Douglas Moore, cello; and Charles Joseph piano, will perform the Ravel work which Hegyi unhesitatingly calls "the granddaddy of all trios."

Lejaren Hiller has studied piano, oboe, and composition, the latter with such notables as Milton Babbitt and Roger Sessions. Although he worked as a chemist, he always composed; in 1957 wrote The Illiac Suite, the first computer music. He is now Professor of Music at S.U.N.Y.-Buffalo.

'Hostage' auditions

Auditions for Brendan Behan's musical satire THE HOSTAGE will be held on Sunday and Monday, February 19 and 20 from 7:30 to 11:00 PM on the main stage of AMT. Performances of THE HOSTAGE will be April 21, 22, 27 28, and 29.

Auditions are open to all members of the Williams College community. Those trying out must sign for audition times in the production office of the Theatre Department (in the lobby of the A.M.T. where scripts will be available on two-hour loan).

by Ginny Doherty

"Six and Other Work", a show of photographs by Ben Davidson '80, opened Tuesday night at the Dodd House Student Art Gallery. The core of the show is photographs illustrating the creative activities of six students.

Ben gives us images which are beautiful in themselves, and which become fascinating when his interweaving of subject and the style in which it is presented is understood. Each set of photographs of a subject is conceived so differently that they might almost be the work of separate photographers. The photograph of a saxophone player, Complete, is a soft, curvy, grainy picture, and the superimposition of the saxophone's silhouette upon the player's face is a very thoughtful relation of the musician to his instrument.

To compare this to Enchanted Rings, a set of two photographs of a wrestler, shows Ben's complete involvement in each of the subjects—he again gives us a totally personal perception of the subject, one which is not prejudiced by his perceptions of others. The "enchanted ring" is the wrestling ring, and the enchantment lies in the precise geometry and the personal contact implied in wrestling. In the first of the two, the wrestler stands alone under an almost magical light which delicately defines his body. In the second he is wrestling, and the two bodes flow, merging into one, breaking out of that enchanted ring with their movement. The other photographs also show "style" as defined by subject; the singer is a broken up, changing rhythmn, the artist is almost "drawn" with light, the weaver is a series of patterns, the rock climber is straightforward and clear, and the filmmaker is strongly and harshly lit in an almost threatening way.

The variation in styles, however, causes a lack of unity in the show, in that the ideas and styles of each set of photographs do not bear much relation to each other. The unity to be found is a more personal one, that of Ben's development as a photographer working with people and the illustration of an idea. There is a casual kind of randomness to many of the photographs—some of the images were planned in advance, but many evolved out of an almost subconscious process—a process that he hopes can be seen in each image. The show will continue through February 21st.

Ephwomen swim at regional championships

In spite of a one day postponement because of snow, the New England Women's Swimming and Diving Championships get underway tonight at Boston College with Coach Carl Samuelson's squad of fourteen vying for honors among almost 40 teams and more than 600 swimmers.

Top individual contenders for the Ephwomen, who suffered only one loss during season dual meet competition, include sophomore Keron Walker, co-captain Nina Murphy, Sue Tuttle and freshmen Katherine Pearsall, Linda Reed and Molly Murphy. Walker, who has qualified for six events at the Small College Nationals in Atlanta next month, will swim freestyle, butterfly and individual medley events at the New Englands, along with several strong relays Samuelson has put together.

Nina Murphy, utility swimmer in virtually every event during the regular season, will add additional strength to Williams' relays and the individual backstroke events. Tuttle will take on breaststroke races, while Pearsall, Reed and Molly Murphy will split their talent between relays and the freestyle events. Reed will also swim backstroke.

The extended three day meet will provide top competition from area colleges, universities and Ivy league swimmers. According to co-captain Murphy, a place among the top ten teams would be excellent for the Williams contingent. "And it would be some consolation for missing winter carnival," she added.

Ski teams host Winter Carnival

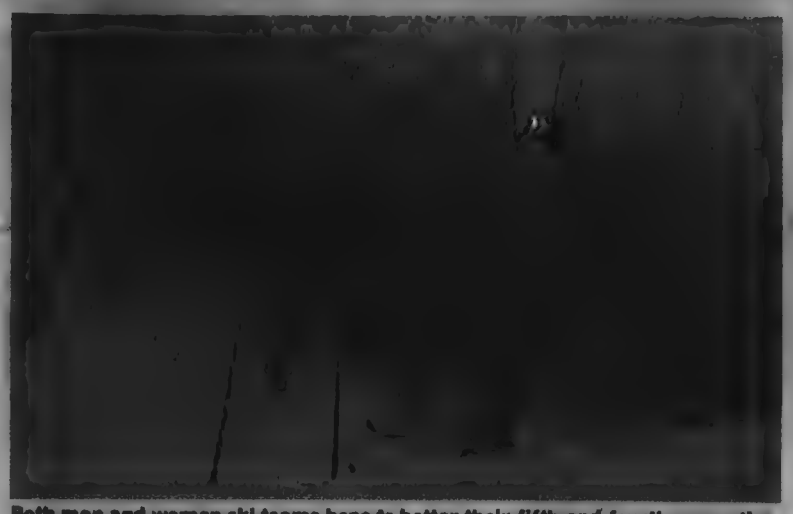
Men aim at fourth in ten

Williams is hosting ten Division I schools for the skiing events at its Winter Carnival this weekend. Coach Bud Fisher's squad hopes to leap from their fifth place finishes at the two previous carnivals to surpass habitual fourth place finisher University of New Hampshire.

Participating in the festivities are the Universities of Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine; Dartmouth, Middlebury, New England College, Bates, St. Lawrence and Harvard. This comprises the finest skiers on the eastern intercollegiate circuit, including two members of the U.S. Ski team.

The events began this morning with the Giant Slalom on Berlin Mountain. This, said Coach Fischer, was the key event of the carnival. So far, this has been our weakest event and one of their strongest. "We must be close to or better (than UNH) to have a shot at fourth," he said.

UVM's Scott Light and Neal McNealus are the favorites for the Giant Slalom. Each of the two skiers have won the event at one of the previous carnivals. Williams' Andy Mikell '79 placed second here last year and should be very competitive this weekend. Following Mikell for the Ephmen will be Donald Tarinelli, Chris Welch, Josh Dembinski and Roger Prevot.



This afternoon the cross-country squad vaults into action. If Co-captain Jeff Magoon recovers from the flu, he will fight with Mark Wagner of UVM for the lead. Wagner, a member of the U.S. Ski Team won both of the carnivals already held this year. Magoon holds a fifth and an eighth in earlier competition and should improve his time on his home ground.

Howie Bean of UNH will probably complete the winning trio, but right behind him will be the rest of the Williams contingent. Peter Wells, Rob Craig and David Richards round out the powerful Eph squad.

The Slalom, Fischer said, may well be the turning event of the carnival. It is a shorter race than the Giant Slalom, the gates are shorter and closer together, requiring faster turns. The teams anticipate a number of falls. The squad that keeps the most skiers on their feet might well win. So far, Williams has excelled here. Donald Tarinelli and Andy Mikell, the coach said, could crack the top five. Josh Dembinski has shown "flashes of brilliance" at earlier carnivals, and Chris Welch and Roger Prevot will round out what Fischer calls Williams' strongest event.

The jumpers take off tomorrow afternoon at one. Two Norwegian exchanges, Roger Helden and Kari Herji hold the favored positions for UVM. "No dark horse" Jeff Hastings will, the coach says, stay right with them for Williams. Hastings placed fourth at Dartmouth and then second at Salisbury, the New England jumping championships, where he tied the hill record. Tom Dodds has looked excellent in practice, and should get everything together for a good afternoon on his home hill. Andy Kelly will put on a good show to finish up the Eph team.

Coach Fischer has not been happy with the team's performance thus far. "Fifth place," he said, "is like kissing your sister, there's no excitement in it. If we don't get fourth, well . . ."

Both men and women ski teams hope to better their fifth and fourth respective places this weekend.

Women hope to better fourth

The Williams women's alpine and cross-country ski teams hope to break out of their fourth-place rut into the top three, skiing on their home snow. Williams will be hosting six other Division I ski teams Friday and Saturday at Berlin Mountain. National champions Middelbury and Dartmouth will be here, as well as the Universities of Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine at Orono, and Colby-Sawyer College. Three Division I teams, Harvard, Johnson State, and St. Lawrence University will miss the Williams Carnival, thus shortening the field from 50 to 35 in each event. But the competition will be unaffected.

The slalom has consistently been the team's best event, and they hope to repeat their first place performance of two weeks ago at the UVM carnival. Captain Marty Epstein's carnival results so far this season in the slalom include a first, a second, two thirds, and a sixth. These indicate that she stands in good position to place in the top three in that event. Freshman Julie Ernst is also a strong possibility for a top finish in the slalom since she, too, consistently places at the top of the field with Marty. Another freshman, Kathy Lane, is likely to place in the top ten, as is Ashley Smith. Corrie Johnson, rounding out the carnival team, also expects to finish well.

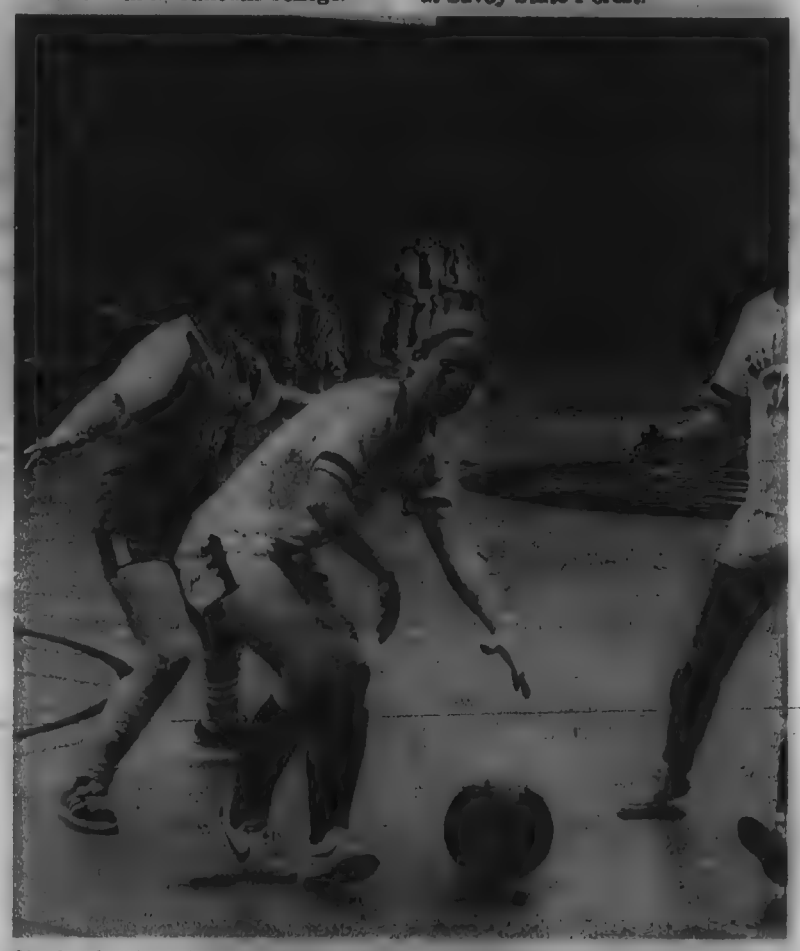
Although the slalom has been the alpine team's better event, they expect to ski comparably in the giant slalom Friday. They have the advantage of competing on their own Berlin Mountain, the steepest college ski slope of the carnival circuit. The same 35 women who compete in the slalom ski in the giant slalom.

The nordic team, made up entirely of carnival team rookies, has finished fifth the past two weekends at Dartmouth and UVM. Led by sophomore Cathy Allen, they hope to better that Friday. Freshman Cindy Drinkwater, who has continued to improve her performances over the season, is another top nordic hope. Juniors Sara Reynolds and Franny Todd, and senior Carrie Redlich, should place near Cindy, skiing on their home track at Savoy State Forest.

Women's basketball

Ephs blast Mt. Holyoke

While it wasn't exactly the St. Valentine's Day massacre, the Williams women's basketball team pulled off a key victory Tuesday night, manhandling Mount Holyoke College, 70-40.



The Ephwomen came out slowly as the first few minutes saw a point-for-point trade between the two squads. Holyoke center Shauma Doyle quickly established her dominance under the boards, picking off offensive rebounds and picking apart Williams zone defense with her turnaround jump shot. The 5-11 center ran up 16 points in the first half before finding herself in foul trouble as the second stanza began. With Holyoke's only real threat on the bench, Williams moved out ahead, amassing a 21 point lead from a nine point half time margin.

The slimly leading Williams squad dropped behind by one midway through the first period despite the strong play of seniors Anne Youngling and Lisa Capaldini. Frosh Cathy Gernert then came in to take control of the Eph's go-ahead game hitting two free throws to put Williams up 22-20. Gernert then responded again when called upon a minute later to keep the two point margin following a Doyle connection. Co-captain Maggie O'Brien (16 pts.) tallied up part of her game high total in the next five minutes pacing the Williams offense to a 37-28 halftime lead.

Tightening its defense in the second half, Williams proceeded to pick off Holyoke's tired shots for the majority of their 36 team rebounds. O'Brien led in the rebounding game with nine, while Sue Wright, in strong play late in the second half had five as she ran the Eph's closing minute offense.

Williams on the strength of O'Brien, Youngling (12 pts.) and guard Monica Grady (14 pts.) moved way out midway through the second to secure the much needed win.

The victory put the Ephwomen 5-5 on the season headed into last night's contest with Dartmouth College.

Ephwomen stymie Vassar rackets, record now 5-1

The women's squash team defeated the Vassar College team 5-2 Wesnesday afternoon, moving the Williams season record ahead to 5-1.

Though only four of the regular top seven varsity players competed, the team dropped only six games total while winning the other seventeen.

Beckie Chase, Laura Carson, and Marcia Johnston, playing in the highest positions, won easily at 3-0. Also winning 3-0 was Elizabeth Shorb, filling the number five slot. The only other victor for Williams was Ros Sareyan who conceded one game before winning 3-1. The longest match of the day was endured by Trudie Tenbroeke. In the course of five games, all of which ended in tie breakers, Ten-broeke lost 2-3. Rickey Harvey at number seven lost in three games.

The varsity team will be playing again at full force this coming weekend when they meet Pennsylvania on Saturday at 11 a.m. and Harvard on Sunday at 2 p.m. Both matches will be at home.

Lady ice pucksters stand even after 7-2 Colgate victory

After a disappointing loss to Wesleyan last Saturday, the women's ice hockey team bounced back, evening its record at 4-4 with a 7-2 trounce over Colgate University.

Williams dominated the opening period scoring 4 goals against a disorganized Colgate defense. Sharp passing from the onset of the contest resulted in 2 quick Eph goals as senior Priscilla Buckley scored on a pass from her classmate, Liza Olsen, at the 2:00 mark. Two minutes later, Olsen registered another assist as she connected with freshman Sarah Behrer for a goal. With 8 minutes remaining in the period, freshman Julia Weyerhauser made it 3-0 for Williams with a score assisted by defenseman Jane Goldfarb. Behrer tallied her second goal of the evening a minute later on a pass from Buckley.

In the second stanza, Williams slowed down and rested on its 4-goal lead. But with one minute left in the period, Colgate struck, breaking goalie Lisa Halperin's shut out with a screen shot goal.

The final period of play saw the Williams attack come alive again with 3 more goals. Defenseman Sue Stred picked up a loose puck and put it over the Colgate goalie's shoulder for the score at 2:34 into the period. With 4 minutes left in the game, Colgate got on the scoreboard again on a breakaway shot that went between Halperin's legs. Within the next minute of play, the Ephs tallied 2 quick goals. Weyerhauser got her second of the game tapping in the rebound from a Mary Fish shot. On the final goal of the contest, Behrer passed to Olsen who scored on a screen shot.

Williams goalie Lisa Halperin had a spectacular night in the net, registering 22 saves and stopping several Colgate breakaway drives. The Ephs next contest is against Dartmouth at home on Sat., Feb. 18, at 12 P.M.

Racketmen down Trinity

by Evan Bash

First it was the flu, then it was the snow, and then it was the . . . no, wait, the men's squash team finally got to play a match after a two week layoff during which matches were both cancelled and postponed by this winter's two great faux pas. Given the chance to play, they showed that, boy, can they ever play, as Trinity found out in an 8-1 loss to the Ephs Wednesday in Hartford. It was Williams sixth win of the season in nine decisions and extends their modest, albeit growing, winning streak to three matches.

After a cancellation by Army (flu) and a postponement with Tufts (snow), coach Sean Sloane found fantastic new ways to amuse his team with imaginative round-robins. These diversions kept the Ephs sharp, however, as they showed almost no effects of the layoff against Trinity.

Martin Goldberg and Evan Bash got Williams off to a quick start with easy 3-0 wins in the first two matches of the afternoon. Captain Arnie Cogswell then showed admirable fortitude when he sprained his ankle at 10-14 in the fourth game only to take the game 17-14 and the match 3-1. Mitch Reiss also played a gutsy match with his tender wrist in a 3-0 triumph.

The Ephs clinched the match on the strength of two, five-game wins. Jim Parsons took the first as he managed to hold on after taking a 2-1 lead, and Pete Thayer strolled to victory when he found his form after trailing 2-1. Jim Little also took a 3-2 match with his ubiquitous touch shots, while Chip Lindquist rounded out the wins with a strong 3-0 showing.

The racketmen take on an illustrious Alumni team tomorrow at 1:00 and face Tufts (away) Monday.

Gall, skill mix at Po

"Are you O.K.?" an amazed spectator asked. "It looked like you landed on your head." "I did," said the victim of a Cardiac Hill wipe out, "but it's no great loss." The craziness of Poker Flats had descended on Cole Field once again.

A traditional Winter Carnival event, "Poker Flats" is the annual site of some of the wildest winter games Williams College has seen. This year the activities centered on the Carnival theme of "The Wizard of Oz." Games included a tricycle race on Cole Pond, where the winner had to be "the first to get Toto to the sheriff," King of the Hill, where the winner had to "master" Cardiac Hill for three minutes; various solo and group traying races, and an unplanned event, inner tube jumping. Less competitive students, or perhaps just lazier ones, chose beer drinking and snowball fighting instead.

Cardiac Hill, the steep incline behind Cole Field House, held most of Friday's excitement. There, students alone, or in lines of up to five, boarded familiar red trays and sped down the icy slope. Freshman Sarah Smith took first place in the distance competition, and won a case of beer of her choice.

The inner tubing competition, coordinator Don Perry explained, was a "spontaneous" event. Finding plastic trays hard on the backside, several students opted for a large, soft inner tube. The tube's cushioning ability lost some of its effect, however, as the jump at the bottom of the hill threw all three students up in the air and down on the not-so-soft ice. One spectator commented that the only solution was that they should "tie themselves to the inner tube." But the advice was unnecessary; no one seemed to mind the wipe-outs. In fact, the only participant that minded was the inner tube itself, which finally popped after an hour of runs down Cardiac Hill.

Although several other events, such as funnelating and "snowperson" building, had been planned, the King of the Hill competition was the last of the organized games. Also staged on Cardiac Hill, this contest pitted two teams of five against each other, with each member trying to reach and remain at the top of the hill. Filled with tackling, wrestling, and tugging,

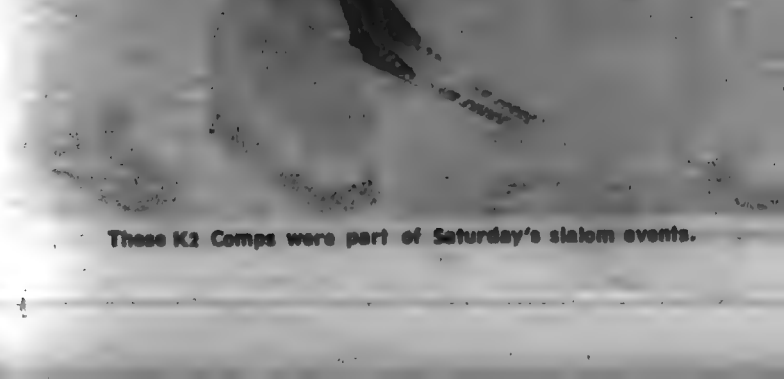
Admissions plays host to special students

The Admissions Committee has invited sixty-five of the "most promising" candidates from the Class of 1982 applicant pool to attend a Special Scholars Weekend February 23 through 25, according to Committee Chairman J. Hodge Markgraf.

The Admissions Office has sponsored Special Scholars Weekends for the last seven years. According to Director of Admissions Philip Smith, the event is designed to encourage "the very, very, best students" to consider Williams over the Ivy League schools. "We thought that if we gave these people the opportunity to got to classes and meet students and faculty, they would prefer Williams" he asserted. Smith estimates that some 30-40 per cent of the students attending Special Scholars Weekend will eventually choose to attend Williams.

Thursday night will feature a panel discussion in which Professors Sherron Knopp, William Moomaw and Mark Taylor will discuss their fields of professional interest. The purpose of the event, according to Markgraf, is "to try give an informal glimpse of faculty that we have here, and give the students an idea of what to expect in terms of a classroom situation."

On Friday, students will attend classes with their student hosts, or visit with professors, according to individual interests. That evening, the group will have a pizza reunion with their student hosts and faculty members.



Last year, about 20 of the invited students actually attended Special Scholars Weekend. Because of mail delays, Smith is not certain how many will actually make the trip this year, but he estimates the number at 25.

Amateur 'pro' Plin

George Plimpton, the Harvard graduate who has boxed with Archie Moore, played percussion for the New York Philharmonic, pitched an all-star game in Yankee Stadium, and played quarterback for the Detroit Lions, will talk of his exploits tonight at 8 p.m. in Jesup Hall Auditorium.

Plimpton claims that inside of him is the curiosity of a five-year-old boy; he delights in life's "wonderful and unusual". Although his career is a "professional amateur" is noted most for its memorable failures, Plimpton asserts, "People need me to fail . . . it reassures them."

Plimpton is the author of several successful books, including "Paper Lion," on his experiences with the Detroit Lions; "Bogey Man," a chronicle of his escapades on the professional golf tour; and "Shadow Box," on the world of prize fighting.

These K2 Comps were part of Saturday's slalom events.

the match got extremely rough at times.

Freshman Neville Smythe learned what it meant to be cold, as he slid down the hill with his shirt half torn off from the wrestling. Later Smythe joked, "Actually I'm an exhibitionist." For their efforts, four teams were awarded cases of beer. Included was a team of Williams F girls, who proved that next year the name "King or Queen of the Hill" might not be a bad idea.

By 3:30 the games had disintegrated into mass snowball fighting, hot chocolate drinking, and doughnut eating. The craziness of Poker Flats was put away until next year.

Freshmen prepare for inclusion

by John Setear

"Basically," said Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, head of campus housing, "inclusion is the process of attaching a label—the residential house—to every freshman." The mechanics of this process are fairly simple.

Just before Spring Break, a freshman must decide two things about his upper-class lifestyle: where he would like to live and with whom. The final resolution of the former is up to a computer, but the latter is completely up to the applicant.

Up to four people may apply for inclusion on the same card. Every rule has an exception, of course, and in this case the exception is Mission Park. If this option is a first choice, seven lovers of polygonally-shaped rooms may apply together.

On each card the group will list the five housing alternatives—Greylock, Dodd-Tyler, Row Houses, Mission Park, and Fitch-Prospect—from one to five in order of preference.

"The charge of the faculty," says Roosenraad, "is to accomplish the labelling process in a way that encourages diversity." The key," the Associate Dean stated, "is to use a computer to generate random numbers."

The cards are fed in, with each group on one card. Each card is assigned a randomly-chosen number. Although everything that follows occurs within the computer's circuits, it is easiest to understand if one views the groups as a stack of cards. The cards are lined up from lowest to highest according to the assigned number, with the lowest number getting preference. Now the actual selection of housing begins.

"The Student Housing Committee has decided that first-choice maximization is what we should aim for," said Roosenraad. Groups are assigned their first choice down the line until a card is reached whose first-choice housing is filled. That card is immediately set aside. The process continues down the line, filling as many first choices as possible.

At the end of this first round, about 60 per cent of the applicants have received their first choice. There is also a group of cards whose first choices were not filled. These go through the process of assigning numbers once again. All possible second choices are filled. Last year, about 20 per cent of those who applied received their second choice. The process continues with third, fourth, and fifth choices until everyone has been assigned a housing group.

This somewhat convoluted method means that as many people as possible get their first choice. Rather than fill some second choices before everyone has had a chance to get their most favored housing group, this method is used. Roosenraad explained that the decision to use this system of housing assignment was made by the Housing Committee. He said it is based on the idea that "first-choice preferences are fairly strong."

From a strategic point of view, this means that no fancy maneuvering—putting a first choice second, hoping that a written first choice will be filled—will help. All anyone can do is to put down his choices and hope for the best.

Houses within a housing group are drawn at random. Rooms within a house are handled by the house officers. Although everyone on the same card will be assigned the same house, from then on, the administration steps out of the picture.

The assignments are posted in the mailroom after Spring Break, assuring dinner-table conversation for the next several nights. And there is even consolation for those who receive their last choice: the opportunity to sulk in privacy. "To our knowledge," says Roosenraad, "no other college has such a high percentage—over ninety per cent—of single rooms for upperclassmen."

Student elections approach

Students interested in running in the College elections this March might be interested in the following descriptions of the offices.

College Council President chairs CC meetings, controls its agenda, acts as the major spokesman for student concerns, and thus must understand the issues and structure of every student organization.

Vice President serves as Chairman of the Election Committee which selects, either directly or indirectly, all the members serving on College committees, must understand each committee's function, and fills in for the President which requires an up-to-date understanding of campus happenings.

Residents ski in race for boat club

by Nick Lefferts '80

Over a hundred people, mostly area residents, descended on the Taconic Golf Course Sunday afternoon to participate in the annual citizen's cross country ski race sponsored by the Williams College Boat Club. Despite the large number of outside entrants Williams racers finished on top among both men and women.

Jeff Magoon, junior captain of the Williams cross country team, turned in the day's fastest time, covering the approximately seven kilometer course in 20:15. Freshman Janet Lavin, also a member of the cross country squad, led the women with a 30:07 clocking. Magoon and Lavin, however, remained relatively anonymous in victory as their Purple ski-team status excluded them from consideration as "citizens" and neither was eligible for prizes.

In the awards ceremony at the Log which followed the race, prizes were awarded in each of 12 age and sex categories. Bob Schneider of the Williams Economics Department grabbed first place among men 31-45 and finished a strong seventh overall with a time of 24:25. Karen Fisher (35:34), wife of Purple ski coach Bud Fisher, also took first in her age category. Local racers topped each of the other categories, with Kristian Sullivan, age 3, a particular favorite of the crowd.

A special prize was given to the fastest man and woman "citizen" skiers from Williams. A pair of Freshmen, Ned Collins and Anne Stroock, took the awards. Collins (26:46) made off with dinner for two at the British Maid while Stroock (40:39) pocketed a gift certificate from the Country Restaurant. The afternoon's prizes ranged from comic books to butterrum flavored lip protector as Master of Ceremonies Peter Wells '79 demonstrated a striking impersonation of Don Parpb.

Proceeds from the race will go to help support the Williams crew. The Purple oarsmen and women are subsidized only partly by the College and must rely on outside sources for a significant portion of their funding.

stituence, they should be sensitive to all campus trends and interests.

The Committee on Educational Policy

The Committee on Educational Policy is a student-faculty group charged with overseeing the curriculum and educational policy of the college. The committee consists of six students and seven faculty members, with one of the faculty members serving as chairman.

The time commitment for CEP members varies between two and four hours per week. Roughly speaking, the time is divided between a two hour committee meeting, a one hour sub-committee meeting, and an hour of outside reading. Reading of faculty memoranda, past CEP reports, and the results of faculty questionnaires is required of all committee members.

CEP meetings range from the controversial and exciting issues of winter study and grading to the more mundane concerns of general education and class size.

Elections Committee — Committee on Undergraduate Life

There are four positions open on the Committee for Undergraduate Life (CUL). One member from each class, '79, '80, and '81, and one at-large member from any class will be elected. The CUL deals with issues such as housing and a review of the Junior Advisor system, and a major topic for next fall will be health services on campus. The CUL meets every week or every two weeks. There is equal student-faculty representation on the committee. The CUL plays a very important role in the non-academic aspects of student life; the committee's suggestions and decisions are a major source of input in college affairs.

The Honor and Discipline Committees

Students are elected to both the Honor and Discipline Committees. The same students serve on both committees. The Honor Committee deals with violations of the Honor Code, assessing the guilt or innocence of an accused student and determining punishment. Only students vote on this committee.

The Discipline Committee handles any misconduct on the part of a student that would warrant punishment. The committee votes on whether a case should be heard, the guilt or innocence, and the appropriate punishment. Both students and faculty vote on all decisions.

Meetings for both committees are irregular, as they can only meet when cases are brought to them.

Sour Pickles

by Peter Rintels

At 5:00 last Tuesday I walked into the Record office and found Chip Buckner (his name appears on the masthead under editor) perusing the latest edition of this hack-sheet. He looked up from it and said to me, "They cut a paragraph from your column."

"That's nice," I replied. I was searching for a witty way of saying I was pissed off, but couldn't find one, so I had to resort to being sarcastically good natured.

"No it's not," Chip said. "It's the paragraph in which you explain what you're doing a parody of. It doesn't make any sense now."

He wasn't kidding either.

With that in mind, back to the promised conclusion to The Myth That Ate New York City, but first let me explain what it is all about. Last week I was explaining how Thom Gass, dissatisfied with the traditional stock of Williams myth, was adding one of his own: Ladorvadora. It is no ordinary myth, however.

In the paragraph that got cut, Gass warned that "Ladorvadora ... shall swell unbound in Williamsiana. Ladorvadora is hungry, it's alive." He also mentioned that new "molecules" of the myth "first eddy in the mailroom."

From there, we went into the 1950's American International monster movie scenario of "The Myth That Ate New York City." As of last week, the myth had swelled beyond Williamsiana and engulfed a librarian and a classics professor, both of whom subsequently appeared as characters in later "molecules" of Ladorvadora. And now if the idea hasn't been killed by this tedious explanation of it, let's move forward with the story.

SCENE: The Dean's office. After the disappearance of two more professors and one faculty secretary, Stetson has been evacuated and closed. The campus is told that structural weaknesses have been detected, but rumors circulate. The audience, of course, knows the truth. The Dean of the College (who is supposed to be fictitious, but recognizable as someone in real life, so we will give him an appropriate name), a Mr. Peter Monckton, is meeting in a tense session with other Deans and the Chairman of the English Department.

Monckton: What have we got so far?

Frank Oxford (Dean of the Faculty): A librarian, three professors and a faculty secretary, all disappeared from Stetson within three days of each other. Those are definitely the work of Ladorvadora. There are a few other disappearances we're not sure of. Also, there've been some strange occurrences in the mailroom and the mailroom employees say they're afraid to go in there now. There's been no mail service for two weeks. We have a real crisis on our hands.

Monckton: What's become of this Gass guy?

Oxford: He appears to have fled the campus after the first disappearance. We're trying to track him down now.

Monckton: What we need is a weapon. Don't we have any weapons against this thing?

Professor Shakespeare (Chairman of the English Department): We've been working hard on that sir, but so far nothing seems to work. Members of my department have been publishing scathing reviews of it everywhere we can—the Record, Pique, Backtalk, but no reaction. We've also been encouraging English majors to criticize its epic structure at dinner table conversations and moments of idle chit-chat. Nothing there, too. Ladorvadora is still swelling unbound.

Monckton: (Solemnly) There's only one thing left to do. (He picks up the telephone on his desk) Get me the President.

(Voice of secretary over the phone): Who is it?

Monckton: Whadaya mean who is it. It's Dean Monckton.

Voice: No, I mean the President. Who's playing him this week?

Monckton: Oh. It's the French guy in biology, Professor DeGallstone.

CUT TO: Two weeks later. In the intervening time, Ladorvadora has attacked Sawyer, engulfing a number of students. By now the entire library is gone and in new molecules of the myth, now displayed in Baxter, Troglodytes are commenting on the wonderful new collection of books that has appeared in the land of Ouzo.

Also, the army has been called in and we are now watching a fierce battle being waged with tanks, missiles, and flame throwers. The myth, however, continues to swell unbound and the army's losses begin to mount.

CUT TO: The field office of General Brickbat. Outside are battle noises. He is with the Deans.

Brickbat: (to the Deans) We got losses everywhere. Nothing seems to work against this myth a' yours. (Pause) There don't seem but one way out of this. The pen may be mightier than the sword, the missiles and the flamethrowers, but it ain't mightier than our damn nukes!

Monckton: Wait a moment, I have an idea. (He grabs the nearest telephone). Give me Tom Herwitz, Class of '78 fast. (This is a fictitious Tom Herwitz, not to be confused with the real one.) Tom, Dean Monckton here. How long would it take you to ram a resolution through the College Council cutting off the funds for Ladorvadora? A couple of days? Good, do it!

Well the rest is history. (Don't ask me what the part before this was. I'm afraid to think about it.) Penniless, Ladorvadora shrinks into oblivion and the world is safe again for democracy and the liberal arts education.

Kim Verzyl discusses new art

by Mark Tercek

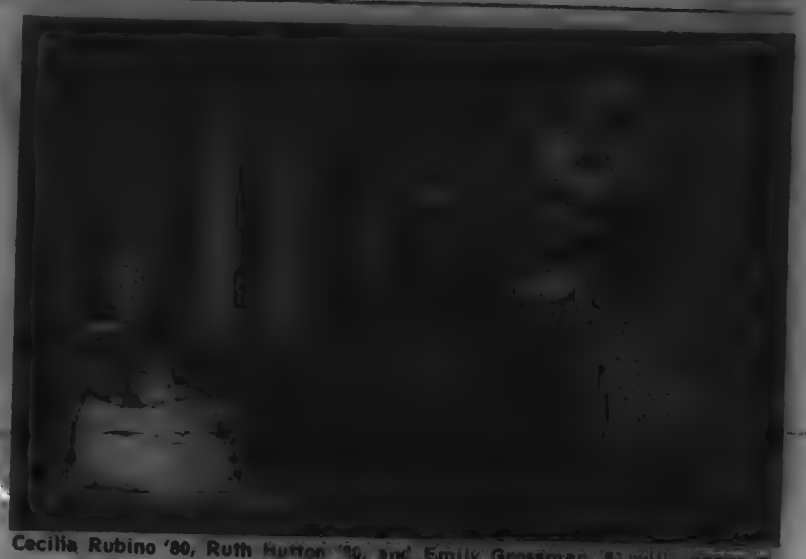
Kim Verzyl is a Williams senior and a successful artist. Kim has had several one-women shows including one last February at New York's Nicholas Roerich Museum.

Last year, she was commissioned by the college to build a sculpture (see photograph) at Hopkins Forest in the memory of Thomas Harty. Asked about the sculpture she explained, "It's called 'Echoes of an Era' and I feel it's my major artistic accomplishment. I had been collecting artifacts for it for three years and it took essentially all summer to build. It never actually stood until I got it out to the forest. I couldn't believe it when I saw it—it's huge."

Kim noted that the Williamstown area has always held a special interest for her because of its farming heritage, and that it makes the perfect setting for this type of sculpture. "It just fits in so nicely with the moon barn and it looks gorgeous with the snow all over it," she said. "The sculpture is all rusted and it's meant to rust so that it keeps turning different colors—it will never be the same. I go out there and look at it and I just have to smile."

A sculpture by Kim Verzyl '78

When asked about what kind of role her Williams education has played in her development as an artist, Kim explained, "I've been painting since I was ten, so I always knew the artistic thing was there. I wanted a liberal arts education because it's hard to make it as an artist—I wanted something to fall back on. It's worked to make me much more aware too. Ever since I could walk I've been dragged to museums and galleries so I've always been really aware of contemporary art, but studying it, and being able to appreciate it and understand it has come about through Williams and my art history major.



"In terms of my studio art, my instructor, Craig Dennis, really encourages twentieth century, nonfigurative types of imagery. This sort of modern sensibility has made me feel secure in going about the type of imagery that I want to do and to question the more traditional types of ones I had been doing ... My paintings, for example, are slightly impressionistic and very color-oriented and they have sold very well. I like my painting and I enjoy doing it, but I've never really been comfortable with it. In my studio courses here I've found the medium that I'm most comfortable with and that is printmaking. I value my Williams education then, in terms of developing a sensibility."

Mention of her paintings prompted Kim to speak of subject matter. "Basically I paint people—artists, writers, and people I know. I work with photographs a lot; I saw a poster of Patty Smith once and it was saying, "paint me", so I did and it became my favorite painting.

"When Tom Harty died I was working on a painting of Dylan Thomas and it turned into a portrait of Tommy. It doesn't look like either of them really; it was just an emotional outpouring of my grief. I got a lot of passion out. Art can be a real release that way. One of my favorite artists says, 'Art is to ease the pain.' "

At this point Kim's plans include applications for fellowships and to graduate programs in studio art. "I'd like to totally involve myself in my work for a year without any financial worries. What I'd really like to do is stained glass; I've already made some plans for it, but it's a monumental art which you just can not do if you don't have the money behind you."

With a heavy academic work load, a thesis to be written, and plans to make for next year, Kim doubts she will find the time to do a show on campus this year. "I might do a printmaking show though," she said. "Working for a show is really nice because you have a goal and you are trying to amass all the work together with a certain kind of theme, and therefore you have something to aim at—I enjoy it."

Cecilia Rubino '80, Ruth Hutton '80, and Emily Grossman '81 will appear in Williamstheater's production of Three Sisters. Performances will be held on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. (photo by Oettgen)

Boyd's Sister—desolate, unified

by Don Frazier

For Thornton Wilder, "There's so much life in life." Anton Chekhov agrees, and adds, "That's precisely the problem." In Three Sisters, the commonplace comforts of day-to-day living smother dreams and nightmares alike, and occasionally mere whimpers of existence echo through layers of "devastating triviality." In this play nothing much happens; the desolation is unspectacular and inexorable.

You see? Already I'm interpreting the play while I'm supposed to be reviewing it. And that is the strength of this weekend's Williamstheatre production in the AMT. We get one of the finest plays ever written presented with sensitivity and truth, its myriad meanings intact, admitting our interpretations without insistence.

And this is no minor achievement. To reach it director Gregory Boyd had to overcome reams of critical wisdom, our expectations of portentious Siberian gloom, and his own demonstrated penchant for the striking and bizarre theatrical effect. His Sisters proves that a great play needn't insist on any specific interpretation.

Three Sisters' long history of abuse at the self-indulgent whims of careerist directors gains a weekend's respite. Boyd's hand has shaped the text into its natural contours without obtruding; and the finished work is seamless. Consider that notorious acid test, the Act I luncheon in the Prozorov dining room. Most directors can't resist the possibilities for imaginative Kazanian stage business afforded by a fully set table and thirteen energetic characters. What restraint!

Setting designed by Joel Stoehr and lit by Frederick Penzel take active roles in the audience's mind. Light especially is a palpable presence we don't notice because it's so right for the mood of each scene. Like the introductory tableau of the three women at home: I've never seen such a beautiful balance of decorum and cheer. Penzel bathes the stage in a soft yet radiant sunlight which neither bleaches out the set nor turns the actors yellow (the usual fate of stage suns). The doomed beauty of the Prozorov home and family conceals the ominous dread lurking ahead; both are ripe for the axe.

I can't (and shouldn't) talk about the play and its scenic production separately, so finely meshed are the two. Candles flicker out one by one, embers in a dying holocast. Velvet blue twilight staves off an empty black night, then yields. Irina's cry is swallowed by a world fading into dry rot, the doctor's eyes retract into shadowed pits. A birch forest encloses the actors like prison bars.

The stage of Three Sisters is a "peopled wound." It's thickly clotted with lives: blasted, or petty. But the effect is, paradoxically, not fragmentation but unity. We notice how people are alike instead of how they differ.

Just marshalling such a large cast in cramped quarters would tax the Times Square traffic cop, but Boyd turned the trick so gracefully I hardly noticed the problem scenes. All difficult blocking patterns were resolved with cunning and the actors' talent for motivating arbitrary movement.

Elliptical plays like Three Sisters make hash of the perennial rehearsal question: "Do I play it as comedy or tragedy?" We can't figure out if the characters are supposed to be laughable or pitiable. Such as Capt. Solyony, a comic figure who hates and kills. John Feltch doesn't decide for us: He wrenches his mouth into an obscene sneer; he struts, blusters, and lurks. But when he speaks privately to rival Baron Tusenbach (Earl Childs) whom he cruelly baits in public, he is shy and vulnerable for as long as he can hold back the bile.

John Bedford Lloyd's Vershinin postures himself as the embodiment of noble high-mindedness to balance his actual life of mundanity. He calls his lofty sentiment "philosophy" and expounds with the dogmatic smallness of a Richard Nixon. We see why the imaginative Masha falls in love with him: he's a blank slate for her desperate illusions. Prima-donnas play only the beautiful and virtuous, but Lloyd's brave enough to tackle unattractive roles and even do what demands the most guts: find a personal connection with the characters' limitations.

But the most limited member of the Prozorov circle is Kulygin, Masha's babbittic husband. While he could've been that stock figure of ridicule, the prig cuckhold, Robert Berry Jr. is hardly comic—he's scarey, a successful cipher with a watch-chain, whose fastidiously maintained appearances hide a void.

And so is Ann Eaklund as Audrey's fiance Natasha, though her smile may be slightly ajar. Only the iron grip of directorial suasion could keep people this shallow from night to night.

Andrey Prozonov, perhaps the most complex role, forces Robert Gregory to radically depart from type. His Andrey squirms uneasily, Shuffles disconsolately, gazes glassy-eyed—and that's in the first act. Andrey lives in his dead father's shadow, and Gregory's found a new, spaced-out pallor. He's drained himself of all intensity to play a man whose soul has gone flaccid. With more control, he might be able to reach for the worm-like state of the last act instead of starting out there.

The three sisters have obviously lived on the same wavelength for several years. The respond to each other on a pre-conscious level, communicating an inner Prozorov-language. When they do speak, their innocent words carry a mysterious cargo of syblic messages. As Irina, Jennifer White undergoes a stunning transformation from fresh-faced innocence to weary, resolute faith in that vague better life the play calls, for lack of a better word, Moscow. I swear she physically ages by the end of the play: her step falls heavy, her forehead recedes, her jaw grows set and haggard.

Her oldest sixter, Olga, starts out old, her shoulders stooped from the parental responsibility she inherited. But she is the tenderest, the most trusting and sensitive of the sisters. And fair game. What Ruth Hutton lacks in years she makes up in passionate belief. A difficult-to-find role, her Olga oscillates between girlish charm and a schoolmarm's primness before settling into a serene and poignant spinsterhood.

Not so Masha. The married sister is the artiste, the most refined of all, whose desperate boredom and loneliness propel her to the earthbound Vershinin. The lovers hardly talk; their words hold each other at bay. And Masha is easily the most formidable person in provincial Russia. To Cecilia Rubino she is Tiger Woman, and lunches on artillery officers.

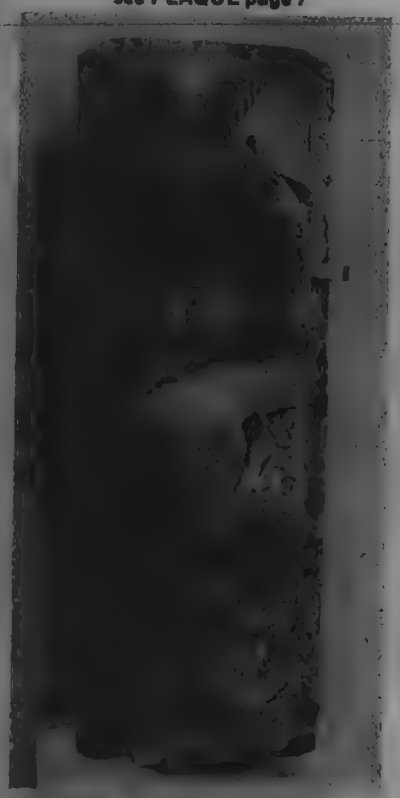
No one can watch the cast of Three Sisters work together for three and a half hours without being struck by the troupe's dedication and enthusiasm, and a sort of Prozorov-feeling among the cast members. But that's wrong, only the members of the family should be bond so closely, otherwise we lose the tension between the greenhouse and the cold winds outside. Servants Craig Elliot, Emily Grossman, Trish O'Rourke and Cassandra Tchen; Lieutenants Stephan Bowers and Hudson Plumb, and even Nicholas Ferson as Doctor Chebutykin all share in the warm communality onstage;

The play might be called inconclusive, open-ended. As indeed it is. The sisters' tragedies dissolve into an autumnal heaviness, but not despair. Defeat at the hands of a Nastasha means nothing, and the sisters' spirited goodness never once quavers. The production focused our concern not on itself or a pithy message we can scrawl on our programs before filing out, but upon the troubling and unanswerable questions at the play's heart.

Museum obtains plaque

by Mitchell Portnoy

Behind the closed office doors of any museum—is a scene of activities involving intrigue, excitement and even legality. Although the offices of the Williams College Museum of Art are rarely closed, and in fact, all its decisions are both reputable and unhidden—the unappreciated art of museum acquisition proceeds.



The methods by which a museum acquires its permanent collection for display is a fascinating subject. Whole exhibitions have been organized around this theme such as the one at the Metropolitan Museum of Art (New York) a few years ago. It is now a rare institution that does not publish a periodic, detailed "Recent Acquisitions Bulletin" or present a similarly titled public exhibition.

It is true that our alumni, the primary source for gifts, have been disproportionately generous in their museum donations for decades. But the personal gifts of even the most well-educated and tasteful group of donors simply cannot fill the expanding and often specific needs of a college museum—one that must encompass the arts of no less than the world. Some objects must be bought.

Thus, for a small museum like ours, with a relatively low acquisition budget, each piece must be rigorously screened and carefully chosen. What then does Franklin Robinson, the museum director, his staff and curators, his colleagues and interested students, look for when making such a decision about a piece that has been offered to us for sale?

First and foremost, the hard-to-define criterion of quality is considered. How rare is the piece? Is it too badly damaged? Is it over-restored? But this is not all! They must question an object's cost, its power and beauty, and how it "fits" into the museum's collection as a whole. Yet our museum has an additional function which is often not understood. It is primarily a teaching museum so, like any other college facility, it must meet the needs of a faculty and demanding student body who are both interested in effectively teaching and learning about art from original objects whenever possible.

Women faculty feel 'maleness' of Williams

Williams has long had trouble attracting and keeping good women faculty. This article is part one of a two part series that looks at the women faculty and considers their perceptions, their discontents, and some of the ways they and the administration are working to improve the atmosphere for them here.

by Peter Rintels

While women now make up roughly 42 per cent of the Williams student body, they make up only 14.8 per cent of its faculty. In the aftermath of the notorious "library incident" of last November, which evoked a letter signed by eighteen of the women faculty critical of the administration's handling of it, interest has been sparked throughout the faculty and administration in the particular problems faced by women faculty at Williams.

The administration has long been aware that Williamstown is not an especially hospitable place for women, especially single women, to come and settle down. The faculty handbook notes that, "the special problems of Williamstown as a community both for single individual and married couples where both spouses seek professional fulfillment make it possible that women will leave Williams voluntarily at a higher rate than men."

The college has just not changed that white male power structure. - Grudin

This prediction has been borne out by statistics supplied by Professor Francis Oakley, Dean of the Faculty. According to Oakley, the resignation rate (i.e. rate of faculty leaving for reasons other than termination of contract by the college) since 1967 has been 26.2 per cent for men and 30.4 per cent for women. The difference said Oakley is "not enormous, but it's there. It's enough for me to worry about, anyway."

Oakley pointed out, however, that a number of resignations occurred when a faculty member is denied tenure and decides to leave without finishing out the extra year on his or her contract. A more telling statistic is the number of resignations occurring before a faculty member comes up for tenure, which (again since 1967) for men is 62.9 per cent and for women 92.8 per cent.

But while the problems faced by women faculty have been with the College since it began hiring women in significant numbers in 1972, the events of last semester have caused a surge of interest and discussion.

While the problems have been with the College since it began hiring women in significant numbers in 1972, the events of last semester have prompted many women faculty to take a harder look at the professional and social climate that Williams offers them and to air their discontents. The library incident, said Assistant Professor Sarah Stage, acted as a "catalyst" to bring women together and give them some awareness as a group. Said Assistant Professor Brooke Larson, "We began to see that our perceptions were very similar."

One result of the greater interest has been an increase in attendance at meetings of Committee W, a faculty "lobbying group" for the interests of women and minorities. According to Assistant Dean Nancy MacIntyre and Ms. Sarah McFarland, who co-chair the group, the number of women taking part at the meetings has doubled since last November.

Many of the problems faced by women are inherent in Williams' setting—the isolation and the smallness. Professionally, problems can arise from the relatively small research library here compared with a larger school, and the lack of nearby professional colleagues to discuss one's subject with. Stage pointed out that since she is the only person here teaching women's studies, she must go elsewhere to keep in touch with her field, which can entail considerable effort and travel time. Said Assistant Professor Eva Grudin, "You can't count on having colleagues at schools nearby with whom you can talk." Such contacts can be "release valves for pressure," she said. Socially, the problem is one familiar to many students, namely that Williamstown can be boring. The situation is exacerbated by the fact that Williamstown is a very "married" community and offers a social life for single people that can be awkward and uninteresting.

Many say they feel the school has an institutional and traditional bias. For many women faculty the main problem is that they are working at a school which they feel still retains its traditional white-male character despite having gone co-ed five years ago.

"Williams when it went co-ed," said Grudin, "did change in certain ways to accommodate women students. I think they are continually reevaluating ways of making Williams a better place for coeds.

Junior faculty and women's problems are mixed up together. - Oakley

Williams has changed not at all in its political structure since they've accepted women faculty members. The College has just not changed that white male power structure since women faculty have come. They (the women faculty) have been expected to fit into a traditional framework."

Professor Lynda Bundtzen termed it an "institutional ossification." "Williams is a very mannered place," she said. Mannered, she added, usually means treating people like gentlemen.

The maleness of Williams is felt by women in a number of ways, some subtle, some not so subtle. While being interviewed in the faculty lounge in Stetson, Assistant Professor Sarah Roche-Gerstein was asked how she felt it and simply pointed to a portrait of a stern, grey "scholarly" looking man which dominated one of the lounge's walls. Many women feel that the archetype of the distinguished scholar and good teacher is something like that portrait, and that women faculty do not fit into the mold. One place it shows up is in the classroom, where they feel that students are looking for the kind of authority figure that they do not want to play.

"The kind of authority figure students expect in a classroom here is a male figure," said Roche-Gerstein. "I had a lot of problems my first semester teaching here since people were unaccustomed to seeing a woman. I felt I had to spend a lot of energy ... to counteract it by saying 'I refuse to be an authority figure.' I walked into it not expecting it. I never felt it at UCLA or Pitzer (where she had taught previously)."

Assistant Professor Meredith Hoppin voiced the same sentiment. "My feeling is that if you're a woman, you have to be brash to establish credibility. Assertiveness is admired here more than elsewhere." A number of other women faculty expressed similar views.

Many have also found biases among the male faculty working against them. According to Grudin, when she first began teaching here in 1971, she encountered a great deal of overt sexism. "In those days," she said, "male members of the faculty were very willing to articulate their prejudices against women as serious professionals, and open in their attempts to joke about it. It became more and more rare after 1973 to hear these things." She does not, however, feel that that development has meant an end to biased attitudes toward women. "Although faculty women rarely hear these slurs any longer, I don't for a minute believe that these biases have disappeared. Behavior changes before attitudes."

She described an incident which occurred more recently in which she was the only woman on a particular faculty subcommittee. When the subcommittee had finished drafting its report, its chairman asked if she would type it. "I was speechless," she said. "I could only drop my jaw and sputter out, 'no.' " She added that "we (women) are often besieged by this kind of prejudice. I shouldn't have to defend myself all the time. It's so enervating."

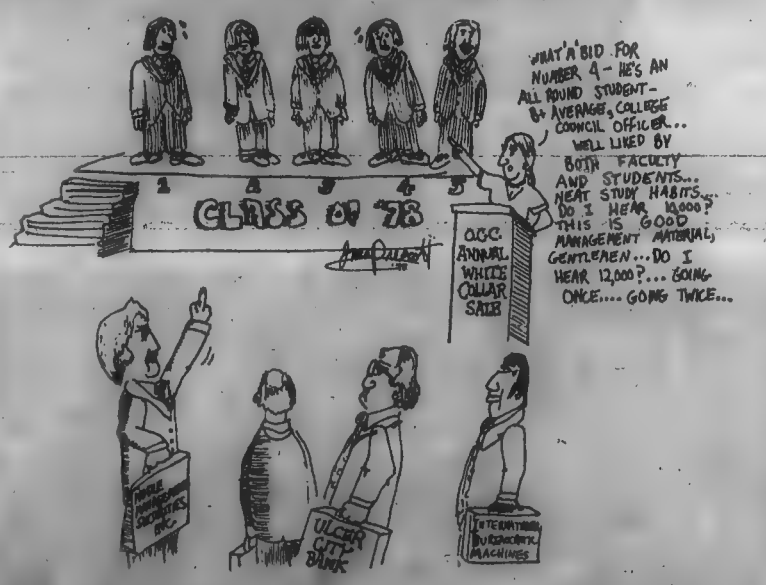
No one else interviewed described overt sexism in terms as strong as Grudin's, but a number did express the feeling that as women they felt it was more difficult to be taken seriously as scholars and also to relate well to their male colleagues. Part of the problem in this regard, however, is that most of the women here are members of the junior faculty and it is often difficult to single out either sex or lack of seniority as a source of alienation.

"Junior faculty problems and women's problems are all mixed up together," said Oakley. "That's not to say they (women's problems) are not there, but just that they are very difficult to sort out."

One way in which the two feelings get merged is in the feeling of some junior women faculty that they are being judged for tenure not only on academic performance, but also on how well they mix socially, and they feel themselves at a social disadvantage to their male colleagues.

"Your professional and social life are merged here," explained Larson. "You do a lot of you relating to senior faculty members, people who are judging you, over sherry. A lot of women find that is a difficult milieu in which to reinforce ties to other members of the department."

She and a number of other women faculty also spoke of a "locker room syndrome," that is, the fact that a considerable amount of faculty socializing is done through athletics, something from which they feel themselves excluded.



Finally, the maleness of Williams manifests itself for many women simply in the lopsided sex ratios on the faculty. At present, 14.8 per cent of the Williams faculty is female, and only 3.6 per cent of its tenured faculty. Compared to many similar schools the College is not doing that poorly. Many women, however, come from graduate schools or teaching jobs at colleges where the disparity is much less or non-existent and are surprised to suddenly find themselves in such a minority.

If you're a woman, you have to be brash to establish credibility. -Hoppin

"Going through grad school," said Hoppin, "I didn't think of myself as a woman but as a classicist and an anthropologist. When I got here is when I started looking at myself as a woman. You stand out around here."

The dearth of women in the senior ranks exacerbates the problem. Junior women faculty come here and find no "visible" distinguished women scholars who might act as "role models" for them. In addition, the small number of senior women contributes to a generally low scholarly profile for women faculty on campus. The Womens' Colloquia is an attempt to raise that profile, said Hoppin.

Part two of this article will look at some of the ways women faculty and administrators are seeking solutions to the problems they have identified.

The Mercury Column: Motivation

E. B. White writes in his Letters that the reason there is so much activity in Maine in the winter is that, given the rigors of the climate, people are afraid to stand still. It is certainly dangerous to stand still in front of the Bronfman library doors. With the hall lights out to save energy, it is so dark that one runs the risk of being in collision with an exciting professor who forgot to put on his glasses. Does this gloom really save enough to be worth the risk; is the game worth the (unburned) candle? If all of the students pulled the drapes on their dorm windows before leaving for vacation, would the energy saved due to less heat loss exceed the energy expended in the pulling? Should the campus temperatures be dropped 1 degree, if the resulting saving is only $4 per student per year?

The question before the house today is: Assuming that the answer to each of the above questions is yes, how might we best get appropriate steps taken? Those of us in Bronfman were told last year that we would be allowed as extra research funds any money saved in energy costs. I have no idea how effective this ploy was, since mathematicians rarely get such funds. (How much does just plain thought cost?) Suppose, indeed, that all of us could be convinced to operate under a 1 degree temperature drop. Would we do it for $4? $8? Do I hear $12? The committee is exploring both the carrot and the stick approaches to energy saving. I must admit to some ambivalence about our chances of success with either method. I have difficulty getting my own children to turn off unused lights at home, since they neither pay the utility bills now would they realize any savings on such bills. Even if I did pass on, say, $1 a month to each of them would that create the requisite sense of urgency? Somehow I doubt it.

My own feelings about the traditional Williams prize, either in money or equivalent keg, are sharpened by my not being a beer-drinker. My reaction to tuition rebates, as a dues-paying father of children in college, is a hopeless resignation towards ever-increasing term bills. Also I find it difficult to imagine a no-fault energy conservation program: Who left that light on? Who fell asleep in the shower? Who forgot to close the window? Long years ago my dander rose when, in grade school, the whole class was kept from recess because of the behavior of a few students. Some combination of carrot and stick seems indicated, and the committee welcomes all insights into what might be effective.

Let's keep in mind where in this ball-park we are. If the energy costs last year were $700,000 and we could save 5-8 per cent, we're talking about roughly $20-25 per student, or ½ of 1 per cent of your term bill. Suppose we split the savings: half to the College and half to the student. Now we're back to the $1. per month mentioned above. Put that way, it doesn't make a very strong incentive to conserve. But in a house of 50 students, $500-600 is at least a basis for some constructive thought. Of course, not all of that saving can be realized by an individual house, many of which are not big users of energy compared to, say, Bronfman or the hockey rink. Assuming that energy use can be monitored per house, what amount of money would move you to action? Suppose excess use was to be deducted from house funds? Now what kind of money will raise the vigilantes? $100? $500? Do I hear more? (I hope not.)

This is not a problem that admits an immediate solution, nor one that can be arrived at by abstract thought. Sherlock Holmes says several times that it is a capital mistake to theorize in advance of the data. To get such data, the committee is considering a set of student monitors to estimate how much could be saved in each campus building. This bothers me; it smacks too much of Big Brother (Sister?) watching us. But I see no other way to get the kind of hard information we need.

Our fact for this week comes from an article in Yale Scientific Magazine by Don Scroggin, erstwhile member of the Williams chemistry department. He reports (p. 11, April 1977) that "If the U.S. had used the energy conservation measures proved effective in Sweden, our energy consumption in 1971 would have been reduced 25 to 40 per cent." And if it is said by a faculty member—even an erstwhile one—it must be true. Mussent it?

Weekend Sports Roundup!

Women's swimming

Six college records fell, two were created and the women's swim team brought its first New England champion back to Williams Sunday night after participating in the New England Women's Swimming and Diving Championships at Boston College over winter carnival weekend.

Sophomores Keron Walker, undefeated in Williams dual meet competition during the season, became the 1977-78 New England champion in two events, the 50 butterfly and the 50 freestyle. Both times, 27.47 and 26.16 respectively, bettered college records by more than .7 of a second. Walker also took fourth in the 100 individual medley in Williams record time of 1:04.57.

Senior Sue Tuttle ended her college swimming career by cracking her own school record in the 50 breaststroke as she finished sixth in 32.24. She then returned to swim the breaststroke leg of the ninth place 400 medley relay team including Linda Reed, Nina Murphy and Molly Murphy. The relay knocked a full second off its qualifying time of a 4:31.3 to finish in 4:30.3, another Williams record.

Katherine Pearsall and Chantel Cleland swam Williams' first recorded 1650 freestyle races Friday night. Pearsall placed 16th with a 19:49 and Cleland, 25th, with a 21:30. Pearsall's time and that of the seventh place 800 free relay team of Murphy, Murphy, Reed and Walker, 8:39.7, automatically become college records because the events have never before been attempted by Williams swimmers.

The 200 free relay team of Reed, Murphy, Buck and Walker also broke the previous 1:47.33 college record with a 1:46.89 ninth place performance on Saturday night.

Overall team results of the meet have been delayed indefinitely pending a decision by the National Committee of Women's College Athletics on a protest against Williams' swimmers' participation in individual events Sunday.

Williams was in ninth place among 38 teams after Saturday's events with 121.5 points.

Men's swimming

A depleted Wesleyan squad consisting of only 7 members proved to be no obstacle for the Williams men's swimming team as it captured the Little Three title with a 79-16 trouncing of the Cardinals.

Williams opened with a win by the 400 medley relay team of Dave Amlicke, Brian Volpp, Jim Goff and Phil Wild, and went on to take first place in every event. The Ephmen swept first and second places in 5 races—Marc Johnson and Keith Berryhill finished 1-2 in the 200 free, Bill Beckett and Robert Connelly took the 50 free, Don Cameron and Peter Howd swept the 200 individual medley, and Johnson and Adams secured the top two spots in the 500 free.

The Cardinals put up no competition in the diving allowing Gregg Roux and Bill Kelly to place first and second. Gordon Cliff copped the 200 butterfly. In the 100 free, Tom Beckett swam to a first place with Phil Ward clocking an unofficial time in the event. Amlicke and Brian McDermott captured firsts for Williams in the 200 back and breast respectively. The Ephs finished the meet with a win in the 400 free relay by Hoelzer, Cole, Goff and Wild.

Ephs look forward now to the New Englands, which will be held in Springfield on March 2-4.

24-hour ergathon

The Williams College Boat Club is preparing once again to row their way to Washington, D.C., by sponsoring the annual 24-hour ergathon in Baxter Hall, February 25-26. Both the men's and women's crews are collecting pledges from friends and supporters to help offset the costs of the squad's spring training trip to Washington.

For the uninitiated, the Ergathon features all the members of the men's and women's crews, including coxswains, rowing two fifteen minute pieces on the ergometer, which is moved from the gym to the Baxter Lounge. The ergometer simulates the oarsperson's rowing situation; it is a machine comprised of a seat and an oar hooked up to a wheel and dials that measure efficiency.

Women's hockey

A tremendous comeback effort starting midway through the third period fell just short as time ran out for the women's ice hockey team, and Dartmouth College won 4-3. The loss puts the Ephs record at 4-5 with three games remaining.

Dartmouth came out fighting, scoring at 5:22 on a slapshot that was deflected off another forward's skate. Six minutes later the Indians tallied again as a shot was flipped by Eph goalie Blythe Miller. Dartmouth's strong defense kept Williams forward line from mounting any kind of attack in the opening period.

During the second stanza, the two squads played to a standstill, neither team being able to cap its offensive drives with a goal.

The visitor's lead increased with a score on a slapshot from the blue line with six minutes gone in the third period. Midway through the period, Dartmouth scored again, virtually securing their victory. Williams, however, was not about to go down without a fight. At 10:22, freshman Sarah Behrer tallied on a pass from her classmate, defenseman Bonnie Foster. With just 4 minutes remaining in the contest, senior Mary Fish cut the Indian's lead with a score assisted by frosh Julia Weyerhauser. Williams "never say die" attitude paid off when, at the 1:13 mark, Fish and Weyerhauser combined for the assist on a Sarah Baldwin goal. With one minute remaining, coach Scott Harrington pulled the goalie, but it was to no avail. Sophomore Blythe Miller put on a phenomenal performance in the goal stopping a total of 32 Dartmouth shots. Miller's play kept the Ephs psyched and her efforts were infectious as she spurred the entire team including the forwards as well as her fellow defensemen.

The women's hockey team looks to even its record at Colgate on Feb. 24.

Wrestling

Williams' hopes for a Little Three Wrestling title and a .500 record were shattered this weekend as the Eph grapplers fell to the tournament champions Wesleyan 37-11 and Amherst 42-18. Williams finishes the season with a 4-4 record.

The only bright spots for Williams were the performances of Captain Hal Zendle and freshman Scott Frost. Zendle drew a forfeit against Amherst and walloped his Wesleyan opponent 17-5 to finish his regular season with an unblemished 12-0 record and a Little Three title in the 118 pound class.

Scott Frost ended his first season as a Williams' wrestler with a bang, scoring two pins to capture the 134 pound Little Three title. Frost shook off some early season freshman jitters and then won seven out of his last eight matches to post a 7-5 overall record. His winning spree entitles him to accompany Zendle to the New England this Saturday.

Coach Joe Dailey was displeased with his team's third place finish. He added, "Wesleyan was really tough; they have an excellent program this year. However, I thought we could have taken Amherst, since they gave us 12 points on forfeits."

Zendle hopes to better his fifth place finish in the New Englands last year. Zendle will most likely be seeded third in what Dailey says is "an extremely tough 118 pound weight class. Dailey added that Zendle should be more ready this year than he was for last year's tournament in which he was seeded first. "We moved him down to 118 earlier this year so he could have more time to get comfortable at the lower weight."

Hindu plaque arrives at museum

Currently on view is a large Indian temple plaque (see photo) which is the museum's most recent purchase. It is part of a vast assemblage of such sculpture that originally covered the entirety of a Hindu temple—although the specific temple or location or exact date can only be intuitively determined. It is identified as being from Khajuraho and the 11th century. The plaque depicts a rearing sardula (pronounced shar-jula), a mythical leonine animal fighting with two smaller beings. Symbolically it relates to Hindu concepts of life-energy, but the complete iconography has not yet been discovered.

Why was this work nought and how was the decision made? After asking almost all applicable professors both at the college and the Clark Art Institute then listening to student opinions—it was decided that this was a perfect piece in terms of quality, beauty and educational applicability. It's cost was high—virtually the entire acquisition budget for one year. It is the museum's own "Juan de Pareja" (the reknowned acquisition of the Metropolitan Museum of Art).

Yet two more points are important to consider. Since the Clark does not collect oriental art, as a pendant institution—it becomes the responsibility of the college art museum. More importantly, Indian art is taught by the world-reknowned, full-time orientalist—Professor Milo C. Beach. The museum needs real art to complement his fascinating, oriental

Women skiers take third, Men place fifth in Carnival

Honors go to UVM, Middlebury, Dartmouth

Men's skiing

Despite strong showings in all events, the Williams men's ski team was unable to improve on its last two carnival showings, skiing to a fifth place finish in its own carnival activities this weekend. Although Eph coach Bud Fisher had hoped to place fourth on the strength of slalom experts Donald Tarinelli, Josh Dembrinski, and Andy Mikell, a host of outstanding skiers from UVM pulled off the needed times to capture yet another first place victory. UVM, aided by Karston Midvelt's cross country win, Scott Light's second place giant slalom finish, and Kary Herje's winning jump, ran up 322 points in the overall competition with Middlebury coming in second with 266. Dartmouth, grabbing a win in the slalom by Tim Iteo placed third with 215 points, while New Hampshire took the coveted fourth place position away from Williams with a score of 202.5.

The Williams team tallied 167 points as a result of consistent finishes in the individual slalom events. In the giant slalom, Andy Mikell skied to a ninth place spot to secure a fourth place finish in the team men's giant slalom.

The team's expectations for a strong showing in the slalom event were lost though in a poor eighth place out of ten overall. Don Tarinelli was the bright spot for Williams, skiing to a fifth place finish with a time of 75.53.

In the jumping events Jeff Hastings of Williams had another afternoon of good jumps with a fifth place finish that put the team in sixth in team jumping.

With Vermont the favorite going into the carnival, Williams had set their sights on a fourth place finish and a win over University of New Hampshire. Despite the much needed fourth in the giant slalom, the win was put out of reach by the team's slalom results.

The men's team will have another chance to improve that fifth place finish this weekend as they take off for Middlebury's winter carnival activities with a crew of determined skiers.

Women's skiing

The women's ski team provided a combination of strong individual performances and a few misfortunate ones, eventually taking third in the weekend's Winter Carnival. The University of Vermont was the upset winner over second place Middlebury College.

Alpine captain Marty Epstein's victory in Friday's giant slalom was the highlight of the alpine team's results. She had the fastest times on each of her two runs, for a combined time .70 seconds ahead of the next finisher. Freshmen Julie Ernst and Kathy Lane also placed well, Julie skiing to sixth place and Kathy ending up in 11th place. Ashley Smith had two good runs, finishing 19th. Williams took second in the giant slalom, their strongest showing in that event this year. Thirty-five women from seven colleges competed.

In the cross-country competition, Cathy Allen had one of her best races of the season, placing ninth with a time of 30:57 on the 7.5 kilometer course. She was just 2:38 behind the winner, national team member Liz Carey of Middlebury. Junior Sara Reynolds finished 18th, also a good race, with Carrie Redlich 21st, Janet Lavin 24th, and Franny Todd 25th. Williams wound up in fourth place in the cross-country.

Going into Saturday's slalom, the event that had so far been the team's strongest, Williams stood in third place, within reach of Middlebury. After the first of two runs, Marty Epstein and Julie Ernst stood in first and second, with Kathy Lane not far behind in fifth, and Corrie Johnson in 13th. But the run was misfortunate for the team, with the major exception of Kathy Lane, who finished fifth. Everyone else skied off the course or fell. Williams only placed sixth in the slalom, but because of their earlier results they were able to hold third place in the final team standings.

Next weekend the women travel to Middlebury, hoping to pull together all their best performances for that EAIAW championship competition.

Panthers push pucksters off eighth place Div II mark

by Mark Pogue

Middlebury's black-clad hockey Panthers did their best to wreck the Carnival mood at Williams last Friday, pinning a convincing 7-2 loss on the Purple before a near-capacity audience at Lansing Chapman Rink. The decision dropped the Ephs' season record to 8-9 and cut them adrift from their eighth-place hideout in Division II's Western Conference. Now Williams has just three games in which to climb back among the top eight in order to make the Division II playoffs.

"We didn't score when we had the chances too early," opined Williams Coach Bill McCormick. "We started very well and then trailed off." Both teams skated off to fast starts and had the fans clapping after some sharp passes and board-jolting checks. With just 2:09 gone in the game Williams wing Chris Egizi made it 1-0 when he rebounded Tom Resor's errant shot and blasted the puck into a half-open cage. The Ephs had at least two more easy chances in the ensuing moments but came up empty-handed.

Enter the Panthers. At the 4:20 mark, with hard-working Purple goalie Ed Weiss screened behind a black forest of Middlebury players, Panther captain Alan Fitzpatrick let loose a 35-foot blue-liner that streaked like a scared mouse through ice skates, sticks, and bodies before ending up in the net. Three minutes later, with Williams 20 seconds away from killing a Panther power play, Mike O'Hara took passes from John Watson and Chip Hagy and beat Weiss from 10 feet out. The same trio of Middies collaborated for a score three minutes later to leave things at 3-1 after one period.

Middlebury stuffed in two scores at the beginning of the second period to put the game out of reach. Williams got a power play goal from Chic Johnson at the 5:27 mark, but the Cats came back with two in the third to raise the count to 7-2. In the last stanza, the Ephmen had three consecutive power plays but could get off only eight total shots on goal. On the season, opponents have spent 40 more minutes in the penalty box than Williams players have, yet the Purple has converted fewer power plays than opponents.

Williams plays at Hamilton tonight. Then it will give up a scheduled home game against Salem in order to play Western Conference rival UMass at Amherst on Friday.

UPenn raquettes upset

The Williams' women's varsity squash team defeated the University of Pennsylvania 6-1 Saturday on the Eph's home courts.

Four of the six wins for Williams lasted only three games, with the longest and closest match played by Mary Tom Higgs, in an effort to secure a victory at the Number four position. After winning the first two games 15-9, 15-11, Higgs conceded two games, both at 15-6. In the fifth and final game, and trailing 8-5, she fought her way back in a neck-and-neck battle to win 15-12.

Laura Carson, Jane Garvey, Marcia Johnston, and Kristen Johanson all won 3-0 with relative ease. Ros Sareyan, playing at Number six, won 3-1 after losing the second game and clinching the final game in a 16-13 tie-breaker. The only loss incurred by Williams was in the top position, where Beckie Chase lost a well fought match, 3-0.

The women hope to improve their present 6-1 record for the season Wednesday at home, as they meet both Trinity and Tufts Colleges.

Ephmen destroy Cards 71-37

by Frank Pergolizzi

All season long the Williams basketball team had been playing good defense. Their problem had been scoring. "We're just not getting the kind of point production needed to win consistently," said Coach Curt Tong Saturday afternoon before the Wesleyan game. That evening the Ephmen got their offensive machine rolling, but didn't forget the other half of their game. The result was a convincing 71-37 trouncing of a Wesleyan team the Ephmen had lost to earlier this season.

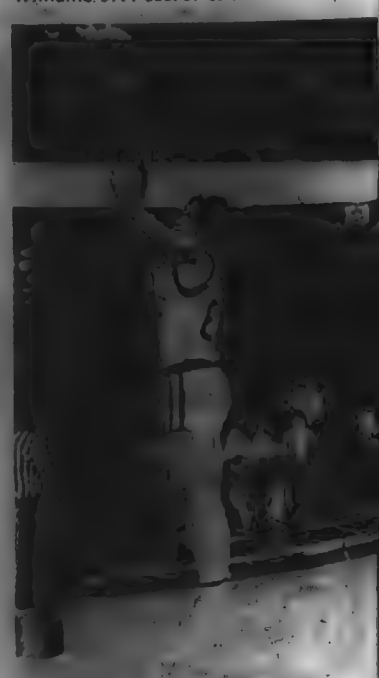
Williams broke out of the starting gate quickly, scoring the first six points of the game. Matt Spangler, Dean Ahlberg, and Gerry Kelly each contributing two points. With Spangler hitting everything in sight, Williams maintained a six point lead, going into the locker room ahead 25-19. Good patient offense and tough zone defense had the Winter Carnival crowd hoping that this would not be a repeat of the Clark game.

Scoring six of the first eight points of the half, Williams went up by ten, 31-21. Wesleyan went to a full court man press in an attempt to break the rhythm of the Williams offense. With the score 38-29, the Ephs ran off nine consecutive points widening the gap to eighteen. Never letting the pressure stop on offense, Williams continued to play tough defense. The second string even ran off a ten point streak to end the game.

Defensively, the Ephs put on a textbook clinic of how to play zone defense. Williams had been averaging more points a game than their opponents, even with a 5-10 record. Powerful offensive teams have come into Lasell and been lucky to get away with 60 points. Saturday night the Ephmen were just plain stingy. Playing zone all the way, they allowed Wesleyan to take only 36 shots.

A Brad Wolk, Kelly, Spangler, Ahlberg, or Andy Straka was constantly knocking the ball away or grabbing a Wesleyan pass out of mid-air. Wesleyan's center Seth Kreisberg had been averaging fifteen points a game. He was held to one field goal. An indication of how good the defense was is that the Cardinals were allowed only six attempts from the free throw line. The best measure of any defense is points allowed, and 37 points stands up against the toughest of critics.

Offensively, the key to the Williams game is patience. Saturday they executed almost perfectly, passing the ball and waiting for a good shot. The Ephmen were 28-56 from the field—a solid 50 per cent. Three starters were in double figures: Spangler with 19, Ahlberg with 13, and Kelly with 12.



The win was sweet revenge for Williams. They had lost to Wesleyan February 4 when they blew an eight point lead and lost with two seconds left in overtime. Saturday, the Ephmen dominated Wesleyan in every phase of the game.

The victory also marks the end of a six game losing streak—a streak that has brought much frustration and disappointment. "Now we know what kind of team we can be. Hopefully this will get us rolling," said a smiling Curt Tong after the game.

Women dribblers upset Green

It was a weekend of upsets for the Williams women's basketball team as the squad kicked off Winter Carnival with an unexpected 53-40 win over Dartmouth, only to go down to defeat at Smith College Saturday, 61-56.

Against Smith, the Ephwomen fell behind by 14 points early in the first half before managing a comeback which brought them to 26-33 at midgame. Williams and its hosts traded baskets for the remainder of the half until, as coach Sue Hadson-Hamblin noted, "the game was decided in the last 40 seconds." Down by one, Williams fouled an accurate Smith hoopster who grabbed two from the foul line. The Ephs then fouled again allowing Smith two more to ice the five point upset.

Despite the unexpected loss, coach Hudson-Hamblin had nothing but praise for the play of Monica Grady and Anne Youngling. Grady hit 19 points, grabbed 5 rebounds, and picked off 3 steals in an afternoon of "errorless play", Co-captain Anne Youngling played another in a series of strong games with 18 points, 10 rebounds, and a steal for Williams.

On the strength of its defense, last Thursday, Williams pulled to a 14-2 lead midway through the first half on its way to defeating Dartmouth 53-40. The opening moments of the contest were tentative as the taller Dartmouth squad was held scoreless with Williams taking a three point lead from the foul line. Anne Youngling then came out rebounding for Williams turning the momentum on for the hosts four minutes into the contest. As the offense warmed, the Eph's defense was red hot, as Leslie Milne stole four and tapped away countless others. Milne connected for Williams' first basket in a steal-and-shoot play that put Williams up 5-0.

Following the sensational first half, Williams offense lost their mark going 1 for 19 in the opening minutes of the second half. A tight 1-3-1 defense held Dartmouth to within nine points before Williams fired up again on the shotmaking of Youngling (14) and O'Brien (16).

Williams met Amherst College last night at Amherst in the deciding contest for the first Women's basketball Little Three title.

Carnival party plans conflict

by Stu Massed

Co-organizers of Williams social events have begun questioning the powers and functions of two all-campus social groups, Williams Health, Education and Welfare (WHEW) and the Social Coordinating Committee (SCC) after analyzing the success of Winter Carnival.

"As far as I'm concerned, WHEW is really an anachronism," said Don Perry '79. He called WHEW's handling of the Poker Flats events and last Friday's party "Immensely successful." But he said that the organization duplicates functions performed by the SCC, a fact emphasized by the successful Beatlemania party sponsored by the later organization in Mission Park Dining Hall Friday night.

Perry claimed that the SCC alone could have organized two parties for Winter Carnival, and either the SCC or the Outing Club's Activities Committee, which he also heads, could have run the Poker Flats events.

Despite receipts of only some $350 from its Friday night party, in Greylock, WHEW remained within the budget set by the College Council. "We probably are going to be returning money to them," Perry commented.

Attendance was a problem at WHEW's party. Although 350 students passed the gates, some 300 of these came after 11:30 p.m., when the SCC's Beatlemania party closed its doors. The former party began at 9:30 p.m. WHEW members claimed that their party was successful after the 11:30 p.m. inrush. The SCC's Mission Park party, while much more successful than WHEW's in drawing people, has a controversial history and still unresolved funding problems.

Initially, the schedule of evening events for the weekend was to include an all college mixer sponsored by Mark Hopkins House on Thursday night with the ACEC concert on Friday night followed by a WHEW party. When the ACEC was forced to schedule the concert for Thursday night, Hopkins House got together with WHEW to attempt to work jointly at organizing a mixer.

After collaboration with Steve Case, John Svoboda said, "I decided that a Beatle band with substantial appeal might be a nice draw for the Friday all college mixer. The ACEC agreed to George Plimpton, popular writer, "participatory journalist" and folk-hero, spoke about his experiences to a packed Jesup Hall audience Tuesday night.

Plimpton told of his exploits playing football with the Detroit Lions, basketball with the Boston Celtics, boxing against light-heavyweight champion Archie Moore, and touring Canada as a soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Plimpton's presentation consisted of a series of autobiographical anecdotes and jokes. He offered two explanations for his habit of attempting various professional sports. On one hand, he saw it as a means of getting close to the subject about which he intends to write. His more compelling motivation, however, was a desire to fulfill a common fantasy of American males: the chance to play with a professional sports team.

The audience joined Plimpton in laughing at his comic athletic performances. In one of many anecdotes, Plimpton told of how he played during the final minutes of a Boston Celtics basketball game. Celtic coach Bill Russell, thinking the game was lost, substituted Plimpton for John Havlicek. Miraculously, the Boston team proceeded to narrow the margin from fifteen points down to only three with 45 seconds left in the game. At this point, with victory again in sight,

Guide to be published

The Course Guide evaluation of last fall's courses will definitely be published during spring semester. In addition, the Course Guide Committee czar, Don Toumey, said it will cover more courses than its predecessor. Toumey's report was followed at Wednesday's College Council meeting by debate on a proposed student woodworking shop and an explanation of the Social Coordinating Committee's involvement in the Beatlemania dance held during Winter Carnival.

According to Toumey, the Course Guide will include information on "46 per cent of the courses we originally intended to include." Last year the guide was able to cover only 40 per cent of the courses it had wished to review, Paul Shorb '78 added. Moreover, each course will be covered in more detail than it was last year.

The guide is not able to effectively evaluate more courses because there is, Toumey said, "a sense of cynicism about it—people feel it's not going to come out." He vowed that in the future the guide will come out every semester and will attempt to cover more courses in an effort to build confidence in it. "The key to the

The upcoming annual Finance Committee report features two major problems: delays in allocating funds and inefficiencies in reviewing funding requests, according to its chairman, Harry Kelly.

Student Activities Tax allocations, completed by the Finance Committee December 10, should have been finished by mid-November, he said. The delay inconvenienced many organizations, which are guaranteed only 10 per cent of their previous allocation until a new grant is approved. Due to the uncertainty, these organizations were either unable to schedule activities or forced to risk over-spending.

This week the Finance Committee discussed possible recommendations to be included in the report. One suggestion called for a January-to-January budget, as opposed to the present organization on the basis of the academic year. Also opposed was the break-up of the committee into two functionally spearate groups, which would meet only for final decisions. Ultimately, both proposals were rejected.

Finance Committee member John Simpson suggested that to speed up the funding process, the committee might require groups seeking funds to fill out more detailed reports, thus making less questioning necessary during hearings. Kelly emphasized that the College Council needs to

Leakey discusses her work

by Paul Thomas

"Our plan was to construct an outline of a sequence of prehistoric cultures," distinguished anthropologist Mary Leakey told a capacity crowd in Jesup Auditorium on Monday night, describing her work at Olduvai Gorge and Laetolil in Tanzania in East Africa. Olduvai Gorge has become, as Mrs. Leakey put it, a "household word". The gorge was first explored by a German butterfly collector in 1911 who found some fossils. A German expedition was dispatched to the area in 1913, but World War I intervened and the effort was shelved. Olduvai lay undisturbed until Mrs. Leakey's late husband, Louis Leakey, arrived in 1931. Three months work yielded numerous fossils and stone tools. Mary Leakey went to Olduvai in 1935. Among her personal achievements was the discovery of the remains of a specimen of Zinjanthropus, an early hominid. The Leakeys also uncovered there one of the most complete campsites of early man ever found.

All of the fossils and artifacts at Olduvai were preserved by volcanic ash that covered the area after the prehistoric eruption of local volcanoes. The deposits at the Gorge range in age from two million to three hundred thousand years old. The site is divided into four strata or beds. The first bed is the oldest, and contains remains of two distinct types of hominids. Zinjanthropus, was probably slightly more advanced than a modern day chimpanzee. He was a vegetarian, and used his teeth to fashion tools from branches. The Leakeys have found parts of his skull.

Zinjanthropus lived virtually side by side with another hominid called Homo habilus. Homo habilus was about four feet tall. He made stone tools, and indeed, "tool boxes", actually gatherings of up to seven different types of tools, have been found.

Mary Leakey, wife of the late an thropologist, talked of expeditions Monday.

Faculty votes to revise Latin Honors standards

Following an executive session devoted to a discussion of salaries, the faculty meeting convened on Wednesday to consider an agenda consisting primarily of routine actions.

The faculty did however vote to revise the standards for graduation with Latin honors and as a result of their decision, the qualifying grade point averages have been substantially increased. Whereas members of the class of '78 with GPA's of 8.00-9.24, 9.25-10.24, and 10.25-12.00 will graduate cum laude, magna cum laude, and summa cum laude respectively, underclassmen will need to have averages of 9.00-9.74, 9.74-10.24, and 10.25-12.00 to receive the same distinctions at their graduations.

As CEP Chairman Gordon Winston explained, due to the disproportionately large number of students that have been graduating with honors in recent years, for the remainder of the class, "it becomes not Latin Honor but rather English dishonor." Winston noted that 70 per cent of the class of '77 received their degrees cum laude.

These new standards will remain, Winston explained unless an annual review by the Registrar's office discloses that over 40 per cent of the members of a graduating class have qualified for honors. Moreover, as the faculty determined, only 14 per cent of any given class should graduate magna cum laude and only 10 people should graduate with highest honors.

Another matter of interest which was discussed at the faculty meeting concerned what President Chandler termed the request "for a rather massive divestiture of college holdings."

Chandler announced that the Trustees had authorized the creation of an advisory committee on shareholding. The committee will consist of James Coben '79, Marlies Carruth '80, Professors Peek and Sheehan, Provost Grabois and 2 alumni.

Kelly emphasized that the College Council needs to tighten up the deadline for funding requests to four weeks.

Simpson noted that the Student Activities Tax for next year cannot be raised, as tuition and other costs for next year have been finalized. Kelly stated, though, that there should be no unusual hardships for groups seeking funds. The report suggests two conditions on which the SAT might be raised: first, if cutbacks in key activities become necessary; and second, if new and worthwhile committees cannot get funding. The tax has been constant at $56 for the past few years, which is "remarkable," according to Kelly, considering the effects of inflation.

The committee is considering adding either a freshman or a CC representative to its membership. Kelly asserted that a freshman, despite his or her inexperience, could "better serve the interests" of his class. A CC member, on the other hand, would strengthen the Committee's ties to the council. In either case, said Kelly, the added person would help to reduce the individual burden members share in the monitoring of budgets.

The report supports the creation of new sports clubs. The added expense of perhaps $300 or more per year, Kelly stated, does not justify arbitrarily committing future Finance Committees a policy of banning new

Another matter of interest which was discussed at the faculty meeting concerned what President Chandler termed the request "for a rather massive divestiture of college holdings."

Chandler announced that the Trustees had authorized the creation of an advisory committee on shareholding. The committee will consist of James Coben '79, Marlies Carruth '80, Professors Peek and Sheehan, Provost Grabois and 2 alumni.

Upgrading Honors

The inevitable happened at Wednesday afternoon's Faculty meeting—a proposal to change Grade Point Average requirements for Latin Honors passed almost unanimously, effective beginning with the class of 1979. (Cum Laude will now require 9.0; Magna 9.75; and Summa 10.5.)

Though inevitable, as almost three-fourths of every class was graduating with honors, the change comes at a most unpropitious time for juniors who receive little warning. The former 8.0 to 9.0 range, in which so many of us hover, will no longer win kudos from family, friends, or employers. Considering that the honor conferred had in actuality become minimal and that the absence of such honors had become humiliating, the change cannot be deplored.

Steepening the requisited restores some integrity and true honor to those so recognized. Grade inflation, a phenomenon common to most schools, nowadays, is thus "combatted." (Dean's List is now subject to similar scrutiny.)

Even though students entering Williams had begun to expect at least Cum Laude, was the faculty wholly justified in springing this change upon the unsuspecting members of the class of '79, a year earlier than proposed by the Committee on Educational Policy? Many students will answer affirmatively as Latin Honors will cease to be mere token citations.

Madubuti touches Black nerves

by Augustin Jackson

On Monday night, I came to Griffin Hall anticipating a poetry reading by Haki R. Madubuti (Don L. Lee). Instead, I heard the most inspiring and refreshing lecture I have heard at Williams. He touched sensitive nerves by asserting that Blackness wanes as Black students experience four years at Williams and other "white elitist" institutions. We are not aware of the subtle acculturation process, he said. As a consequence, we "graduate with vocations but we lose our Blackness—our cultural purity." Essentially, Madubuti stated, we leave Williams to service white people's interests.

He touched my nerves because I have found I have to shed my Williams verbosity in order to communicate when I go "home". I wonder why people in Brownsville are not as friendly. I feel vulnerable when I go home. I think that every nigger I see at the next corner is going to get me. I ask why Black people can't keep their projects clean.

Madubiti opened a perspective I could not see or that no one would dare attempt to open for me in my seclusion at Williams. He charged that virtually all "life-giving" and "life-saving" decisions that affect Blacks, regarding housing, education, food and clothing, are made by whites. "This is the most subtle form of scientific slavery," he concluded. "A people's ability to make and carry out decisions in their own best interest will soon die out if their minds and bodies are not constantly trained and conditioned to function such a self-determining level."

Blacks in America, Madubuti contended, "have moved from wearing the original slave dress of butt-naked with chains to the more accepted tie and shirt or skirt and blouse. Many drive big cars and some live in large houses or condominiums and have what most people consider 'good' jobs. However, for the majority of Black people, the economic, political, and cultural status has yet to change to any degree commensurate with that of the society at large."

He suggested that all responsible Black intellectuals, including those Black students at Williams, should study and work hard, directing all their energies towards the development of Black people. Furthermore, he said, they must always remain aware of the acculturation process in which they are involved.

Madubuti's personal commitment to the Black community is a dedicated one. He is one of the founders and editors of the Third World Press, editor of Black Books Bulletin, Director of the Institute of Positive Education in Chicago, and was a poet in residence at Howard University for seven years. Also concerned with racial injustices outside the United States, the poet explained that "Whatever happens here will have serious overtones for the rest of the hemisphere and the world . . . If we are able to challenge effectively the United States and reduce or eliminate its racist and imperialistic influence here, we will be aiding all other liberation movements."

As I left 3 Griffin, I remembered Madubuti's strongest words: we are here at Williams because Williams was forced to accept us. Black people paid a precious price for us to be here—their lives. We must never be humble and never beg, but always remember that our ultimate reality is that we are black. All else is superficial.

Parties clashed on Friday kick in funds for the band; hence an ACEC-Hopkins House-WHEW affair began to evolve."

Svoboda explains that on Thursday, February 9, Don Perry and he discussed "the financial and logistical matters of the party" and that Perry warmly received the idea of the Beatle band and the triple sponsor idea. Svoboda says that he informed Perry that he needed approval for the go ahead to sign the band and that Perry agreed to call Bronson Fargo who was coordinator of the WHEW end of the party to inform him a band had been found. No further contact was made that night, hence, Walrus was signed.

On Monday, Feb. 13, Svoboda learned that Bronson Fargo had signed the group Mannakin on Thursday, Feb. 9th, and that Fargo had not been informed by Don Perry of the intent to sign Walrus: two bands were signed for one party.

At dinner Monday night, Hopkins House, with persuasion from WHEW, decided it was in the best interest of the campus to proceed with one band and let the WHEW proceed with Mannakin alone. Both Hopkins House and the WHEW were satisfied with this agreement, yet the SCC was to decide otherwise on Tuesday night.

Steve Case '80 said an SCC meeting led to the renewal of the Beatlemania contract. The SCC decided to hold a party to complement the WHEW party, claiming that one party could not support all the students on Friday night. The band previously signed for Hopkins was suggested and approved, and Case renewed the contract.

In the end, the SCC's party cost $1300. "Right now," Case said, "we're at the break-even point." According to Case, when the SCC approved its party, the house social chairmen who make up the committee pledged $50 each to defray the costs of the party.

Social chairmen at the meeting have disagreed about the exact financial arrangement reached.

Last week only four houses had committed funds. Eventually ten did, but Case and the SCC may yet end up with a deficit.

The SCC's party was popular: security guards forced organizers to close the doors after 11 p.m. "We had to send people over to Greylock," Case recalls. Not everyone left; Case claims some evaded the guards at the entrance. "They forged stamps and sneaked through windows," he said.

In retrospect, Case questioned the function of the SCC, acknowledging its worth but doubting its power. "If the house social chairmen don't have the power to contribute $50 for a party," he stressed, "it's kind of ridiculous, because that makes the SCC relatively powerless."

No advocacy?

To the editor:

I recently read the "Williams Guide to Health and Sex." It was good to see so much information clearly presented. However, I was disappointed that two issues, abortion and homosexuality, were treated in a way that contradicted the aim of this booklet to be, "straight forward and in no way to advocate any particular course of action."

One paragraph is given to "If you decide to continue your pregnancy . . ." Four and a half pages are given to abortion information. To at least appear objective the writers could have used the words fetus / baby and terminate your pregnancy / kill your unborn child, interchangeably throughout the four and a half pages.

Alas, though the writers gave information on the Supreme Court decision they avoided the side of the abortion issue that asks "when in pregnancy does a fetus become a baby?"

Finally, though the various types of abortions available were described, as were the "usual" effects on the woman; nowhere did they explain how each method affected the fetus / baby.

In the sexual preference section the writers started by mentioning the Gay organization on campus and went on to "explain" justify? homosexuality, except again for one paragraph, the last one. A sexual preference summary written primarily about homosexuality is at the very least advocating wholehearted acceptance of homosexual practices if not experimentation.

Either the contents, or the preface claim of being written "straightforward and in no way to advocate any particular course of action" needs to be changed.

Banner missing

To the editor:

Last week sometime after the opening ceremony of Winter Carnival, some immature and inconsiderate person "borrowed" the purple cow emblazoned Winter Carnival banner, which is pictured in a photo in last Tuesday's Record. This banner took a great deal of time and effort to produce and is not only a lasting memento of Carnival '78 but can also be used again and as such is a public possession of the Williams Community. So, I would encourage the person who knows of the banner's whereabouts to return it or inform Paul Alexander, 1978 Winter Carnival Chairman.

Women faculty discuss their status on campus

This is the second article in a two-part series looking at the women faculty at Williams.

by Peter Hirsch

The problems faced by women faculty at Williams have been with the College for a long time, although the events of last semester, the library incident in particular, acted as a catalyst to focus attention on them. Moreover, awareness of the problems does not end at the borders of the campus.

"When I was being considered for a job here," said Professor Brooke Larson, "I was told by many people that it was a very white, male place and that it hadn't changed very much."

Feelings such as these have contributed to a higher attrition rate of women faculty here compared to the faculty as a whole and are undoubtedly making it more difficult for Williams to hire talented women scholars. The situation has generated enough concern among women faculty and the administration that both are working to find solutions to the problems they see.

Women faculty are working to improve conditions here through the auspices of Committee W. Committee W is an offshoot of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), a professional organization for college teachers, and was set up to deal with the problems of women and minorities in academia. A statement prepared by Assistant Dean Nancy MacIntyre and Ms. Sarah McFarland, who co-chair the Committee, says that it "acts as a lobbying group ... to bring to the attention of the administration problems that affect women and minorities and to exert pressure to correct discriminatory practices." It is very loosely allied with the Williams Feminist Alliance (formerly Williams Women).

The Committee is presently pressing the administration to bring more women to Williams at both the junior and senior faculty levels, although the question of senior appointments has been a sticky one within the group. Some of the junior faculty on the committee do not feel that the advantage of immediately increasing the number of senior women here is worth the risk to their own chances of getting tenure.

The administration, for its part, is reluctant to make senior appointments of any kind, preferring instead to "tenure through the ranks;" that is, appoint the College's own junior faculty to senior slots. In the last ten years, it has made only eight senior appointments, including one black and one woman, although another woman was offered one of the positions and turned it down, according to Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley. The rejected offer raises the additional problem that senior women are difficult to attract here. For one thing, women eligible for senior appointments would have come out of graduate school at a time when the number of women relative to men getting advanced degrees was considerably lower than it is today. In other words, it is more difficult to locate senior women available for appointment. In addition, there is the problem of what the spouse would do in an economically depressed area such as the Northern Berkshires.

Committee members who favor making senior appointments point out that with the present attrition rate of women faculty and the length of times it takes for a professor to go through the "tenure pipeline," there will not be a significant number of senior women here for "20 or 30 years."

But whether they are senior or not,

Percentages of Women Faculty in Other Schools

	% age overall	Wage with tenure
Williams	14.6	7.8
Amherst	11.5	1.3
Wesleyan	14.5	8.8
Bowdoin	7.4	0
Middlebury	10.2	0
Swarthmore	19.0	11.6
Harvard-Radcliffe	8.5	5.2
Princeton	10.1	1.7

members of the Committee do agree that the College ought to pursue a strong and aggressive affirmative action program to bring more women to the faculty. To that end, they have been lobbying the administration to appoint a new administrator as affirmative action officer. At present, Oakley holds that position for the faculty as a part of his duties as Dean of the Faculty.

Committee W finds this arrangement dissatisfactory for essentially two reasons. First, the many other duties of administrators here limit the amount of time that they can give to affirmative action problems. The same is true for department chairmen who are responsible for hiring. A separate affirmative action officer could spend more time locating qualified women and minority candidates and help departments and the administration to attract them here, the Committee feels.

Second, since many of the women faculty here are junior faculty, they say they feel awkward talking over affirmative action matters with Oakley, who sits on the CAP and hence will be involved in their tenure decisions.

President Chandler has been meeting individually with a number of women faculty on this and other issues recently and will be meeting more formally with representatives from Committee W at the end of this month. He says that he is "strongly leaning toward" making the appointment, but that an official decision will not be announced until around spring break.

Some question still remains about what the duties and role of the officer might be, according to Chandler. He said that some members of the faculty had expressed concern to him that an affirmative action officer might interfere with faculty-administration relations and also that she (the officer would most likely be a woman, Chandler said) might infringe upon departmental autonomy in hiring. The question of how much power the affirmative action officer would have is awaiting further discussion.

In addition, the President said, affirmative action duties would not by themselves justify a full time position and thus something would have to be found for the person to do with the rest of her time. One possibility he suggested was the creation of a "government relations officer" who would be in charge not only of affirmative action, but of handling all of the College's increasingly intricate dealings with the government. "We could use some help in that area," he said.

So far, the College has been successful in meeting its affirmative action hiring goals for women, which are set slightly in excess of the relative Ph.D. production by women in fields taught at Williams. That figure was roughly 21 per cent in 1977. The school has done well in hiring women in comparison to many, though not all, similar liberal arts schools. (See table.)

Still, the College has far to go before it will achieve any significant parity of male and female faculty.

Women faculty say, finally, that they would like to see some "consciousness raising" at Williams about the problems that women face here. There are indications that this is already occurring, largely as a result of the fallout from the library incident. After the letter criticizing the administration's handling of the incident was published in the Record, Dean Berek called the signatories individually into his office, a move many women considered to be unnecessary, but which Berek intended as a very low key effort to improve contact with colleagues and friends." (Only one of the women who signed the letter to the Record spoke with Berek before it was published. That and the "disturbing rhetoric" led two of its signatories to apologize to Berek afterwards. Most women, however, still feel that the administration should have immediately condemned the incident, publicly and could have done so in a way that did not jeopardize the disciplinary proceedings.)

In any case, Berek said that as a result, he has "realized that there are men and women, mainly localized among the women, who don't feel included ... One of the points of making contact with the people who signed the letter was to include them more."

Oakley said that since this fall, he has become "more conscious of the intensity of feeling (among women faculty members)." Moreover, Chandler says he hopes that an affirmative action officer could "look at internal conditions at Williams and find out why women are leaving and possibly help remedy the situation."

The administration is bothered by the discontent it has found and is looking for solutions. "I need advice," said Oakley. "I'm open to any new ideas about it. It's worrying."

Whether the same is true of the faculty in general and of the students is hard to say. Many women, including some who said that in general they were very content with being a woman here, were surprised by how little sympathy their reaction to the library incident met with among many students. Said Assistant Professor Sherrill Knopp, "I haven't talked to one faculty member who's said 'I don't see anything wrong with the library incident,' but I've heard that from a lot of students."

She also said that although she did not feel that her alarm at the incident was a "feminist" action, it was largely interpreted that way. "Feminist is almost a dirty word (here). People get labelled with it for things that are not really relevant. Protesting the library incident was not a feminist action; it was an action based on a belief in human dignity."

Added Assistant Professor Gail Peek, "I don't think people understood the outrage women felt, just how demeaning it was. (It makes) you wonder what type of society exists where people think that is fun. It [illegible]."

Both Knopp and Peek believe in general, however, that Williams is a very good place to teach, so professors who are generally satisfied here are disturbed occasionally by some of the things that they see.

Among the women who feel least at home here, the feeling is less one of disgust than of frustration. "Williams could be a lot better place than it is," said Associate Professor Linda Bundtzen. "My complaint is not that it's a terrible, sexist place, but that it could be better."

Partly as a result of the library incident, women faculty and administrators are now getting around to asking the question, "How?"

Photographs of Pfizer Lime, Inc.

by Jay Richard Hill Gass

"Lime is chalky; when you work in a lime factory it's always like winter. Lime covers everything. It's funny; though it looks like snow it's not cold."—Pfizer Lime employee

Over the course of five months Jeffrey Murray, '79, recorded his impressions of Pfizer Lime Inc. in Adams Massachusetts. His photographs are now on exhibition in Gallery Nine at the Williams College Museum of Art. Densely packed with information, the photographs are the culmination of a close association with the lime company.

For the first few weeks of his conjointment with Pfizer, Murray was shown about the plant by various employees, donning a hard hat and ear protection gear when necessary, in an attempt to gain an insight into the operation of the plant and the confidence of the company's workers. He hoped to photograph in the plant in as unobtrusive a manner as possible.

Much to his credit, Murray succeeded. The shots of the Pfizer employees are intimate portrayals of their working situations. The straightforward manner of these photographs is disarming. One is pressed into the world of Pfizer Lime with a shove.

The major portion of the exhibition concentrates not on the employees themselves, but on their accouterments—the wondrous forms to be found in industrial machinery and in the phantasmagorical landscape of the factory landscape. Murray has said that he sought not to produce a documentary series of "life and work at Pfizer," but to use the site as a focal point for exploring the possibilities of the medium of photography.

To this end he has included a number of studies of the Pfizer plant in its environment, photographing the building under varied lighting conditions. In much the same way as Monet's studies of the cathedral at Rouen are an examination of the quality of light on texture and an exploration of the painter's medium, Murray's stills of the factory skyline speak about the nature of the photographic medium, and of its capabilities to function as pure photography. Documentation of the site is secondary to an interest in establishing an expressive communication about the nature of light as perceived by the camera and conveyed by the print.

Yet in as far as Murray retains an academic approach to photography, one cannot overlook the documentary aspect of the exhibition. Over and over again one sees the massive forms—stacks of lime bags, heavy-duty machinery, block-like buildings, etc.—that comprise the Pfizer landscape. It is a limited vocabulary of forms but one with which Murray is able to impart the thunder of the Pfizer plant. His photograph of a man walking between two enormous stacks of packaged lime conveys not only the conditions of the factory, but the insignificance of a single man's strength in the face of modern technology; it is a frightening scene to bear witness to.

Perhaps most striking about Murray's photographs is the technical expertise he has brought to each print.

The employment of Ansel Adams' zone system—a complex theory relating luminance to exposure—has given a vibrance to Murray's work. Though not consistently in command of Adams' technique, when he is, the results are staggering. His photograph of the Pfizer plant at night, the security lights shining through the rising lime dust, recalls Adams' 1941 Moonrise in both composition and sentiment.

Photos by Jeff Murray whose show on Industrial Adams is currently in Gallery Nine of the Williams College Museum of Art.

The only flaw with the present group of photographs is the inclusion of shots lifted from the work of other photographers. Whereas Walker's attention to the details of Southern life provided insight into rural existence, Murray's close examination of trucks and doors add little to our understanding of the Pfizer environment; they are too obviously derived from "Aperature" reproductions.

It is a difficult leap to go from artistic imitation to creative innovation, yet in the work of Jeffrey Murray we are able to see just that. He appears to us, in his photographs of Pfizer, to be in the process of just such a leap. Murray is a young artist who is quickly defining an articulate style of his own.

Chorus to perform 'Grand Mass'

The Williams College Choral Society will perform Mozart's Grand Mass in C Minor, K-V. 427, in its major Spring concert, at 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, March 4, in Thompson Memorial Chapel, Williamstown. Admission is free with Williams I.D.

Sixty men and women and conductor Kenneth Roberts, of Williams College, have invited a Festival Orchestra of thirty musicians from Boston and soloists Benita Valente, soprano; Jane Bucci, soprano; Jon Humphrey, tenor; and Terry Dwyer, baritone, to join them in this major work.

Mozart, composing in the years 1782-3, never truly completed his Mass, although it is far more extensive in conception than any other Mozart work of a similar type, calling in places for a five-part, or even an eight-part chorus. Unusually sweet and tenderly nostalgic, Mozart wrote this work to fulfill his vow to write a Mass for a performance by his wife, Constanze, in Salzburg. Such adjectives as "majestic," "solemn," "dazzling," "moving," and "exquisite" abound in the literature about the Mass.

Benita Valente won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions in the early 1960's and since then has enjoyed an impressively successful career. The Williamstown audience will have known her from her appearances at Tanglewood, Marlboro, Saratoga, and the Boston Symphony. In addition, she has opened Lincoln Center's Mostly Mozart Festival for two successive seasons, and is a frequent soloist at Caramoor and Aspen as well as with major symphony orchestras across the nation. Her performances at the Metropolitan Opera are consistently met with universal praise. Her song recordings on the Columbia label are accompanied by Rudolf Serkin, also well known to local music-lovers.

Of a recent appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Claudio Abbado at Carnegie Hall, the New York Times critic Donal Henahan wrote of Miss Valente's "beautifully simple and simply beautiful singing of the "Et incarnatus est" from (the Mozart Mass) ... she voiced the extroverted, bravura manner that most sopranos favor who can negotiate the notes at all, and spun the piece out in roulades of pure, gentle and unforced tone ..." The New York Post last month reported that "Miss Valente was able to surmount even the most relentless high register with ease."

The three other soloists for this concert are all well known to concert-goers in this area. All three, Ms. Bucci, Mr. Humphrey, and Mr. Dwyer, have appeared at Williams College in earlier performances.

Soprano Benita Valente is one of the soloists in the upcoming Grand Mass (Mozart) to be performed March 4 by the Choral Society.

Alums maintain school ties

by Stacy Silverstein

Williams may be isolated in its secluded Berkshire niche, but it hasn't been forgotten. Lifelines of alumni communication tie the campus to members of a nationwide Williams community. The importance of such a strong Alumni Society reveals itself to students when they begin to plan for life after Williamstown.

In almost all major cities, alumni are available for student needs, particularly in conjunction with the Office of Career Counseling. A Contact Network of alumni career representatives extends across the country for the benefit of Williams people spending time in an unfamiliar area. Peggy Sloane, Director of the OCC, stressed that they are "willing to help and genuinely interested in the students."

In the past, students have gained valuable exposure to fields of interest by meeting with alumni. OCC will help organize a "99" Winter Study externship in which undergraduates may learn from on-the-job observations. Externships may also be arranged for the summer.

Alumni career counseling and exposure also takes place throughout the year on campus. Every January, a group of recent graduates visit the College to discuss their experiences. The OCC sponsors Washington Weekend in February. This year, twenty alumni came to report on opportunities that await politically-oriented students, especially seniors.

Alumni recruiting from various businesses make an important contribution to job-seeking seniors. They often notify the OCC of openings for positions in their companies and interview eligible students, and welcome visiting students. Sloane and an alumnus organized a trip to Boston last spring for those interested in city planning and environmental research.

Behind these alumni functions benefitting the student, the framework of the organization provides a unifying strength. Cragin Lewis '41, Secretary of the Alumni Society, claims that the most distinguishing quality about the Society is that "they want very much to help the College and the undergraduates." The last fund drive, he continued, yielded an unmatched percentage of participation, over 60 per cent, which "says something about how graduates feel about the place."

Besides the career aid that they provide, alumni play a major part in College policy making. In this area, disputes between the Alumni Society and the Board of Trustees remain at a remarkably low level. Since alumni fill all but two spots on the Board, "they are not two separate groups but two interlocking groups," according to Lewis. No serious divisions within the Society have occurred since alumni with financial interest in fraternities tried to fight for their perpetuation.

Recently, the Alumni Society has refused to take stands on controversial issues. Concerning the questions of sexism and the sexual orientation clause, they have left the policy decision to on-campus administrators. Trustee decisions are usually reflective of Alumni Society opinions.

Dodd-Tyler: camaraderie as well as diversity

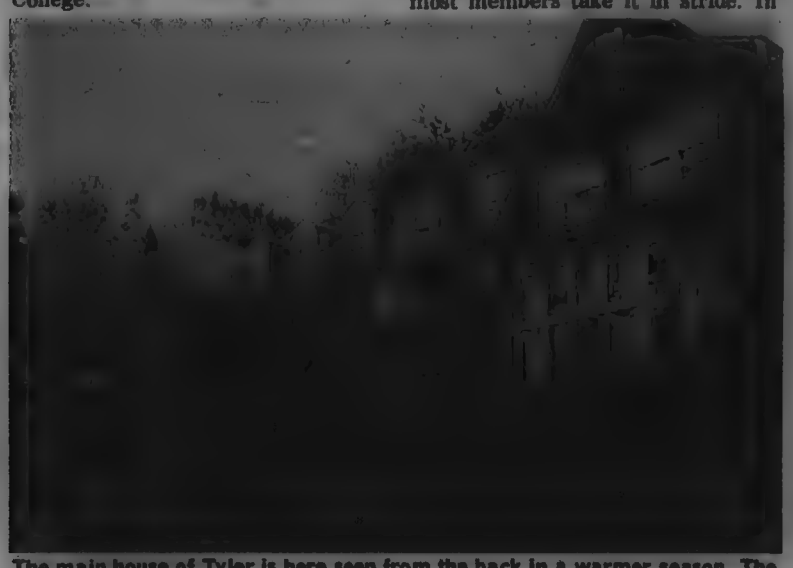
by Douglas Ellis

The Dodd-Tyler housing group was formed last year as an attempt to reduce the major disparities within the old housing categories by removing the incongruous houses from Frosh-Prospect-Dodd group and the row houses. These two houses have many similarities in spite of their different origins. Both are basically row houses in that they have bedroom liners, fireplaces and functional common areas, and consist almost exclusively of single rooms.

One of the biggest pluses of Dodd-Tyler is the dining situation. Despite Ross Keller's attempts to sabotage Row House dining, excellent fare can still be found here. Chefs Peter Brazeau of Dodd and John Raby of Tyler both do outstanding jobs and house members have developed fierce loyalties to them.

But unlike the row houses, all members of Dodd or Tyler live in the house of an immediately adjacent building; there is no overflow to West College.

There is some difference between Dodd and Tyler end. Tyler was one of the old Frat Houses, but had a modern brick Annex added to it a few years ago. Most sophomores live in the Annex, which consists entirely of single rooms with a bathroom shared between each pair of bedrooms. The rooms are small, though larger than any Mission Park or Greylock room) and, with cinder-block walls, require a good bit of imagination to decorate. Due to thin walls, noise can be a problem.



In Tyler proper, the rooms are more elaborate. They feature hardwood floors, white plasterboard or barn-wood walls, and in many cases, fireplaces. In both Tyler and the Annex, the rooms with the view of the mountains are preferred.

Many freshmen question the desirability of living in Tyler due to its relative isolation from the rest of campus. True, it is a good 5-10 minute walk to get to class or to Baxter, but most members take it in stride. In fact, many of them actually prefer what they have. "Sure, we're isolated," said one Tyler member, "but I really like it this way. We don't get the Rt. 2 or Rt. 7 noise; and it's nice to have a private place to retreat to." The proximity of Mission Park and the popularity of Tyler parties are ways of keeping in contact with the rest of the campus.

Dodd House is truly in a category all its own. The Treadway Williams Inn until 1974, it was taken over by the College to satisfy its growing housing needs. Consequently, it is a hotel masquerading as a college dormitory. Most of the surrounding satellites of Dodd (the "outhouses")—Hubble, Parsons, Sewall, and the Annex (Goodrich will be used for Co-op housing next year)—were at some point part of the Inn, and the rooms in all but the Annex are of comparable quality. All but eight of the approximately 100 rooms are singles, most with private bathrooms, wallpaper, and carpeting. Despite having many excellent rooms in the house, Dodd doubles and Annex rooms are highly undesirable. Sophomore year is inevitably spent in a small room, but most find it to be worth the wait.

The huge living room and other common rooms provide a very comfortable, homey atmosphere, and are available for the massive Dodd house parties. Dodd is also the site of the Student Art Gallery, lending a touch of culture to the house. The physical facilities are unmatched by any other house, but Dodd members prefer to stress the size and diversity. While Dodd's membership will reach 120 next year, highest campus members feel sure it will maintain its big "family" feeling.

Dodd's President Mike Golden summed this feeling up when he said that "the single most important element in a student's tenure at Williams is probably the living situation. It determines a student's outlook on his education and emotional development. The friendliness of the Dodd House affiliates encourages a good college experience as the camaraderie and diversity in the house have become, in a word, the essence of Dodd."

The main house of Tyler is here seen from the back in a warmer season. The annex is to the left.

success of the guide," he said. "It is the house collection system." The individuals who collect the questionnaires must have "enthusiasm."

The Council overwhelmingly voted in favor of Toumey's proposal that the Course Guide become an independent organization and sever its connection with the College Council. This move is necessary, Toumey explained, because in the past "we depended too much on the Council to get things going each fall."

Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly presented the Council with a $1,200 Student Activities Tax allocation for a proposed wood-working shop on campus. Kelly said the total cost of the shop would be nearly $2,000. The SCC announced a poll to determine student interest in the project.

At last week's Council meeting several representatives criticized the Social Coordinating Committee's Beaumont dance. They disliked the manner in which the SCC arranged for the dance and, in fact, questioned the SCC's right to schedule such an event at all. Joel Smith responded to the controversy at the meeting.

Women outhoop Trinity

The Williams women's basketball team closed out its home season Wednesday afternoon, smashing Trinity College 86-26. The top-billed contest was the final home match for four Williams seniors, including four-year teammates Anne Youngling, Maggie O'Brien, Lisa Capaldini, and Leslie Ferguson. Co-captains Youngling and O'Brien and forward Capaldini finished out their four year Williams careers as they led the team to the strong victory over Trinity. Earlier this week the threesome provided the scoring power needed to capture the first Little Three Women's Basketball Championship as the team defeated Amherst College [illegible]

Against Trinity, the Ephwomen moved to a seven point lead before a dozen missed baskets and lucky Trinity shots narrowed the gap to one point. Midway through the first half Williams led 9-8 when Youngling turned it on—grabbing rebounds, sinking foul shots, and connecting on the lay-ups to put Williams up 15-9. Youngling, who led team scoring with 14 points, provided the much needed inspiration as Williams pulled out to a 17-13 half time lead.

The second stanza saw Youngling, [illegible] and junior Leslie Milne hold the visitors scoreless for eight minutes as they ran the score to a 20 point lead. Freshmen Laurene Von Klan and Mary Kate Shea, in limited play, were on the mark for Williams going for 7 and 6 points each. Frosh Boop Tabell, Alex Pagon, and Cathy Gernert each had two points as they kept the momentum going for Williams late in the half. Sophomore Jeanne Weeks (2 pts.) came in one defense for Williams, along with Ferguson (2 pts.), holding Trinity to 13 second half points. Sue Wright exemplified the team's rebounding skill as the Ephwomen outrebounded their opponents 47-19.

The Williams squad, looking for an invitation to the Massachusetts Women's Basketball tournament, tackle MIT Saturday in Boston in the first to two final away matches.

RPI comeback stuns Ephs

by Frank Pergolizzi

In a performance that can at best be labelled disappointing, the Williams basketball team was unable to hold a thirteen point half-time lead and lost to R.P.I., 68-60.

The Ephmen came out of the locker room at half-time leading 41-28. Bill Mansell got his teammates rolling with three quick baskets to start the half. The Engineers went into a full court man press in an attempt to force Williams into turnovers. Initially Williams was able to break the press, but as the score got closer the Williams offense disentegrated.

R.P.I., asserting their height advantage, were blocking nearly every shot the Ephmen attempted, and converting many of the blocked shots into easy, fast-break layups. With Williams leading 51-44, Bill Schwitter connected on a three point play that started the Engineers on a fourteen point spurt that pushed them ahead, 58-51.

In a year that has been filled with close, last minute losses, Williams lacked the confidence to comeback. For all intents and purposes, when Mike Chapman put R.P.I. ahead with a layup, the game was over. With many fans at the Plimpton lecture, the Ephmen just could not stop the Engineer's momentum

The Ephmen scored the first six points of the game. Williams led by as much as eighteen (30-12), running a patient offense, taking good shots, and hitting them (56 per cent in the first half). When the second half started, however, there was a different team in the white uniforms.

Dave Mehalick and Steve Duma led R.P.I. with fourteen points apiece, while Mansell had ten. Gerry Kelly led Williams with fourteen, followed by Andy Straka with twelve, and Brad Wolk with ten.

Williams is now 6-11 and loses any chance of finishing above .55 on the season. They have a big weekend coming up with three road games in four days: Kings Point on Friday, Drew University on Saturday, and Worcester Polytech on Monday.

Pucksters loss to Hamilton places team in dire straits

by Mark Pogue

Now is the time for all good Williams hockey fans to come to the aid of their team. Don't step on cracks. Avoid black cats. Pray. The Hamilton Continentals dealt the Purple Brothers a painful 9-5 Division II defeat in Clinton, N.Y. last Tuesday night, and it has put the Ephs' noble quest for gaining the post-season playoffs in desperate straits.

The top eight teams in Division II's Western Conference will make the playoffs. Williams, with division matches against UMass and formidable Merrimack left, is presently crouching in 10th place with a 6-9 division record. Buffalo State rests in ninth at 9-10. UMass, with games against Williams, No. Adams, and Salem State left, occupies the coveted eighth-place slot with an 8-8-1 mark. Is there any way for the Ephs to squeeze into the playoffs?

It is possible—barely. It seems certain that Buffalo will win its one remaining game against Union. Williams can finish at 8-9 by winning its last two and, assuming UMass succumbs to 17-4 Salem, can submerge the Massmen to a final 9-10-1 mark at best.

"Qualification for Division II and III playoffs is not based solely on division records," says Dave Hartford of the ECAC. "We take into account the number of games, strength of opponents, and other factors. If Williams beats Merrimack, things could get interesting."

Williams ran into a juggernaut in the Hamilton game. The Continentals, in the course of pummeling Purple goalie Mike Moulton with 58 shots, edged out to a 5-3 lead after two periods, let Williams come up to 6-5, then poured it on in the back half of the last stanza with four fast goals. "I should have had a few of those that got through," said Moulton. "But our defensive coverage did get pretty weak at times. A lot of us weren't feeling well—you should have heard the hacking while the coach was trying to talk in the locker room between periods."

In the Continental game the ephs were led by Peter Gonye, who registered a hat trick to raise his team-leading goal count to 15; Tom Resor, who picked up two assists to raise his team-leading assist total to 26; and Dan Sullivan, whose five assists raised his season point total to 29. Moulton's 47 saves gives him 229 on the season and moves his save percentage to 88.4.

Faceoff for tonight's crucial game at UMass is at 8:00. If you love your hockey Ephmen, say a little prayer.

Div. III Easterns

Track garners top ten status

by Phil Darrow

Last Saturday at Southern Connecticut the Williams winter trackmen competed in the Division III Easterns and came away with top ten status in the 27 team field. All seven who qualified and who were able to perform matched or exceeded their best performances of the season in the peak event. Four also qualified for the more prestigious New Englands this weekend at Harvard, though injuries could cut the contingent in half.

In the field events, a best effort meant a new school record for Larry Tanner in the 35 lb. weight throw, as he tossed the brass 57'3". This attempt garnered a fifth place for Tanner, and outdistanced the old record by over 1½ feet. Tanner travels to Harvard tonight to prepare for the biggest cannons in the east competing tomorrow.

The other two performers in the field events were Greg McAleenan, who grabbed another tough fifth with a leap of 21'6", and frosh Scott Mayfield, who missed a chance of placing in the pole vault after clearing 13'6" and having his pole knock the bar down. Both closed the season by matching their personal bests for the year.

Injuries and sickness pared the running squad drastically. Miler Tom Schreck succumbed to the flu and could not make the trip, and hurdler Vernon Davis was held back by a sore leg. Even more frustrating was the experience of captain and ace hurdler Ron White, who made the trip and easily beat his opponents in the trials but was unable to finish because of a pull in his right leg. White and Davis both have already qualified for the New England meet, but whether they will be able to compete remains doubtful.

In the distances, Williams looked excellent in spite of being hampered by competing in the unseeded heats. Two-miler Joe Kolb finished the season with a victory in his heat and a year best of 9:25—doubly impressive considering the absence of the seeded heat's faster pace setters. In the mile, Phil Darrow and Dan Sullivan went 1-2 in their heat, and actually placed 5-7 overall despite there being nine "faster" runners in the seeded heat. Darrow's time of 4:16.2 enables him to advance to the New Englands, while Sullivan finished with a 4:20.9, just off his best.

In the final event, a two-mile relay, Williams grabbed a third. The squad sorely missed Schreck, but Joe Kolb came back for a brilliant substitute performance in the second leg after getting the hand-off from Terry O'Reilly. Sullivan and Darrow also returned for the third and fourth legs, bringing the stick home in 8:04.1 for a season best.

The individual strengths displayed at the Easterns demonstrated that Williams will be a tough customer in the outdoor season, when the solid core from the indoor squad is augmented by new blood.

Racketmen beat Tufts

by Evan Bash

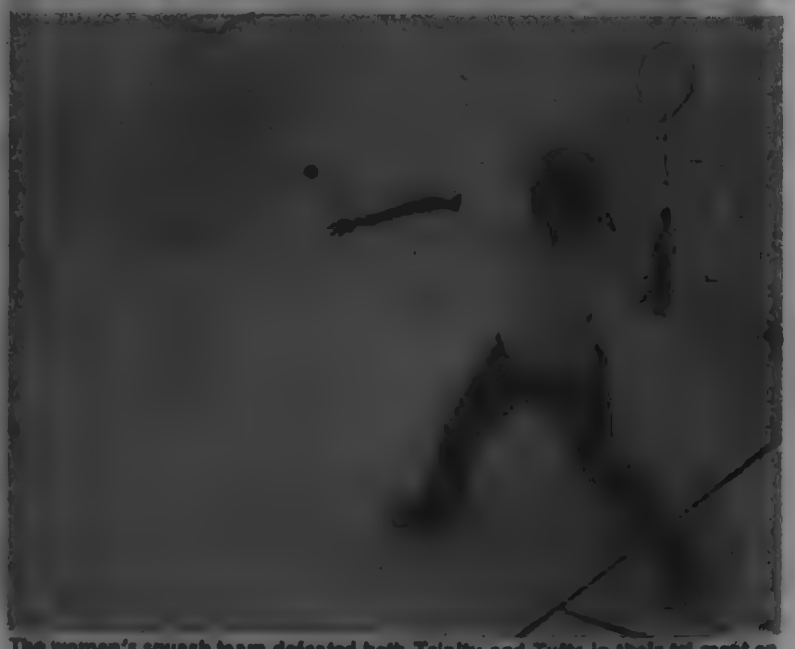
Usually, when a squash team expects to win a match 9-0 and then proceeds to do so, there is perishingly little for it to remark upon the next day. And such certainly would have been the case for coach Sean Sloane's racketmen in Monday's shutout of Tufts at Amherst, had it not been for an Amherst student newspaper article the Ephs managed to secure at the site of the match.

The article extravagantly lauded the Amherst squash team, and, since Williams meets the Lord Jeffs Saturday in a match that will decide the Little Three championship, its contents interested the Ephs. Amherst, it seems, has recently scored upset wins over Trinity and Dartmouth while riding the crest of an eight match winning streak. Several Williams' team members feel these facts may make Amherst believe they have a chance to beat the defending Little Three champ Ephs. These members also seem to feel insulted that Amherst would believe such a thing, all of which should make for a pretty exciting season ending match. The action (and there'll be plenty of it) starts at 2:00 p.m. Saturday in the Lasell courts.

Williams' easy win over Tufts was played at Amherst because the original meeting between the two teams had been snowed out and Tufts had played a regularly scheduled match against the Jeffs earlier Monday afternoon. (For comparative score freaks, the result of that match was Amherst 8, Tufts 1). It was the Ephs fourth win in a row and ups their season record to 7-3.

No one lost a game for Williams, and the Tufts players only occasionally managed to crack into double figures in any one game. Jim Parsons and Jim Little breezed to wins, while Martin Goldberg swept to his twentieth win in the last twenty-one matches. Also scoring notable victories were Peter Thomsen at no. eight (moved up from no. ten) and David Simpson at no. nine, as he scored his first varsity triumph ever.

Raquettes defeat Tufts



The Williams Women's Varsity squash team defeated the Trinity College players 4-3, and topped Tufts University 7-0 in a tri-meet Wednesday afternoon.

In the first match against Tufts, the women conceded only three games out of a total of twenty-three. All five of the top players won easily 3-0, but numbers six and seven, Kristen Johanson and Laura Katz, had a bit more trouble. Katz lost the opening game before going on to win the next three. Johanson, after winning the first two games and losing the third and fourth, took the fifth game in a close 17-16 tie-breaker, clinching the 7-0 win for Williams.

Trinity competition was much keener, as is apparent in the fact that only one match, which was played by Number five Marcia Johnston, was won in three games. Two of the remaining three wins took four games, and the fourth went all the way to five games.

Jane Garvey overcame her Trinity opponent 15-10, 17-14, 15-9, but only after losing the first game 8-15. Playing at Number four, Mary Tom Higgs proceeded along similar lines with a 3-1 win. Laura Carson won the deciding game of her five game match 15-7, to add a fourth and necessary win on the score board for Williams. Wiel Carson won 15-9, 8-15, 15-13, 11-15, 15-7 at Number two, Number one Beckie Chase fought through close match but lost to a tough Trinity competitor in four games. Also bowing to Trinity were Katz, winning only one game, and Johanson.

Williams' victories over Tufts, and Trinity, proved its strength.

The women's squash team defeated both Trinity and Tufts in their tri-meet on Wednesday.

Group investigates divestiture

by Jeff Kovar

As the issue of divestiture of the College's stock holdings in corporations with investments in South Africa heats up, the Thursday Night Coalition has set up a subcommittee to coordinate activities aimed at educating the college community to what Steve Horton '78, calls "the facts of racism in South Africa."

Horton heads the investments subcommittee, which consists of about twenty members, including Raymond Baker, associate professor of political science. The group intends to formulate plans of action for the upcoming months.

The first event planned is a panel discussion tomorrow night, jointly sponsored by the Black Student Union and Phi Beta Kappa, entitled, "Williams and South Africa: What's the Connection? The Case for Divestiture." The panel includes students and faculty members and will begin at 8 pm in the Dodd House Living Room.

The immediate goal of the subcommittee on divestiture, according to Horton, is to prepare the campus to take a stand on the issues involving apartheid in South Africa, and Williams' role in supporting the country's white minority regime with College-owned stocks.

The subcommittee, and the Thursday Night Coalition, have worked closely with the Black Student Union on the issue. In January, the Board of Trustees was presented with signed petitions and proposals for a plan of divestiture. According to Horton, this was the first time that the Trustees had ever been presented with a moral side to the issue of investment practices. Before, the issue had seemed strictly economic.

The stance of the Trustees on the issue demonstrates that "Williams is light-years behind other institutions," stated Horton. Across the nation, state universities such as the University of Wisconsin and Ohio University have completely divested their portfolios of stocks in companies with South African holdings, he said.

The movement has been weaker in private colleges, holding larger endowments, the schools offer more resistance, owing to the greater loss involved. Antioch College and Harvard University, though, have lately taken some steps towards divestiture.

Coordinating its efforts with the Thursday Night Coalition subcommittee is a faculty group formed around the same issue. Headed by Prof. Baker, it serves as a vehicle for putting more direct pressure on faculty members and the Administration.

Horton stated that there would be additional activities this Spring designed to accommodate all interested persons. The list includes writing letters to congressmen, manning tables at a rally, and making phone calls, with a very strong possibility of a mass demonstration on campus.

Horton explained that there is a feeling of frustration among many people active in the fight for divestiture, having exhausted all possible channels with the Trustees and the Administration. "You can count on action," he said, "when IBM comes to Williams for its recruiting presentation." Previously planned activities against IBM had been called off when company representatives were unable to get to Williams during the recent blizzard.

A crew held a 24-hour Ergathon from Saturday to Sunday noon to help sponsor the spring break training trip to Washington.

So. African exile speaks at College

Exiled political activist Sipho Buthelezi addressed some 50 students and faculty Saturday on his view of the "black liberation struggle" in South Africa, one in a continuing series of speakers and movies the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) is using to raise campus consciousness on problems in South Africa.

Buthelezi is former general secretary of the Black People's Convention, an organization he characterized as "dedicated to liberating the black oppressed." He was forced to leave South Africa in 1974 for his political activities after being banned.

The exile opened his lecture with the "history of struggle" by black South Africans, from the arrival of the Dutch in 1692 to the present. He split the history into three phases: wars of resistance against colonizers, non-violent "protest struggle" from the founding of the Union of South Africa to the 1960 Sharpeville riots and "wars of liberation" since then, as the South African government has increased restrictions.

"Armed struggle is a high form of political struggle," Buthelezi argued. He claimed Africans are fighting for political rights, not material gain: "People take up arms in order to secure and guarantee political objectives."

Buthelezi admitted that economic sanctions might not crush apartheid, but said it could push "the seemingly impenetrable force of Afrikanerdom into negotiation."

"In the end, they will lose everything," Buthelezi declared about multinational corporations doing business in South Africa, incited by current large profits. He added that Africans are fighting to be free "from imperialist nations, namely the United States," as well as from apartheid.

Ben Blakeney '78, a coordinator of the WBSU series, declared that the program's momentum "is picking up rapidly." "We're developing a solid core of people," he said.

A panel discussion tomorrow at 7 p.m. will be a "key component" in the series' attempt to inform the College community on the issues of South Africa.

Afro-Am studies offers "Renaissance"

by Lisa Hartigan

Associate Professor of English Melvin Dixon will teach a seminar on the "Harlem Renaissance" beginning next fall. The course will be part of the curriculum of both the English and Afro-American Studies departments, and will highlight the literary, artistic and musical revival of Harlem in the 1920's and 1930's.

Dixon's course deals with a period that saw the emergence of Harlem as a black community, as Southern blacks moved northward to pursue better job opportunities and to escape "Jim Crow" prejudice. The cultural opportunities offered by New York's fine arts institutions, literary establishments and night life provided the setting for the growth of a "Harlem Renaissance," according to Dixon. This cultural phenomenon is distinguished in the work of authors such as Richard Wright and Langston Hughes and jazz singer Bessie Smith.

In addition to cultural achievements, the course will document the beginnings of a racial spirit during the period that formed the beginnings of the black consciousness movement, according to Dixon. Dixon expects to limit enrollment in the course to a select group of 12 students with "an intense interest" in Afro-American studies. Each student will be responsible for a research project, designed to concentrate on some aspect of the Harlem Renaissance applicable to the student's other studies. Dixon also plans a trip to Harlem to visit institutions that have preserved material from the 1920's and 1930's, including the Studio Museum of Harlem. Dixon expressed concern over the lack of interest shown on the Williams campus towards Afro-American studies in general. He claimed that courses in this department provide an element missing from many courses at Williams, and serve to reshape attitudes toward black culture by providing an "unavailable perspective." He denies that Afro-American studies courses are not academically viable, and that they are difficult for non-whites to come to terms with, two attitudes which he has found prevalent here. According to Dixon, the courses can provide an "element of understanding" that becomes necessary once students leave the academic environment.

Rebbitzen roots Jews

Rebbitzen (the title given to the wife of a rabbi) Esther Jungreis, a prominent Jewish spokeswoman, will give a talk in Driscoll Lounge, Wednesday, at 7:30.

Mrs. Jungreis is the founder of a Jewish revivalist movement called "Hineni." The movement claims a following of 17,000 with offices in Israel, Los Angeles, Miami, and Brooklyn. She has twice filled New York's Madison Square Garden and has appeared on many television talk shows

A survivor of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, Jungreis fled to Switzerland and later, to the U.S.

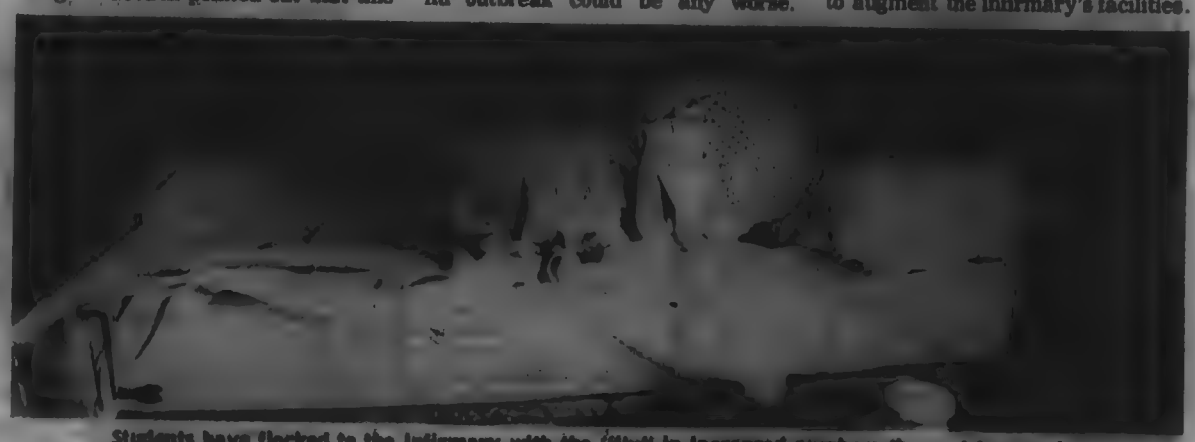
Her father was the chief orthodox rabbi of Hungary. In addition, the Hungreis lineage has supposedly been traced back as far as the biblical King David.

The lecture, sponsored by the Jewish Association and the Chapel Board, is entitled, "Awake, O Israel: Finding Jewish Roots."

Student elections notice

Self nominations for student elections close tomorrow at 4:00 pm. If you intend to run for College Council President or Vice President, for the Committees on Educational Policy, Undergraduate Life, or the Honor and Discipline Committee, be sure to get your name, class and the office for which you intend to run turned into the Dean's office before the deadline.

The Record invites candidates for College Council office to submit an eight inch (400 word) statement as their platforms for publication in the next issue.



Flu breaks out anew, hits even harder

The flu epidemic that has caused closings of several colleges reached new heights this past week here. Still more students fell victim to the familiar symptoms: fever, body aches, and a sore throat. Despite the degree of general discomfort it has produced, however, the illness has not curtailed any major college activities.

Dr. Robert Goodell, Director of the College Health Service, reports that at the peak of this recent outbreak of influenza 50-60 patients per day visited the infirmary for treatment. Of these students, some 80 per cent are diagnosed as having the flu. Many patients have stayed overnight at the infirmary to receive personal care, and this past week Dr. Goodell spoke of a "daily census of 12-14" bed-ridden patients compared to a "non-epidemic" tally of one or two. Students coming to the infirmary who are able to convalesce in their rooms have been asked to do so in order to keep the beds available for the worst.

The strain of influenza that has been affecting so many students results in a fever, sore throat, aches and pains, and "ultimately some degree of cough." Goodell pointed out that this present influenza strain is of a milder variety than some others of the past.

Students presently suffering from the flu's effects might wonder how a flu outbreak could be any worse. However, Goodell mentioned that the College experienced a far more severe outbreak of influenza in 1957. At that time, Baxter Hall was utilized to augment the infirmary's facilities.

Students have flocked to the infirmary with the "flu" in increased numbers the past two weeks. Despite allegations by doctors and administrators that the bug is mild, many students have experienced enough bodily pain to remain bed-ridden for a few days. Well, they say this flu has a propensity for those under 25.

Letters: latin honors, trustees vs. students

Revision of Honors

To the editor:

I'd like to express my disappointment over the recent faculty decision to revise the standards for graduation with Latin Honors (Record - Feb. 24).

The rationale for making the change, it was said, was that "a disproportionately large number of students have been graduating with honors in recent years" due to presumed grade inflation or a myriad of other excuses. But the point has been made—though not emphasized as much as it should be—that perhaps recent graduates have in fact worked harder and are deserving of the recognition they receive. Considering the stiffening competition to get into Williams in recent years due to a record number of applications, plus the shrinking job market for graduates after they get out, it's entirely plausible that more recent graduates have been more achievement-oriented than those of the past. To suppose that increasing grade point averages are due merely to an easing of grading standards is an insult to those students who still believe that the grades you receive reflect the amount of work you put into a course (a relationship that is being increasingly overlooked).

There are those who belittle the mere adding of a few Latin words on the diplomas of graduating seniors. But if this rationale holds true, why does an athlete strive for a ribbon? And why does an actor labor for an Oscar? And for what reason could an entertainer possibly want applause? These and other examples are equally "meaningless" yet they represent much more than their face value—they're goals struggled for through long hours of hard work, sacrifice, and self-discipline. And the addition of "cum laude" or better is no less of a goal to strive for. As a matter of fact, in an institution that prides itself as being "academically oriented" it is one of the surprisingly few honors a non-athlete can work towards.

And finally, consider the relatively small—but significant—number of juniors who have had the rules changed on them while the game is still being played. (Would you lengthen the 100-yard-dash course to 110 yards in the middle of a race?) The injustice done to them is certainly not on the level of most issues raised at Williams and it can't be described in any harsher terms than "unfortunate". But it is a defeat nonetheless, and perhaps indicative of a growing sentiment against achievement-oriented students, a characteristic which is amazingly enough being looked upon as a negative quality rather than the positive attribute it is.

This issue does not warrant any sit-ins, resolutions, or prolonged letter-writing debates. I've written this letter to point out that the recent faculty decision caused at least one student to be disappointed, disheartened, and, in a sense, disillusioned.

Dave Bennett '79

Honors change retroactive

To the editor:

I was totally amazed when I read of the faculty's decision to raise the qualifying grade point averages for honors. The unfairness of this decision is simply shocking. If the faculty truly wished to "raise the standards", why did they not simply decide to grade "harder"? Whose "fault" are high grades, anyway?

Most unfair, though, is the application of these new standards to the class of 1979. A major revision such as this should take effect with a class that has not yet entered Williams; at least they will know what they are facing from their Freshman year.

I can only assume that the "logic" for this decision ran something like this: "students only do enough work to get an 8.0" or "a great number of students graduate with honors, therefore the standards are too low." God forbid Williams be discovered to contain that totally alien and infamous institution of "grade inflation."

So what will the effects be? For one thing, students in the Classes of '79 and '80, especially those who had counted on graduating with certain honors, may now find those honors wretched from their grasp. The new standards make it almost impossible for any junior with an average between 7.5 and 8.5 to graduate with honors. A junior with an 8.5 as of now would need an A- in every course this semester and next year. An 8.0 junior would need half A's and half A-'s—both unlikely possibilities. And these are people who are already above the present cum laude cut-off. For all intents and purposes, the faculty has passed a retroactive standard.

It would seem, then, that this ruling may have the opposite effect of what was intended. Students will see these goals as hopelessly out of reach and will consequently not work as "hard". For even the faculty must realize that there are a few students here who are at least partially motivated by mere grades.

Bill Pressler '79

Social structure and attitudes

To the editor:

The caption of the photograph of Mary Leakey (Feb. 24) spoils an otherwise dignified description of the Leakey's work. By identifying Mary Leakey as "the wife of the late anthropologist," you use a sexist description which distorts the family nature of the expeditions and Mary Leakey's personal contributions to the family's achievements.

Sexism lies deeply imbedded in both our conception of and description of interpersonal relations. As "enlightened" students we often feel that we have removed the cloud of sexist ideas from our minds, yet we are foolish to think that thousands of years of bias and distortion have not left subtle but pervasive marks on our language, our social structures, and our personal behavior.

We believe that these covert linguistic biases are much more pernicious than publicly elaborated prejudices. On this point, we must disagree with M. Rosenbloom '76 who decries the Thursday Night Coalition's concern with gay rights while people are starving and dying in South Asia. To eradicate the severe problems facing South Asia and the rest of the world, we must formally deal with the attitudes towards human dignity that structure social relationships which create and extend material problems. Just as with sexism, racism, or homophobia, legislation is necessary but not sufficient to remove deep-seated prejudices. Neither financial aid nor ideological analyses are alone sufficient; analysis and practice must co-determine each other.

Finally, we believe that it is harmful to all "causes" to separate the issues of homophobia, sexism, racism, and imperialism for they are all aspects of the same problem—attitudes and actions which express self-serving egoism rather than liberating, community consciousness.

Student input lacking

To the editor:

Last fall students from a number of campus organizations (Williams Action Coalition, Williams Feminist Alliance, Americans for Democratic Action, Williams Gay Support Organization, Williams Black Student Union, Williams Hunger Action Project) and other unaffiliated members of the Community gathered together in the Dodd House living room to form a coalition which would be able to focus more effectively on social concerns, particularly human rights and student power. Since then, we have been dubbed the Thursday Night Coalition by the Record, and have channeled our energies into such issues as sexism, investment links to South Africa, the housing system, the sexual orientation clause, and dean selection.

We are not the "power elite" at Williams. The pathetic lack of student power is one of our primary concerns. It is perfectly clear to us that the "President and Trustees of Williams College" are in control. The College Council's sexual orientation proposal, which we actively supported, was defeated by both the faculty and the trustees, partly because they were misled by statements made by President Chandler. Despite almost 700 signatures in support of our South Africa proposals, the administration and trustees ignored the content of the proposals. The trustees, without consulting students, formed a toothless advisory committee merely to consider how college proxies should be voted. The Feminist Alliance's proposals to the trustees were also ignored. We learned about the non-decision through an article in the Berkshire Eagle! The lack of common courtesy on the part of both the "President and trustees of Williams College" is typical and indicative of their low esteem for student opinion and intelligence.

Dean Berek claims that students' formal power should be limited because we are here for only 4 years. We would like to remind him that deans come and go, too. The administration seems to hope that warm weather and the graduation of some members of the Thursday Night Coalition will diffuse student activism. We intend to prove them wrong.

If you have any concerns which you feel that the coalition should address, weekly meetings are held in the Dodd living room on Thursday evenings at 10 p.m. Suggestions or comments can be left in S.U. Box 2042.

Pro humanitate,
The Thursday Night Coalition

WAC rejects trustee plans

To the editor:

The Williams Action Coalition recommends that the student members of the Trustees' investment advisory committee refuse to participate for the following reasons. The committee guidelines do not address the issues that Gargoyle outlined in its petition to the trustees. Rather than examine college investment policy with regard to the college's ownership of companies doing business in South Africa, the trustees' committee is charged with studying shareholder resolutions made at stockholder meetings. No mention is made of the South Africa issue.

In addition, no acknowledgement was made to the people who initiated the proposal as to what action the Trustees intended to take upon its consideration. The student members were chosen without consultation of those concerned with the issue, nor did the trustees enter into dialogue with informed people about the guidelines for the committee.

Therefore the present committee as it stands should be rejected in favor of creating an Investment policy committee along the lines proposed to the trustees by Gargoyle at their January meeting.

Readers find 'Pique' more journalistic than literary

The following is a cooperative review of PIQUE. Clint Willis analyses the political content, Jonathan Sanoff the poetry and fiction, and Mimi David the artwork.

politics

Gordon Hardy's essay is a helpful summary and commentary on the major events and issues involved in the struggle of the last few months against sexism and homophobia at Williams. Happily, it makes few pretensions to being what it is essentially not: a socio-political commentary with any relevance to American society outside of Williams. And as contexts for social action, Williams and society differ significantly.

Hardy begins his essay with the observation that "the small town politics of this college has quarantined its participants from the 'realities' of the so-called real world." Yet, he maintains, the issues involved have struck the Williams community with "a sense ... of history."

Reading his essay, one is struck rather by a sense of isolation from history. This feeling is reinforced by Lisa Capaldini's article later in the issue. How do the events described and the issues raised relate to our piece of "history," that is, to the broad social context within in which we live?

There are plenty of women and homosexuals within that context, and plenty of sexists and homophobiacs. But before the motto Gordon proposes for Williams, Pro Humanitate, can become that of Williams students and soon to be alumni, the issues of poor versus rich, ignorant versus educated, powerful versus powerless, and alienated versus fulfilled, as well as others, must be confronted by those students. Unfortunately, it is the nature of the institution that these issues are and will remain peripheral to social struggle at Williams.

Capaldini and Vincent Prada are able to draw conclusions about social theory and struggle which could be of use to all kinds of movements for social change. At the same time, they attempt to raise the consciouness of their readers, and this, of course is the first requisite for such struggle. But unless our activists and their readers are conscious of the limitations inherent in their focus on Williams, the struggle will cease for them when they leave its hallowed halls. The lessons, which the essayists are simultaneously learning and passing on, will be lost.

If the advocates of gay and women's rights "have, after all, wanted nothing but a better alma mater," as Hardy maintains, they may have acquired what they wanted. That's debatable. If they have wanted more, they'll have to keep struggling. Despite that last, uncharacteristic excerpt, it is to be gleaned from the essays of Hardy, Capaldini, and Prada, Chris DiAngelo's interview with Steve, the report in illiteracy in the Berkshires, and Ken Bertsch's commentary on South Africa, that they want much, much more.

poetry and fiction

With their February issue, the editors of Pique have broken with tradition, placing a new emphasis on reportage. Thirteen articles of impressionistic journalism labeled "commentary" and "opinion" are the core of its contents. The dominance of creative writing, which sustained Pique's image as a literary magazine, has ended. Just five poems and two short stories have been published under this new restriction and representation.

Of the five poems, four capitalize on well known maternal as the basis for their experiments. In "Lot's Salty Blues" by Pat Mulligan and "Rapunzel Revisited" by Fabienne Marsh, a fable is reworked through the creation of a novel voice for the central character. Marilyn Bennett in "The Master and Margerita" builds a fantasy from Henri Rousseau's painting "The Dream." Illusion collides with harsh reality as a character declares, "I am alone. I hate this city." A second of Bennett's poems, "Beginner's Mind," imitates the slowness of Oriental verse. "Cherry Tree" by alumnus Jeff Nicholas pictures an original incident of boys swinging on the branches of a tree to shake down its fruit.

The Pique poems relate simple scenes in unadorned, declarative prose-poetry style. With the exception of "The Master and Margerita" and several misleading phrases scattered throughout the other poems, this new work is free from obscurity or private meanings. Besides laudable directness, other poetic charms are neglected. The tone color and appropriateness of words has received scant attention. The lines breaks in the poems are arbitrary. Rhyme is absent, as is humor, as such.

Peter Filkins' very short story "My Crime" is an ominous variant on Tom Sawyer and the broken cookie jar. Here a young child breaks mother's bottle of perfume and is locked in a room as punishment. Through the window the prisoner sees the mother collapse. "Jumped to the door yanking wild at the knob. Solid and menacing, it held."

"Out of the Night" by Leigh Wilson is a psychological romance of the Old South. Thomas Jackson a rebellious, prideful and poor aristocrat is victimized by his relatives. His only solace is his daughter, whom he makes promise never to grow up. The story shows how this bargain has burdened "the child Catherine trapped in the old face" long afterwards. Her past is a recurring nightmare.

It is the mother's sudden stroke that activates the horror in Filkins' simple tale. Wilson writes a more complicated story, building a relationship between father and daughter of dependency and devotion. The daughter is hysterically loyal to the past. The reader has seen a character revealed, but there are no new entanglements that push the character of Catherine forward. She is frozen, as is the story, in the contemplation of the past. The Pique stories were entertaining examples of student fiction. One hopes that the authors will develop more substantial contingent action in the future.

The artwork in Pique represents a change from earlier editions, in the use of the art rather than the type of art presented. More drawings and photographs have been used as illustrations than for their inherent value. Illustration, however, is an art in itself and is a difficult task for any magazine. Some of the illustrations in Pique work well, evoking the theme or the mood of the narrative they accompany via a depiction of a character or of a scene. Though in some cases, it seems an exercise in perceptive editing, matching art with writing.

David Rollert's cartoon on the cover is the best piece of art in the magazine. It is a powerful statement—and fits comfortably with the first article, "In Search of the Moral Minimum," and sets the social-political tone of the magazine. Rollert combines wit with a sophisticated intellect in a solid cartoon drawing.

Andrew Yang's drawings, included with "I must not, cannot respond" by Mark Roche, work well with the article in evoking the image of a brooding, insane Hoelderlin; though there is no indication this was the initial intent. The picture of the man resting his head on his palm is a marvelous drawing composed of light, feathery lines in an open and suggestive space. The photogram by Jeff Murray appearing above Jeff Lloyd's "Doing the Rounds"—goes well with the vibrant, somewhat overwhelming sense of New York City one feels in the article. Though successful in its evocation of the mood—the photograph suggests a still from "Taxi Driver," and thus lacks originality.

Edward Mills's charcoal drawing with Vincent Prada's "Behind the Arguments" may be a good visualization of the depths behind the issues—but does not stand on its own as a drawing. Its shading is a bit too coarse, conflicting with the smoothness inherent in the medium. A more harmonious illustration is the knapsack by Everett Geno, joined to Mark Pogue's article "Entering Algeria." It is a delicate line drawing placed subtly amidst the dry rolling hills which could easily be Algeria.

Below Filkins's piece entitled "My Crime", Laurie Bolten's watercolor is clearly intended as an artistic accompaniment to the narrative. Though it clearly reminds one of the "prisoner ... measur(ing) his boarders"—the harsh vertical blacks and whites of the panes and curtains suggesting jail bars—the element of "escape" implied in the narrative—is missing from the view of the clothes-line in the backyard.

The art which accompanies "Out of the Night" and "Stiff Necks and Rubber Faces" are two of the less wonderful drawings in this issue. They do not contribute much as illustrations but more importantly, they are not particularly outstanding works of art. One notes a similar problem with the photographs: the six photos in "Eagle Street Shuffle," "From this Place: Sights and Sounds Part II," and "Loving Lucy"—are not artistic photographs and are to student work, rather they are functional and serve as blunt illustrations only. They seem to occupy space that more rightly belongs to student artistic endeavors.

However, there are few, but redeeming, samples of student art. Gulru Necipoglu's evocation of Brueghel is a blithe, well-designed and enjoyable piece. Yang's two studies in pottery and bones—are unusual works, sensitive though a bit bizzare. The study comparing the form of the fire hydrant and the capital of the building by Russel Yeh is a strong artistic composition and an unusual use of the given environment. Dick Goodbody's one birch tree is set in a marvelously rich textural background—though it seems as if the contrasts in the tone did not print well, a problem noticed in Dick Doughty's photo of the skyscrapers as well.

Though plagued with the difficulty of printing drawings and photographs—the art in Pique provides much visual entertainment though ample room for improvement.

Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.

Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

The women's squash team defeated Harvard but fell to Princeton.

Win ranks Ephwomen third

In an eventful weekend, the women's Varsity squash team defeated the Harvard women 5-2 Sunday, yet lost on the previous day to the Princeton 5-2.

In Saturday's competition at home against Princeton, the number one team in the country, only Jane Garvey and Mary Tom Higgs managed to top their opponents. Garvey, playing number three, won 3-1, taking the fourth game with a startling 15-3 score. Playing before a full gallery, Higgs went all the way to five games, including two tie-breakers, to clinch the suspense-filled match 11-15, 18-17, 15-13, 8-15, 15-11.

Sunday, Williams matched talents with Harvard at home. One of the shortest but certainly the most significant wins came when no. 1 Beckie Chase, defeated her opponent, seeded fifth in the upcoming nationals, in three games.

Laura Carson played in another full five game match. Once down 2-1 at the break, Carson came back to win 3-2. Also winning for Williams were Garvey and Higgs in 3-0 matches, and Marcia Johnston in a tight 3-1 match, taking the final game in a 16-14 tie-breaker.

Coach Renzie Lamb was especially pleased with Sunday's performance and outcome, for the victory over Harvard puts Williams in a very strong third place ranking in the country. Thursday afternoon they face Number two, Yale, at home, in the last match of the '78 season. Williams will host the Women's Intercollegiate Nationals this weekend.

Lose to Kings Point

Hoopsters scrape by Drew, 69-68

by Frank Pergolizzi

One thing the 1977-78 basketball season has not lacked is excitement. Coach Curt Tong and his charges had to live through two more last second thrillers over the weekend as the Ephmen split games with Kings Point and Drew, losing to Kings Point 59-57 on Friday and coming back to defeat Drew 69-68 on Saturday.

Friday's game was a classic case of the difficulties of traveling four hours to play a game. Williams did not wake up until the second half when Gerry Kelly set them rolling. The junior guard scored seven quick points, and along with a bucket by Andy Straka lifted the Ephmen from a three point halftime deficit (31-28) to a two point lead. Kings Point scored the next six points, but never led by more than five. With the Mariners leading 57-55 Brad Wolk was fouled. The senior center ignored two Kings Point time outs and hit both shots to tie the score.

With 7 seconds remaining Kings Point took a shot that bounced up and went over the backboard and the referee gave the ball to the home team. Then as the buzzer sounded, Kelly was called for a foul. Mike Ennis hit both shots and Coach Tong was left wondering how a foul could be called if time had run out.

At Drew, Williams finally came out on the right end of a thriller, as Matt Spangler hit a jump shot with two seconds remaining that provided the margin of victory.

Williams trailed throughout the game until the 1:40 mark when Kelly hit Ahlberg all alone under the basket for an easy layup that put Williams [illegible] 65-64.

With 38 seconds remaining and the Ephmen leading 67-66, Bill Whelan stepped to the foul line for a one and one situation that could have sealed the victory; however, Whelan missed the shot and Drew grabbed the rebound. John Rubino put the Rangers back ahead with 22 seconds remaining, 68-67. After Williams called time-out, Kelly brought the ball upcourt and with time running out found Spangler open in the corner for the winning basket.

Spangler led Williams with 20 points (16 in the second half), followed by Kelly with 17 and Ahlberg with 10. Rick Freedman led Drew with [illegible].

The Ephmen journeyed to W.P.I. last night and finish the season at home Saturday against Amherst at 8.

Ski team takes fifth at Middlebury

The weekend was one of ups and downs for the Williams College Ski Team as they placed fifth this past weekend at the 47th annual Middlebury Winter Carnival, in Middlebury, Vt.

In the Giant Slalom held Friday morning the team got off to a slow start when the top Williams finisher was Andy Mikell in 20th. The afternoon showed what the team could really do as they took second to UVM in the slalom. Don Tarinelli, Andy Mikell and Jan Debinski were 6th, 7th and 15th for the teams best slalom finish of the year. "Impressive" was the word coach Charles Goodrich used to describe the team's effort.

The last carnival of the season brings out some of the Ephs' best performances. . .

In the cross country held Saturday morning Jeff Magoon took 4th, posting a time of 48.03 minutes for the fifteen kilometer course. He was just a minute off the winning time of Karsten Midvedt from UVM. Dave "Hunk" Richards and Robi Craig were the next Williams finishers in 22nd and 27th.

Some 2,000 people watched the jumping competition which was held at the Middlebury College Snow Bowl. For Williams, Jeff Hastings was fifth, Tom Dodds 24th and Andy Kelly 31st.

Middlebury was the last carnival stop of the season, and overall it was one of the Ephs best showings. Some of the Williams team will be competing this coming weekend (March 1-4) in the NCAA's to be held at Cannon Mt., in Franconia, N.H.

The purple pucksters pulled through in overtime Saturday night, defeating the Jeffs 5-4 with a shot by Jim Rooney. (photo by Johnson)

It's 24 hour relay time again, as avid runners, college celebrities and just plain ordinary folks man the track to raise funds for local Williamstown charities including ABC and Boys' Club. Teams interested in participating in the annual relay March 11-12 must attend a meeting Wednesday at 5:30 in Robert Peck's athletic office.

Women cagers devastate MIT, unable to compete in state tourney

The Williams women's basketball team put another tally in the victory column Saturday defeating MIT 62-38 at the technicians' home court. The Ephwomen moved to an early lead, turning over the responsibility for the win to the freshman firepower.

Frosh Alix Pagon came off the bench to go to the middle for Williams, earning the praise of coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin for her game. Pagon went for nine points and two steals in a powerful performance for Williams.

The game began in the same manner Williams has come to expect as senior co-captains Anne Youngling and Maggie O'Brien drove the team to a wide margin over their hosts. O'Brien, with 14 points, worked the offense, while Youngling pulled down the rebounds and mainstayed the Ephs' defense. Junior Leslie Milne looked good at guard stealing four and going 2 for 3 from the floor. Once the starters had sparked the team on its way to a 39-16 halftime lead, coach Hamblin turned the contest over to the freshmen.

In the second stanza, MIT came out with a revised man-to-man defense that kept them within one of Williams second half scoring. Sue Gilmore pulled down five rebounds to lead freshman rebounding while Wellesley exchange Sue Wright (8 pts.) and Pagon spearheaded the Williams offense.

The Ephwomen close out their season tonight at North Adams State College as the two cross town squads meet in their annual rivalry. Last year North Adams was defeated 69-50 at the hands of the same group of Williams' hoopsters.

Although Williams had hoped for an invitation to the Massachusetts State women's basketball tournament, a mix-up with the affadavit deadlines has forced Williams to remain out of the competition for another year. Despite efforts by coach Hamblin to correct the paperwork confusion the team will not participate, thus removing any hopes for state honors for seniors Youngling, O'Brien and Capaldini.

Amherst bows, 8-1

Racketmen retain Little Three Championship

by Evan Bash

There may be only one better way for most Williams' teams to end their season than by beating Amherst; cap the season by absolutely destroying Amherst. The men's squash team followed the more preferable route Saturday, wallopping the Lord Jeffs 8-1 in Williamstown, to keep the Little Three title in the Purple Valley for yet another year. In addition, the victory, Williams' fifth in a row and eighth in eleven decisions, secures a probable fifth place national ranking in the season ending intercollegiate poll.

All week before the match the Ephs received stories that extolled the Amherst squad and mentioned that the Jeffs just might have a chance against high-flying Williams. As the match developed, though, it quickly became obvious that any "chance" Amherst had referred to their hope for gaining one point, so completely did Williams dominate the action.

Using their superior shotmaking and court sense to the utmost, the Ephs lost only five games all afternoon. Captain Arnie Cogswell put on a fine exhibition for the benefit of his freshman opponent in a 3-0 win, while Martin Goldberg, playing in the number three position, recorded a 3-0 triumph for his twenty-second win in his last twenty-three appearances. Jim Parsons 3-0 victory left his foe looking shell-shocked, and no. five Jim Little needed a warm-up game before finding his way to a 3-0 win.

Meanwhile, no. two Chip Lindquist, suffering sorely from the flu, made really a remarkable showing despite a 3-1 loss.

The rest of the Ephs won without much difficulty. No. six Peter Thayer worked his opponent over in a 3-0 victory, while Evan Bash also won 3-0. Jon Saunders cruised to a very quick triumph 3-0. With Williams usual no. four, Mitch Reiss, out of action with a bum wrist, Pete Thomsen was called into action and he responded with a good 3-1 win at no. nine.

So ends one of the most successful Eph squash seasons in a while, there being no "bad" losses included in the three defeats by Princeton, Harvard and Yale. The top six racketmen now have a week to prepare for the nationals at Princeton, March 3-5.

The Williams Record

VOL. 91, NO. 36 WILLIAMS COLLEGE MARCH 3, 1978

John Svoboda

Bronson Fargo

College elections to be held on Monday

The College Council President is one of the single most influential students at Williams. For that reason his opinions are important to the student body. The Williams Record spoke with the candidates and has compiled a synopsis of their qualifications and views on various topics.

Bronson Fargo '79 is a member of Gargoyle, served a term as Fitch house president and is currently president of the junior advisors. He has not served on the College Council and admits that serving as its president will be "a learning experience" for him.

John Svoboda '79 has served two terms both as Hopkins house president and as a representative on the Honor and Discipline Committee. He has spent time on the Political Economy Advisory Committee, the JA selection committee, the ACEC, with the Lehman Service Council and the Boys' Club. He manages both WCFM and varsity basketball. He, too, is an outsider to the council.

College Council and Student Power

Fargo: The CC is the voice of the student body. It represents their views to the faculty and the administration. Discussion in outside groups is fine, but the final action must take place in the council.

When the students have a grievance the council should initiate forums.

In some cases compromise may be necessary. On the sexual orientation issue the students and the administration have very different attitudes. One side battering its head against the other gets no one anywhere.

Svoboda: The council certainly can focus student concern. It would be unfortunate, however, if the CC had to articulate the student position on every issue. Frequently non-council members have more expertise or dedication to a particular issue and can therefore discuss it more thoroughly than could a council member. The council should treat organizations such as the Thursday Night Coalition as an "independent subcommittee," let it hash out the points, and then make a recommendation to the council. Then the council can speak to the administration for them.

Sexual Orientation

Svoboda: The purpose of all the discussion was to raise objective consciousness–to point out the lack of sensitivity some people displayed toward homosexuals. A positive transformation of viewpoint has taken place.

On the more specific question of including a "sexual orientation" clause in the handbook, I am personally ambivalent.

Fargo: Although the issue is certainly not dead, we've reached an impasse with the faculty and administration. If we are to pass anything we must compromise, and try to adopt a new statement that does not dilute our original purpose.

Divestiture

Fargo: We all have a social responsibility to do something about the plight of black South Africans. Whether we should use the College to achieve these ends is a touchy question. We need to investigate the costs of divestiture to the endowment and the value of the College's proxy voting before deciding whether to sell our stocks in companies who invest in South Africa.

I endorse Gargoyle's second proposal—urging the corporations to adopt the Sullivan principles or humane activity rather than immediate divestiture.

Svoboda: Although this is an important question, the council is not ready to debate the issue. We should rely on the expertise of other groups such as the Thursday Night Coalition to articulate the stands on these issues. Only then can the CC take action.

Changes in the College Council

Svoboda: The most important things is to carry CC debates into the residential houses. No structural change can accomplish this.

Fargo: Structurally we need to change the funding process. It goes on too long.

Four candidates completed interviews with the Record. Chris Dianjelo '79 and Rich Williams '79 subsequently removed themselves from consideration.

Thursday Night Coalition pressures Chandler

by Ann Morris

"Williams College is a moral enterprise," President John W. Chandler told representatives of the Thursday Night Coalition (TNC) in a meeting on Wednesday. The two hour meeting between President Chandler, Dean Oakley, and nine students was organized by the TNC to discuss the issues of student power, the proposed sexual orientation clause, and the South African divestiture question. Twenty five other students, mostly members of the TNC, gathered outside the President's office before the meeting to show support for TNC proposals and representatives.

The Thursday Night Coalition is a recently formed group of student organizations made up of the Williams Feminist Alliance, the Black Student Union, Americans for Democratic Action, the Gay Support Organization, and the Williams Action Coalition. "We're trying to get the Administration to take us seriously," explained member Wayne Davis.

Chandler agreed to three TNC proposals: to press for TNC meetings with the Trustees' Campus Life and Finance Committees in April, and to work of setting up regular open meetings between himself and students. Lack of communication between students and the Administration was agreed to be a major problem, one that was leading to general misunderstanding. "I've learned some things that will help me to communicate more effectively," said Chandler in summing up the meeting.

Concerning investment policy, the TNC expressed dissatisfaction over the College's lack of an overall investment policy, its investments in companies operating in South Africa, and the recently created shareholder committee. Chandler cleared up some misconceptions when he explained the committee's function: to make proposals on investment policy, possibly including the alternative of divestiture, to the Trustees. The president maintained his anti-divestiture stand, however, saying that only $100,000 of Williams' investments are actually tied up in South Africa. TNC's Steve Hall agreed that, although the monetary effects of a Williams divestiture would be insignificant, the action would have a "demonstration effect" for other institutions.

The overriding issue of the discussion concerned what TNC members called "bad faith," lack of Administration respect and recognition of student opinion. The TNC sees no attempts by the Administration to "treat students as responsible individuals," said Davis. Citing as examples of this "bad faith," TNC members charged Chandler with misrepresenting, or at least obscuring, the facts on the sexual orientation clause at the December faculty meeting, and of neglecting student input in forming committees on dean selection and shareholder proposals. Also mentioned as a sign of "bad faith" was the lack of a written response from the Trustees concerning TNC proposals.

CC extends elections deadline

The College Council voted 19-3 Wednesday to accept two self-nominations for the position of Council president for 1978-79 which were submitted several hours past the designated cutoff time. At the meeting Chris Diangelo '79 withdrew his candidacy when he learned that fellow-JA Bronson Fargo '79 would also be running. He has asked that his supporters vote for Fargo. Other items brought to the floor included the faculty's Latin Honors revisions and the Finance Committee's woodworking shop poll.

Intense debate preceded the Council's decision to include the two late nominations on next week's ballot. Ted Stroll '78 declared that "anyone who decides to enter at the last minute must be doing it on a whim" and is acting "frivolously." He went on to say that he would be "very disappointed" if the Council chose to extend the application deadline to include the two late entries as well as others who express interest in the near future. In view of the fact that only two individuals declared their candidacies before the Wednesday deadline, Beth Geismar of the Elections Committee said, "There has not been enough diversity in the people running for office this year. This need for diversity outweighs respect for deadlines."

College Council Secretary Michael Lissak urged that the application date be extended until Monday. "If these people decided to commit themselves late because they heard there were only two people running," Lissak said, "then there may be others who would like to do so."

Outgoing Council President Tom Herwitz commented that, "This year has been very unusual in terms of CC nominations. There has not been a declaring of issues weeks in advance." He pointed out that the people running have no "really good opportunities left to make their views known" since there will only be one issue of the Record before the elections Monday and Tuesday.

The faculty's change of the Latin Honors standards was questioned by Ted Tucci '79. However, his suggestion that the Council "take a course of action to show its displeasure with the way the decision was reached" met with limited response.

A woodworking shop poll to be included on the College Council election ballot was approved by the CC members.

Panel discusses stock divestiture

by Todd Tucker

"We have something of a responsibility laid upon us. The measure of this is to speak with our teeth and withdraw financial support from U.S. companies who are blind to what they are doing in South Africa." This remark was made by College Chaplain John Eusden who, along with Political Science professor Raymond Baker and History professor Timothy Weiskel, served on a panel which maintained that Williams should sell its holdings in corporations doing business in South Africa.

Following the reading of a letter from the WBSU which rejected the Investment Advisory Committee as insufficient and a brief description of the system of apartheid, Prof. Weiskel provided a brief history of the development of South African policy. He went on to play a tape of Donald Woods, exiled South African newspaper editor. The Woods tape provided an insider's view of the situation. Woods insisted that "strong initiatives" were necessary and mentioned the desirability of "economic measures." According to the journalist, the fact that, "Blacks have decided in favor of the symbolic blow against apartheid," is sufficient reason to withdraw economic support.

John Eusden emphasized the moral obligation he felt the College had in the world at large. He maintained that the idea of equal opportunity for all is a major tenet of the liberal arts philosophy.

Raymond Baker presented an overview of recent developments on the South African political scene. Baker stressed the murderous and repressive nature of the Vorster regime saying, "There is nothing unusual about the death of Steve Biko at the hands of South African police." The late revolutionary leader's statement that, "America is free to decide what price South Africa must pay for maintaining obnoxious policies," was emphasized.

The format changed to an open forum with the advent of a question period. Treasurer of the College Francis H. Dewey conceded that Williams is "... behind a number of other institutions in dealing with the South African issue." He promised that serious attention will be directed toward dealing with this question.

In answering one question dealing with the effect divestiture would have, Prof. Baker noted that Vorster's government was concerned with what Western educational institutions think of it. Baker insisted that the selling of South Africa-related stocks would deal a severe psychological blow to a regime which thinks it has the support of most Americans.

In response to the observation that divestiture could incur financial losses on the college, Prof. Eusden noted that, "Moral standards which involve human rights require the taking of some risks."

The purpose of Wednesday night's program was to cogently present the arguments in favor of divestiture and stimulate student interest and debate.

Latin Logic

Where and when to draw the line on grades for Latin distinctions at graduation has caused heated debate. Both the students and faculty have excellent reasons for inaugurating or postponing a change in the standards. On the side of change we hear that too many students graduate with distinction, thus undermining the integrity of Williams' honors. Raising the grades required for cum, magna cum and summa cum laude will restrict the number attaining the honor, making it meaningful.

Given the desirability of upgrading the standards, two factors govern the timing. First, the injustice of changing the rules part way through, and second, the necessity of immediacy. In the first case, no one argues that an immediate change is fair. A junior working for a B (8.0) average all through Williams suddenly learns that this is no longer sufficient. He must have a B+ (9.0) to attain cum laude. But to pull his average to 9.0 he must earn a 10.67 (A) for his remaining three semesters.

The second argument runs that once the College admits that 8.0 is no longer honors work, it is ridiculous to continue awarding cum laude to those with a B average. (Those of us who fall between an 8.0 and a 9.0 find this less than compelling.)

The faculty needs to adopt a system that incorporates both criteria to the fullest degree. It must raise the standards, yet not change the rules on previously completed work. Since theirs does not, we offer the following compromise.

To attain cum laude, for every semester up to and including Fall 1977 a student must earn an 8.0. For each semester from Spring 1978 onward he must earn a 9.0. Therefore, a junior must carry five semesters of 8.0 and three semesters of 9.0, for a cumulative average of 8.375. A freshman, on the other hand, must earn one semester of 8.0, and seven of 9.0, or 8.875. Standards for magna cum laude would work the same way, substituting 9.25 and 9.75 for 8.0 and 9.0, respectively.

The advantage of such a system is that it applies the new higher standard to all students immediately, instead of ignoring seniors and nailing underclassmen. At the same time it does not act to penalize people for the work they have done at what was honors level when they completed it.

Cumulative average necessary for Latin honors

Class	78	79	80	81	82
cum laude	8.125	8.375	8.625	8.875	9.0
magna cum laude	9.3125	9.4375	9.5625	9.6875	9.75
summas cum laude	10.25	10.25	10.25	10.25	10.25

Candidates' Statements

Presidential

Bronson Fargo

I am running for the Presidency of the College Council because I feel that I can do a good job. I see the position as one that entails running the College Council, initiating proposals to the Council, and representing the student body to the faculty, administration, and trustees. I do not see the Council as an instrument of any special interest group, but as representative of all students. My qualifications for this position are that I have been involved with many groups and committees, both as leader and participant.

The Council should take the initiative in organizing forums on prevalent student issues. The forums could focus on the sexual orientation clause, the college's social responsibility as an investor in South Africa, the paternalistic role of the college, and the problem with Latin Honors. The Council should also strive to improve the lines of communications between students and faculty-administration. Another job of the Council is to improve the present method of funding. The present method takes too much time in the fall.

The Council has the responsibility to represent a diverse student body. I can represent the students of Williams College and also represent the Council to the students.

John Svoboda

My interest in seeking the presidency of the College Council stems from my desire to play an active role in campus affairs. Though I have never served as a member of the council, I feel that my involvement in college activities indicates a significant interest in actively promoting the cultural, intellectual and social betterment of the individuals and organizations of our institution. Having served on a number of committees integral to campus life, as well as having participated in athletics (rugby, basketball), entertainment (WCFM and ACEC) and Lehman Service Council work (with the Williamstown Boys' Club), I feel that I can be both empathetic and objective towards the needs of the student body.

Though I intensely dislike making promises or formulating campaign platforms, if elected I will propose an increase in the student activities tax for the 1979-80 school year. I feel that allocation of this tax is the vital task of the council, and firmly believe that an S.A.T. increase must be effected not only to meet inflationary demands, but more importantly to ensure the continuing cultural, intellectual and social advancement of the college through extra-curricular organizations.

While some may argue that my involvement in such a large number of activities will place a severe time constraint on my ability to give a "full commitment" to a position of such importance, I consider myself to be one who budgets time very well. I should add that in submiting my nomination for president I have forfeited my nomination which would have sought attempted election to a third year on the Discipline and Honor Committee. If elected, I am confident that I will be able to fulfill these two substantial commitments (and my various others) more than adequately, for I am never satisfied with mediocrity. Thank you for your time and consideration.

Vice-Presidential

Michael Lissack

The College Council has enormous potential to further an atmosphere of mutual understanding here at Williams. It is my hope that during the coming year the Council will exploit that potential. After a year as secretary, I feel well aware of the strengths and the limits of the Council. As the Vice-President, chairing the elections committee and serving on the advisory committee to the Provost, I would hope to use that experience as a guide. The Council is a good vehicle to promote change and to foster understanding on campus. Yet, its limits must be understood and its strengths utilized, if it is to have a major effect. If elected as Vice-President, I hope to be able to further that goal.

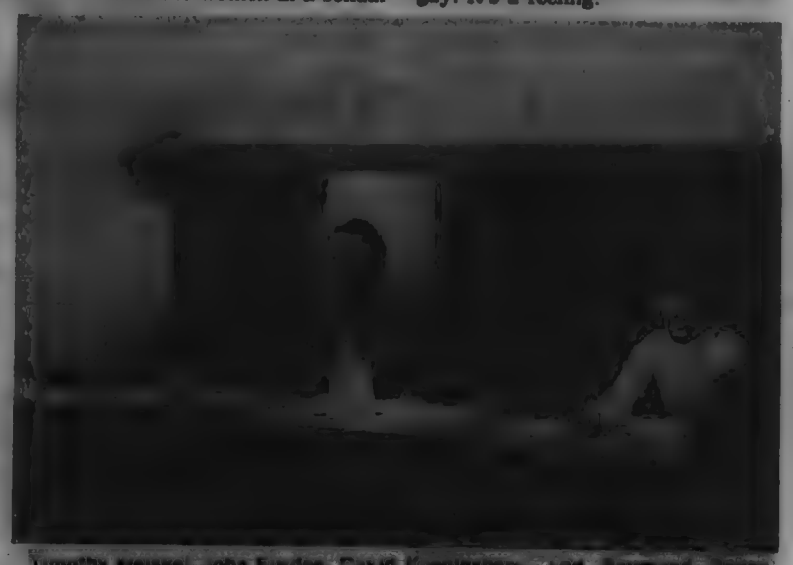
Panel elucidates gay feelings, pressures and social stigma

by Chris Rose

"When you stand up and have self-respect, others respect you." Many WGSO members voiced this sentiment at their second open meeting this year Tuesday night.

Those who contributed to the discussion stated that accepting and expressing homosexual feelings is a process of understanding and becoming aware of one's self. One person commented, "The most important thing is that I can look at myself now and be free to love myself and to love other people."

WGSO members held that people are neither completely homosexual or heterosexual, but rather that their feelings lie in a "spectrum" ranging between the two extremes. One member expressed this assumption in another way, arguing that, "a bisexual relationship is more natural" than limiting physical affection to a single sex, but whether a person openly acts on his emotions depends on social and political pressures.



One participant held that society accepts the sexual discrimination as a matter of course, to the point where homosexuals can lose their jobs or be taken to court. However, according to Williamstown attorney Julie Koppenheffer, sodomy is "a crime that is not often prosecuted," and only two homosexuals in the past six years have lost their jobs. Mrs. Koppenheffer concluded that it is "not a general rule" to be fired for being gay.

The stories of three panelists vividly depicted the social ostracism that homosexuals experience. Bill, a senior, said he had not yet "come out" to his parents or to several of his close friends because he is afraid of how they would react. "Gays are not the same as other minorities," he said. "Because they can hide it, they must fight their own fear of coming out, as well as society's pressures." However, in "coming out," he feels he is "becoming more aware of himself" and thus increasing his self-respect and happiness.

Tracy explained that she realized her natural attraction to women at adolescence, but was confused because every authority she knew said homosexuality was wrong. She therefore "left it to fantasy" until she became so depressed that her parents' constant questions finally prompted her to "come out" to them. "My problems began when I started being honest," she explained. Her parents, shocked at her revelation, sent her to a psychologist who told her that homosexuality is "sick and unnatural."

Rosemary "came out" through feminism, which taught her that she was "attracted to women in a sexual way, could express it and it was beautiful." She concluded, "Lesbianism is an important part of my feminism."

Emotions ran high after this speech and one woman added that true feminists are lesbians, since true feminists see man as the oppressor in a patriarchal, male-oriented society. One person contended that a woman who has sexual relations with a man is giving up her most vital energies to "the enemy." Another person spoke up at this point to caution her that being gay is more emotional than her political theory made it sound, declaring, "You don't choose to be gay. It's a feeling."

Divestiture, sexism, discrimination based on sexual orientation, and questions of race relations have touched our lives this year, arousing a new consciousness. We have been confronted by the demands of a constantly changing society which requires that we analyze and re-examine our perspectives and attitudes on these and other issues. Throughout all of this I remained reserved and like most students here just plain unconcerned.

In examining the effectiveness of our campus government to respond to, guide, and effect change, I became more aware of an apparent want of motivation and initiative. There seems also to be a complacent attitude toward challenging unfavorable and unacceptable decisions made on student objections and suggestions by the administration. Consider the recent divestiture question and the apparent acquiescent acceptance of the Trustees' advisory committee; a committee which as reported to us had no student input neither in its formation nor its composition.

I do not intend, now or at any time, to make promises which I have no hope of fulfilling. I will only say that I will endeavor to represent you and articulate your needs, wants and desires

Peter Stark

Why run for Vice President? Isn't it a non-job which has importance only when the President is unable to attend meetings? Not exactly. While it is true that the VP steps in only occasionally, his-her position on the Elections Committee is vital if qualified members of CC committees, particularly FinCom, are to be found. Up to now, Elections Committee hearings have been held largely in secret to protect applicants from undeserved abuse. Unfortunately, this process also limits the amount of student input. It is in the best interests of both the Council and the Student Body as a whole to open up the selection process in a way that would allow for input, yet still respect the interests of those applying for the job.

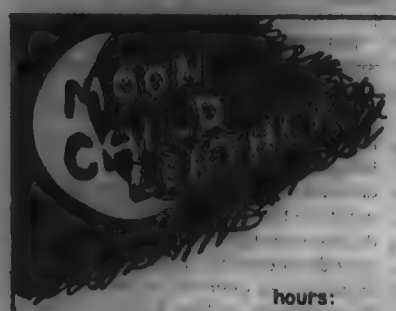
Do not be fooled by lofty, dogmatic, or unrealistic promises. I am not a miracle worker—do not expect any dramatic changes in the way that the Council is being run. A goal that is achievable, however, is one that allows the Council to be a true forum for student interests.

My experience as Production Director of WCFM and as a sit-in CC Representative on several occasions has brought me into contact with people of all persuasions.

Above all, I hope to be a-political, in the sense that machinations and gimmicks are not the way to do business, on the CC, or anywhere else. If given the opportunity to be CC Vice President, I will try in every way possible to fulfill the trust that will be put in me.

Chris Jenkins

The office of College Council Vice President serves much the same function as does the vice presidency in any elected body. Any attempts to portray the vice presidency as a position of political strength, or as the aegis of sweeping reform, are utterly groundless. In purely pragmatic terms, the College Council Vice Presidency demands working political experience, and a high degree of personal reliability. That is all. It is a job for which I am qualified.



The chief responsibility of the College Council Vice President is the chairmanship of the Elections Committee. I am currently a member of that committee, and the only vice presidential candidate with a working knowledge of that important body. Further, I possess a perfect record of attendance as a house representative, and formerly as a Freshman representative, to the College Council. My qualifications meet those of the office, and I am proud to offer myself as a candidate.

argument against the sexual orientation clause, Chandler spoke of the legal impreciseness of the clause, the College's policy of political neutrality, and the lack of a national consensus of gay rights. "But I did not intend to mislead," said Chandler, referring to the December faculty meeting. Several students and faculty members who were present at that meeting, however, state that Chandler's 20 minute speech at the beginning of the meeting further confused the issue from them. Because of this, the TNC proposes that the clause should be reintroduced at the March faculty meeting, where equal time should be given.

Dean Oakley responded to the proposal of a popular vote to select the deans by calling Williams a "voluntary community, not a political democracy." Decisions must be based on quality in such a system he said, not just popular appeal. Oakley's presence at the meeting was a source of controversy at the meeting, as the TNC had asked to meet with Chandler alone. Having first agreed to such terms, the President later insisted on having one other administrative figure present.

O'Rourke stages bizarre Ubu Roi

Who says an eighty-two year old play can't start a good brawl? We'll find out tonight at 8:30 in the AMT's Studio Theater when Kevin O'Rourke '78 resurrects Alfred Jarry's Ubu Roi. Tickets for the only two performances will be available free at the Greylock entrance an hour before curtain tonight and tomorrow, but are "extremely limited."

Ubu Roi is less a play than a staged phenomenon. Its gross and rapacious hero, Pa Ubu, is a Punch-and-Judy guignol caricature, and its locale is Poland ("That is," Jarry explains, "Nowhere.") If it is the undeniable masterpiece of its kind, it is also the only one of its kind. It is "pure theater," poised somewhere between a schoolboy prank and a Frank Zappa concert.

Jarry wrote the play as a parody of a boyhood schoolmaster far more grotesque than Pa Ubu. But the audience of 11 December 1896 found the spectacle offensive enough; it provoked sustained pandemonium, arousing disgust, awe, and frenzy.

According to plan, Jarry himself has been described as an "avant-garde Donald Duck," but he was more: a one-man theater of the bizarre. In fin-de-siecle France he outbizarred the bizarre, shamelessly flouting every convention of his day and several that hadn't yet occurred.

Jarry's life was his self-dubbed art of "Pataphysics," a world where man merged into mechanism, consciousness into alcoholic hallucination, and fish stories into truth. His gradual suicide finally succeeded at age thirty-four, an abdication of mere biological survival in favor of [illegible] he had become.

That relentlessly excessive life destroyed the distinctions between art and artifice by treating all behavior as a mask, an essential lie. "In order to be understood every man must lie, so every falsehood is indifferent to him. It is his only way of ever reaching another."

Thus, the social being Alfred Jarry was a dizzying succession of masks ranging from bicycle racer to blasphemous prophet, from burlesque mannequin to sage lecturer. He could commit no non-absurd act: when asked for a light (du feu), he politely discharged a huge revolver beneath the astonished pedestrian's cigarette, murmuring "Voila."

Since Jarry's script is so indefinite, each director has tremendous latitude in deciding how the play can best live for his audience. Whatever form O'Rourke's Ubu takes, it is bound to be true to Jarry's outrageous spirit.

Tickets for Performance No. 204 are on sale at AMT.

Alfred Jarry's absurdist farce will be presented this Friday and Saturday in the Studio Theatre of the A.M.T.

Orange: Alex in Kubrickland

The Williams Film Society presents "A Clockwork Orange" tonight in Bronfman Auditorium at 7:00 and 9:30. Admission is $1.

by Don Frazier

This isn't quite what Gene Kelly had in mind. Stanley Kubrick's A Clockword Orange rips "Singin' in the Rain," Beethoven, and other of our time's great artistic achievements out of their cultural context and grafts them onto his own vision of a malignant future.

Kubrick's film preserves the wit, detachment, and symmetrical coolness of Anthony Burgess' novel, complete with his Nabokovian Russian-inspired slang ('devotchka' for 'chick,' 'malchik' for 'dude').

Hero Alex is the MacLuhanesque Savage. Bright and engaging Malcolm MacDowell struts and pouts like a 1990's Mick Jagger. His Alex has wholly ingested the result of today's confusion of kitsch, art, and culture. He and his ammoral thugs equip themselves with the flotsam of a degenerate civilization—bowler hats, symphonies—and have no will or capacity to connect with the world they pillage: "It's funny how the colors of the real world only seem real when you viddy them on the screen." Why should Alex bother? He embodies it.

England of the near future (bobbies wear the monogram of Elizabeth II) looks like the welfare-state gone cancerous. Today's glistening but sterile concrete architecture has become dowdy and graffitied, artifacts of the twentieth century have been cut loose from any meaning or function. Alex gets high to Purcell, rumbles to Rossini, and debauches to "William Tell,"—all eerily ominous when filtered through Walter Carlos' synthesizer.

Concern for Art pervades Kubrick's work obliquely (2001) or blatantly (Barry Lyndon). He filmed Orange in the pop-art mausoleum of the dead Victorian aesthetic: Art for Moral Uplift, and all that's left are varying degrees of taste. In the Korova milk-bar, garish Playboy femkins dispense mesc-laced milk from nipple-taps; when Alex attacks the Cat Woman with a huge Arpian rocking phallus she screams "That's an important work of art!"

But what really turns Alex on is bored gratuitous violence. He, like Nazis weeping over Wagner while stoking the ovens, transforms all powerful sensations (the Bible, Ludwig's 9th) into masturbation fantasies of blood, flame, and rapine.

When rehabilitated by Skinnerian behavior modification techniques, Alex loses his libido, his charm, his love for Beethoven and his breakfast. Drained of all passion, he cannot survive, and through this Kubrick means to ask: "Is it worth it?" But his movie has been so glossy, inhuman, and distant—albeit interesting and visually stunning—that we can't really care.

MacDowell's talented supporting cast finds the proper style of odd futuristic familiarity, among them Patrick Magee (Marat-Sade) and the future Darth Vadar (guess who?). None can overshadow MacDowell, who'll someday get a chance to act once he breaks out of his dead-end-kid- on-the-make type. I wish him luck.

Winners of the vanCliburn piano contest, Votapek (above) and Toradze (below) will play solo recitals on Tuesday and Friday evenings (March 7 and 10).

Merce Cunningham Dance Co. to reside, perform on campus

Merce Cunningham and Dance Company, performers known for taking modern dance in unusual new directions, will be in the Berkshires March 9, 10, and 11 for a three-day residency co-sponsored by Williams and Pittsfield Public Schools. The three days in the Berkshires will be the final stop in a five-week residency in Massachusetts begun early in February.

Joy Dewey, director of dance at Williams, says Cunningham has been a leader in dance for more than three decades, experimenting, teaching, writing, choreographing and dancing. Cunningham characteristically works with other artists, including sculptors, painters, filmmakers and musicians, out of the belief that contemporary dance must collaborate with other contemporary arts. According to Dewey, the most startling of Cunningham's innovations came when he severed the traditional reliance of dancers on music out of the conviction that dancing is self-sufficient, independent of story, theme, decor or costuming.

Cunningham describes "Performance Event" as an "idea originally prompted by our being presented with an unusual performing area . . . 'stage' not equipped nor allowing for conventional arrangements of musicians, lighting, exits and entrances. These 'Events' consist of complete dances, excerpts from the repertory, and new sequences arranged for the particular place, to allow for, not so much an evening of dances as the experience of dance."

The dance company will stay at Williams during their three days in the Berkshires. On Saturday, March 11, the dance focus will conduct "Performance Event No. 204," at 8:30 Saturday evening in Lasell Gymnasium.

Greylock—attractive package

by John Rindlaub

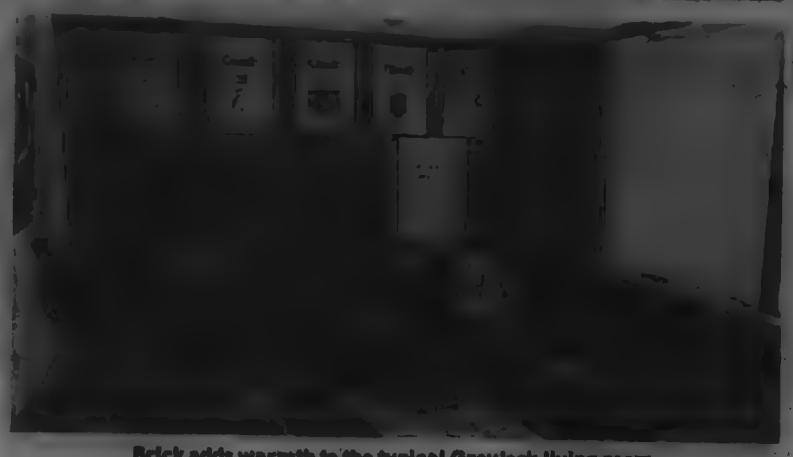
Upperclass housing options at Williams range from the distant row houses to congested Mission Park. While still not utopian, the Greylock quad combines many conveniences of other housing alternatives into one of the most attractive packages.

Unsurpassed in rational design and elegance, the red-brick and grey-concrete Bryant, Hopkins, Carter, and Gladden Houses are welcome sights to book-weary students. The landscaped quad of trees, bushes and grassy areas seems a self-contained environment reminiscent of the Freshman Quad. It is ideal for buffoonery of all kinds; in the spring it is transformed into a sea of frisbees, balls, dogs, and students. Step out into the North field and there is a private driving range, or in winter, a cross-country ski area.

Greylock succeeds in creating luxurious, modern surroundings. The spacious dining hall with its high ceilings is furnished with wooden tables and chairs on wooden and slate floors, contrasting with the claustrophobic sterility of Mission Park's cafeteria. Because it is separated from the houses, you won't have to deal with the smell of Friday's tuna bumstead lingering in your room Sunday morning.

Each Greylock house has from 60 to 120 members on its four, five or six floors. The houses are self-sufficient units, complete with laundry room, T.V. room, basement for ping-pong, fussball, and parties, a large living room with fireplace and piano, and a kitchenette for late night culinary concoctions.

The room and suite arrangements are initially confusing; visitors have been known to have trouble finding their friend's residence. Applicants are guaranteed a single upon acceptance; depending on the number of roommates desired, suites consist of a double (2 singles) with an adjoining living room, or four singles with a larger living room. These suites of four vary considerably in shape within and among the houses. For juniors and seniors, larger singles are available.



The regular singles are not overly capacious, but they have a feeling of Scandinavian logic in design and function that is absent in Mission Park. Rectangular, with walls of brick and white plasterboard, they look great with hanging plants and dark cork bulletin boards. And the egg carton ceilings will send decorative imaginations running wild. The high, wide bay windows of each room and living room offer panoramic views of the mountains and an ideal lookout on the quad.

There is a degree of house unity, encouraged by their physical separation, that creates a unique homey aura in each house. The suites all have adjoining living rooms and hallways, allowing for casual social activity when the dividing doors are open. Doors may be closed, and the sound proofing between suites is enough to shield all but the loudest [illegible].

Similarly, each house has its own separate dining area (the Carter and Gladden House sections are not distinct), reducing noise and a feeling of being one in a mass of millions.

While the dining is undeniably cafeteria-style, Greylock's salad bar has improved. Food is always served with a smile and guest meals, complete with white tablecloth and candlelight, are especially elegant. Unlike the row houses, diversity in seating is an option at each meal. The dining arrangement creates a more Baxter-like community, achieving house identity without house isolation.

Not the least of Greylock's advantages is its location. Baxter, Weston, and Bronfman are all within easy walking distance. Most convenient of all is the proximity of the Williams Inn where Greylockers often congregate for a swim, sauna, or drink. Nearby Greylock parking means no more 15 minute walks to the car to avoid a fifteen minute walk to Spring Street. The AMT is right next door, and the Clark Art Institute just down the road.

Brick adds warmth to the typical Greylock living room.

Johnston meets challenge of subject

by Tom Soybel

Of all photographic subjects, the physically handicapped present perhaps the greatest challenge both to the photographer and the viewer. Marcia Johnston has met the challenge beautifully in her recently opened show of photographs taken at the Human Resources Center of Long Island, New York.

Marcia Johnston's show focused on handicapped children.

Ms. Johnston's photographs of handicapped children focus on personalities rather than exploiting the pathos of the clinical setting. Each picture is a closely framed portrait, stressing the child as subject. The child is always shown in interaction, either with another person or more frequently with the photographer, gazing directly into the camera. The result of Ms. Johnston's close focus on the child is an intimacy that completely overrides the sense of horror one usually feels at the sight of a child in a wheelchair.

Ms. Johnston's technical skill and this collection of such carefully finished prints is a rarity among student work: the variety of texture and tone is perfectly manipulated to suit each picture. The lack of scratches or dust in her prints is testimony to her dark-room skill and contributes enormously to the professional appearance of her work.

On the whole, the show rewards the viewer with Ms. Johnston's sensitivity in treating a difficult subject. By insisting on viewing the handicapped child as an individual personality rather than as a patient, she brings us close to people we seldom know, and toward whom our reactions are so often stifled by institutional settings.

Ephs cage WPI, Amherst showdown set

by Frank Pergolizzi

The 1977-78 college basketball season is rapidly drawing to a close. As far as anyone connected with Williams sports is concerned, there's only one way to finish any season—beating Amherst. Victories over our famed rivals from the four college and one nursery area, can bring a grand closing touch to any season. Saturday night at 8 o'clock in Lasell Gymnasium brings exactly that opportunity to the Williams basketball team.

"The Ephs haved lived through the most frustrating of seasons but they are scoring points, playing . . ."

The Ephmen have lived through the most frustrating of seasons, but are coming off three games that should put them in the right mood for Amherst. Playing their most consistent ball since before Christmas, the Ephmen are, in Coach Curt Tong's words, "ready to make this season just a bit more satisfying."

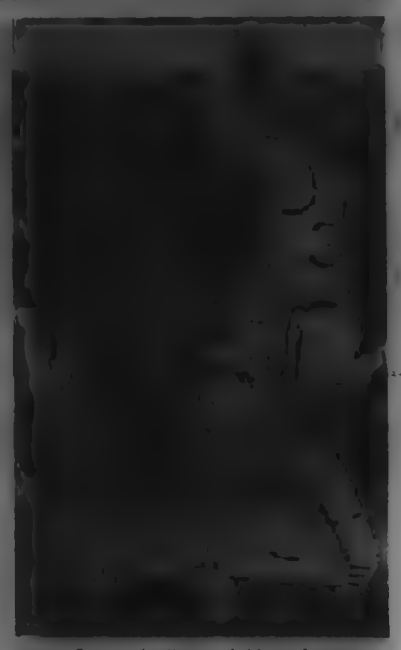
Over the weekend Williams had three tough road games and they emerged with flying colors. Friday night they had a game taken away from them by two terrible officials, losing to Kings Point, 59-57. The Mariners were awarded two foul shots with no time remaining. Saturday the Ephs pulled out a last second thriller of their own, beating Drew, 69-68, on a basket by Matt Spangler with two seconds left. Spangler scored twenty in that game and eighteen Monday night when Williams soundly defeated W.P.I., 70-62.

Along with Spangler, Gerry Kelly is his old self again, scoring twenty against Kings Point, seventeen against Drew, and sixteen against W.P.I. Brad Wolk and Dean Ahlberg are holding steady at nine and six points a game respectively. Tom Balderston is averaging five ppg and even Bill Whelan is getting into the act, scoring nine against W.P.I. On the boards Spangler and Wolk have to stop Amherst's Bill Swiacki, Dan Griffin, and Walter Johnson. Spangler grabbed twelve rebounds against W.P.I.

Williams is scoring points, playing defense, and looking like a team for the first time in a long while. They are ready to avenge the earlier drubbing they received at the hands of Lord Jeffrey.

It won't be easy though. Amherst, 2-8 on January 26, just had a six game winning streak ended with losses to Coast Guard (53-38) and Wesleyan (66-57). Wesleyan clinched the Little Three title with that win, so nothing more is at stake tomorrow than pride.

The man that Williams has to stop is Bill Swiacki. The senior forward is the Jeff's leading scorer, putting in 17.5 points and grabbing 7 rebounds a game. He scored eighteen in the first game.



"... defense and looking like a team for the first time in a long while."

Complementing Swiacki is 6-8 center Dan Griffin. The lanky sophomore should be a prime target for the fans all night. He is averaging 10.7 points and 7.5 rebounds a game. Mark Martland (10.3 ppg), Walter Johnson (leading rebounder with 7.6 a game), and Calvin Malone (9.9 ppg) round out the starting five. Tony McAdoo and Mike Hopkins are first off the bench. Amherst is coached by 24 year old David Hixon. This is his first game in Lasell—make him remember it.

So much for scouting reports—let's get down to the game. Lasell will be packed but get there early if you want a seat, for a large contingent of Amherst faithful is expected. Williams was humiliated in Amherst and they'd love to do the same here.

The teams are evenly matched—don't expect a blowout similar to Wesleyan. My pick is: Williams 65 - Amherst 52.

ATTENTION: Students and Faculty. There will be an Open Forum concerning athletics at Williams to be held in the Dodd House living room on Wednesday, March 8 at 7:30 PM.

With loss to N. A. State

Women hoopsters finish 9-7

The Williams women's basketball team ended its season Tuesday night, losing to cross town rival North Adams State College 39-44. The unexpected loss came at the hands of North Adams' hoopster Carolyn Sanford who hit a tremendous 23 points from the middle to crush Williams' hopes for a win.

The cold shooting nights of the Eph-women's past games were nothing compared to the deep freeze suffered by the squad in the first half of the local contest: Shooting a dismal 23 per cent from the floor, Williams was unable to make anything go in. Twelve steals resulted in only four points for the team, fast breaks ended in missed lay-ups, and rebounds rarely in a field goal.

Williams' co-captains Anne Youngling and Maggie O'Brien, usually combining for two dozen points and rebounds were also off; with Youngling grabbing her share of the rebounds (14) but shooting only 1 for 12 from the floor. O'Brien led team scoring with 14 points although her percentage was down to 43 per cent. Soph Monica Grady had 5 points for Williams before an injury put the fastbreaking guard on the sidelines.

The local feud saw North Adams come out shooting, feeding passes to Sanford who singlehandedly ran up 18 of North Adams' 20 first half points, for an incredible offensive performance. Williams, despite good moves couldn't put anything in, going down by four at midgame.

The second half was somewhat better for the visitors, but North Adams' ability to get the rebounds and make them count, held the margin. Williams defensive play managed to contain the hosts' guards who usually average 20 points a game, but their own meager 33 per cent from the floor kept the victory out of reach.

The loss puts the Ephwomen at 9-7 for the year in a season that had a few more losses than expected, but was marked with continually fine performances by the Ephs's top five: Youngling, O'Brien, Grady, Lisa Capaldini, and Leslie Milne.

Sixty four top squash competitors representing 25 schools will travel to Williams this weekend to participate in the Women's Intercollegiate National Squash Championship. Competition began today at 12:15 with the 32 match opening round.

The quarterfinals will be held Saturday, with the semi's at 9:30 Sunday, to be followed by the final match at 1 p.m.

Loss to Panthers ends women's hockey season

It was a defensive struggle all game long as a flu-ridden Williams women's hockey team succumbed to an aggressive Middlebury College team 2-0.

In both the opening and closing periods, the two squads played to a standstill; both sides took numerous shots on goal, but neither was able to rally for a score. Middlebury's aggressive attack and sharp stickhandling ability forced Williams to play a defensive game for the better part of the contest. The first line defense of co-captain Marty Taft and Jeanne Dugan defended the Williams net stalwartly, as did fellow defensemen Bonnie Foster and Sue Stred. Goalie play was key in Williams shut out of its opponent in these two periods.

The second period saw Williams defensive efforts go down the drain as Middlebury got on the scoreboard with a shorthanded goal at five minutes into the stanza. The score came on a breakaway shot that was lifted over Halperin's shoulder as she went for the save. Williams pounded away at the Middlebury goalie, but just could not slip the puck by her. Middlebury tallied again at 17:04 on a shot that snuck through Halperin's pads.

With 1:30 remaining in the game, Williams coach Scott Harrington pulled Miller from the goal. The Ephs launched a final attack, but the drive fell short as time ran out.

The contest marked the end of Williams 1977-78 women's hockey season at 5-8.

Pucksters' most recent loss means no playoffs

by Mark Pogue

It was like leading the Indianapolis 500 for 490 miles and then getting a flat tire. With 21 seconds remaining in the second period last Tuesday night, the Williams hockey team led the powerful Merrimack Warriors, 2-1. The Ephs knew that they could gain a Division II playoff spot if and only if they beat the 17-8 Warriors, and they were meeting the challenge by playing their best hockey of the season.

Then the worst thing possible happened. Williams' sophomore goalie Mike Moulton, who had already turned back 32 shots in the course of some superb netplay, injured his kneecap as he executed a spectacular split save of Warrior Fred Scudder's blast from 15 feet away. The puck bounced straight out and was slammed home by Merrimack's John Walker, tying the game, but the damage had already been done. Moulton lay helpless on the ice and had to be taken out of the game. In the third period, the Warriors rammed four goals by Williams and goalie Ed Weiss to dash all Williams hopes of gaining the play-offs. The Ephs finish the season at 10-11.

Williams, though ranked in tenth place in Division II's Western Conference, had been presented with the chance to make the playoffs following a meeting of the ECAC's Playoff Committee in Boston last Saturday. In light of the Purple's 6-4 win over UMass Friday night and its relatively difficult schedule, the Committee ruled, Williams should be given at least a sporting chance to gain the playoffs. The scheduled game against Merrimack was deemed an adequate test of the Ephs' mettle.

Freshman Matt St. Onge got Williams off to a good start when he took Chris Egizi's pass and uncorked a shot that fooled Canadian Gilles Moffet, Merrimack's premier goalkeeper. The hosts came back on a score by Scudder at 18:27 of the same period. Chic Johnson put Williams up 2-1 when he converted another Egizi feed at 12:46 of the middle period, but Merrimack applied increasing pressure toward the end of the stanza and tied the game on the play in which Moulton was hurt. At that point, the referees cleared the ice and tacked the remaining 21 seconds onto the start of the third period.

Dougherty, O'Sullivan, Toomey and Lawler racked up scores for the winners in the final period, but the barrage could do nothing to obscure the strong showing by Williams. And with a strong nucleus of talented young players expected to return for the Purple Icers next season, Coach Bill McCormick should find plenty of ways to forget any disappointment in the 1977-78 finish.

The Park - tubs and odd angles

by Peter Rintels

Mission Park grows on you. After living there a while, the initial drawbacks, specifically the small rooms and the annoying blank, white walls, become less annoying. Instead, one begins to appreciate some of its unique advantages, such as never having to brave cold weather to catch a meal.

I speak as an inhabitant of Mission Park who did not at first intend to live there but after having been cajoled into it by some friends, has actually come to like it.

From the outside, Mission Park looks like an elongated mass of concrete and glass that might more descriptively have been named Mission Control. Its location is moderately good; not as convenient to Sawyer as the Freshman quad or Lehman, but no worse off than the bulk of upperclass housing in this respect. The science quad is about a ten minute walk.

Mission Park rooms all share one thing in common—size, or more accurately, a lack of it. One of the first challenges of moving in the fall is to arrange the furniture in such a way so as to take advantage of every cubic inch of the living space.

Shuffling furniture about is complicated by the one thing Mission Park rooms don't have in common—shape. Some have as many as four right angles, others have none at all, shaped instead like irregular hexagons.

Another disadvantage of Mission is its drabness on the inside. No building I have seen at Williams seems to suffer so much from a sterile modernity as does Mission. From the concrete stairwells (some of which were painted as part of an art WSP a few years ago) to the white walls and ceiling of both suite hallways and rooms, there is a remarkable blandness to the surroundings. One advantage of the modernity, however, is quiet rooms. The walls have been soundproofed, making it very easy to study in your room. Big parties downstairs do not bother people grinding upstairs.

Rooms come in suites of four, five and seven, so that seven is the maximum crush on a bathroom at any one time. All of the rooms have telephones and large picture windows. In rooms with a northern exposure, the windows allow an impressive view of the surrounding mountains.

Socially, Mission falls short of the congenial atmosphere of the row houses. The arrangement of suites, most of which have their doors closed, is not very conducive to incidental trafficking with other members of your house. But there are the frequent rec-room parties, and the dining hall serving all Mission Park residents allows easy social interaction among houses. So for those of you who like to know what they're getting, you can't beat Mission Park.

New controversy questions necessity of the JA system

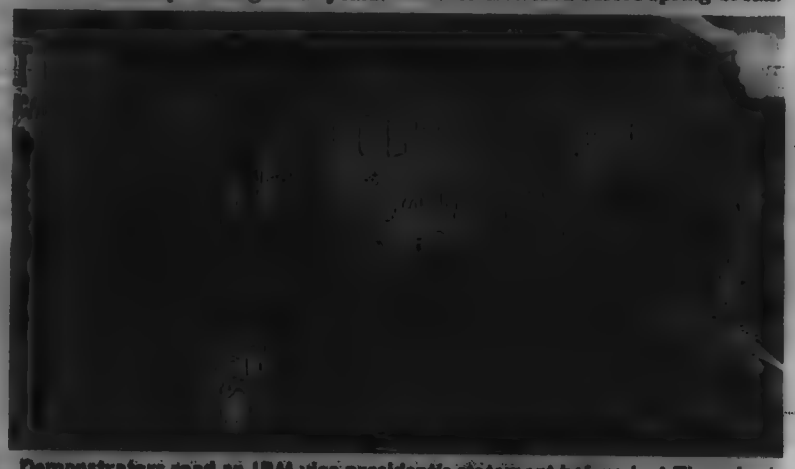
by Randy Wang

With the Junior Adviser selection process well underway, new controversy has arisen over the function and necessity of the J.A. system. Invited to present their views, speakers, before the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) have offered thoughts ranging from feelings of satisfaction to cries for reform or even abolition of the present arrangement.

Opponents of the selection process have claimed that the procedure is "self-perpetuating," if the group choosing JA's is not "representative." Presently the selection committee consists of eight at large members, five JA's from the junior class, and approximately 15 JA's from the senior class. The at large members, a new addition, theoretically offer views different from those of the JA majority.

Art Lecturer Eva Grudin, a member of the CUL, said she feels that the fundamental issue transcends the JA system and focuses directly on the College itself, where "the students are particularly passive." JA's, according to Grudin, are "just another syndrome of students not being given enough independence." The College prolongs adolescence and "groupiness" with an "overly paternalistic system."

Grudin admitted that residential advisers are necessary for incoming freshmen, but said she feels that JA's "take on too much importance as models, and (that) they are not intellectual models." Students, Grudin charged, "try too hard to please others, and subjugate part of themselves."



Dean of Freshmen Lauren Stevens took issue with Grudin's stand. The entry, according to Stevens, is similar to an educational institution, offering support to freshmen as they "work out friction." Most students enjoy having 'entry unity,' he continued, provided they can define it themselves. Students should be "free to maintain their individuality while relating to the sub-group."

Stevens cited a freshman poll on the JA system taken last year as evidence for his claims. Of the 94 responses, 85-90 per cent favored "entry unity." The personal essays of JA candidates echoed this sentiment; those criticizing their JA's often felt that one or both did not demonstrate enough entry interest.

One alternative to the present system would be to break up freshman housing, and apportion the incoming freshman class among the upperclass houses. Phil Darrow '81, of the CUL, opposed the suggestion, and stressing the advantage of forming "horizontal friendships with people I'll graduate with," and developing other friendships during later years.

However, Darrow said he hopes to see a revision in the JA selection process to "de-emphasize the status of the JA."

The selection of JA's this year differs from earlier methods by including an "element of randomness." The procedure involves three major phases. First, all application material is read aloud, discussed, and then voted on as "hold" or reject." The committee then divides into small groups to give individual applications more serious discussion. At the point "where it becomes difficult to make distinctions," Crowley explained, the names are pooled and chosen randomly. The names of those selected will be disclosed before spring break.

TNC protests session

by Sue Luciano

Demonstrators carrying placards reading "IBM: Out of South Africa" and similar slogans filled Dodd House living room during an IBM recruiting session Thursday, March 2. The Thursday Night Coalition (TNC) organized the demonstration to protest the corporation's involvement in South Africa.

Before the recruiting session began, a TNC representative read a statement quoting an IBM vice-president as saying that IBM did business with the approval of the U.S. government. The State Department feels that American companies should remain in South Africa to help improve pay scales and working conditions.

The statement continued, "This defense of IBM's behavior in South Africa is inadequate. All blacks are required to carry a passbook, a personal file which allows the government to monitor the bearer's every move. Computers, supplied largely by IBM, are used by the security police in the otherwise impossible task of administering passbook laws.

Furthermore, by its technological and economic support of the apartheid system, IBM is providing tacit approval of the oppressive racist reality of South African life. This tacit approval is part of the sustaining force which denies 85 per cent of South Africa's population essential human rights."

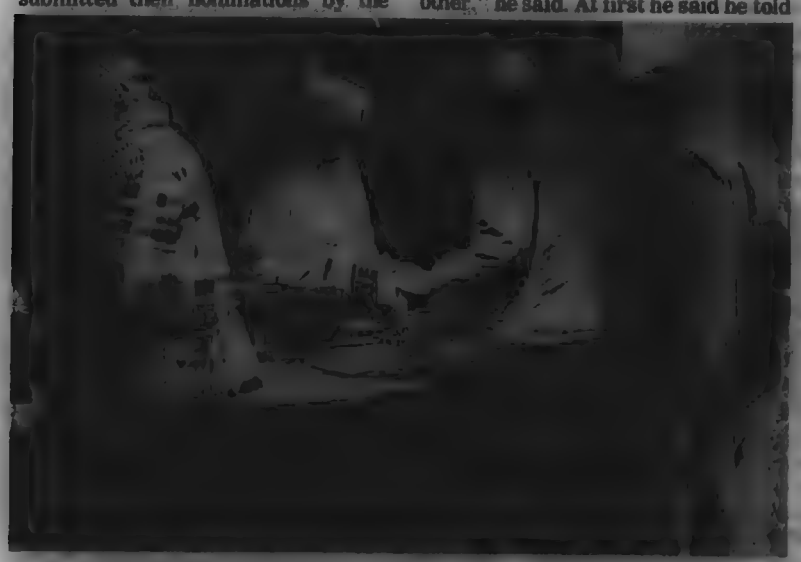
The demonstrators did not disturb the recruiting session itself and, for the most part, filed quietly out as the slide show and discussion began.

Correction

Although many members belong to both groups, the Williams Black Student Union does not belong to the Thursday Night Coalition as reported in the last issue.

Election 'irregularities' reduce field

When the Elections Committee tallies the results this evening, either John Svoboda or Bronson Fargo will become the new College Council President. Originally, two other candidates had entered the race. Chris Diangelo '79 and Rich Williams '79 withdrew on Wednesday evening, in part because of what they considered election irregularities. Neither Fargo nor Svoboda had submitted their nominations by the advertised deadline.



Herwitz denied that he had asked either candidate to run. "I have very little interest in the election," he said. He had, he admitted, encouraged a number of students several days before the deadline.

Diangelo said that he tried to talk his roommate, Bronson Fargo out of running. "Two JA's from the same entry shouldn't run against each other," he said. At first he said he told Tom Herwitz that he did not object to more candidates, but that he later reconsidered, and spoke to his campaign manager Ted Stroll '78. Stroll advised that he oppose the extension at the council meeting.

At the council meeting the representatives decided that they would allow the two additional candidates to run in order to promote "diversity." "I was angry, more than I should have been," Diangelo said in retrospect. "The candidates had a week to submit their names. I don't like the idea that they waited to see who else would run."

At the meeting Diangelo wrote a note saying that he would withdraw and gave it to Stroll to give to Herwitz afterwards. "I didn't want to make it appear as a threat, so I didn't tell them (I would withdraw) until after the meeting." "One of us would have to leave the race," he said, "and I knew Bronson wasn't going to" He concluded, saying, "what they need is a man of integrity, and under these circumstances, a man of integrity wouldn't run."

Rich Williams withdrew, he said, for two reasons. On one hand he had promised to withdraw if more candidates had filed, and on the other, he thought the council had acted in bad faith. He did not hear from a council member about what had happened until Thursday night when he called Herwitz.

Food Keller, Director of Food Services, recently founded the Zamboni Hot Dog House, a lunch-time alternative for on-board students in the basement. No announcement preceded the opening yet the number of dog-munchers has already jumped.

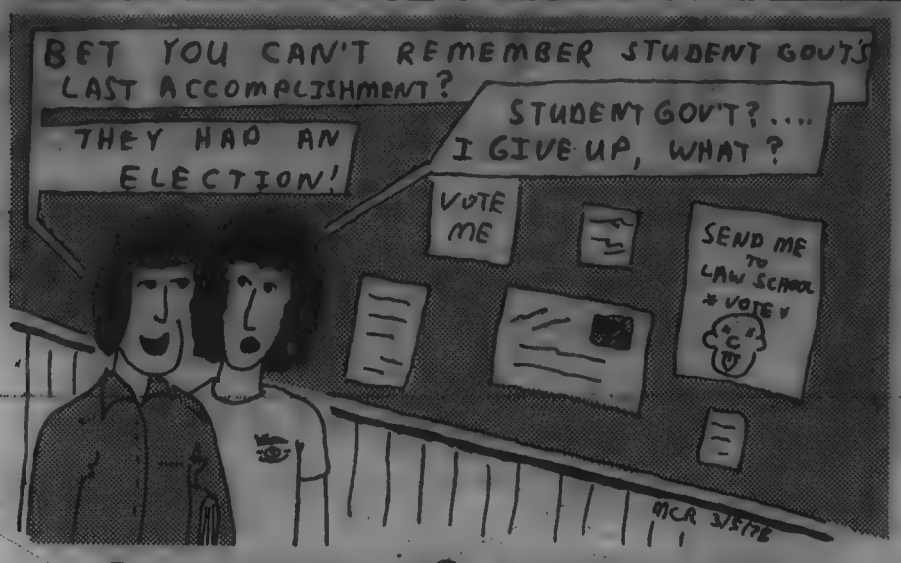
Poetry Contest



Entries are currently being accepted for the annual Academy of American Poets Contest. The competition this year at Williams will be judged by Adam LeFevre, author of Everything All At Once, a collection of poems soon to be published by Wesleyan University Press. Mr. LeFevre graduated from Williams in 1973, and recently returned to give a reading here.

A prize of $100 will be awarded to the best poem or group of poems submitted by a student. Manuscripts (of no more than five poems) should be submitted to Mrs. Lane in the English Department Office no later than April 7. Further details are available from Mrs. Lane or from Lawrence Raab.

Counseling Service

A Student Support Group recently formed as an informed psychological counseling unit designed to "offer help in emotionally critical situations." The group will locate in a small room adjacent to the Infirmary's waiting room.

The student counseling service will have an open house Thursday, March 9 at 7:30 p.m. After that time services will be available from noon until midnight.

A man of integrity would not run

Many students have charged the College Council of being weak, powerless and ineffective. The problems it had in pushing the "sexual orientation" phrase into the College handbook left us wondering if it had any real use. The next administration would have to build the image at the College Council. That would have been a pretty tough job. This last fiasco, however, has removed the doubts from our mind. The CC is hopeless.

Reopening the nominations to accommodate two late applicants was ridiculous. What reason was there for not getting one's name in on time? Were the candidates too busy with other activities, were they forgetful, was it too much trouble to get by Hopkins Hall sometime during the week? Maybe they just had not given it enough thought during the week and the last two hours after the deadline convinced them they could do the job?

The council demonstrated that it does not take its own deadlines seriously. The two late-filing candidates showed that they do not take the council seriously. If these people refuse to take the council seriously, why should the faculty, the administration or the trustees?

Former candidate Chris Diangelo voiced a concern echoed by many: to restore faith, the council needs a man of integrity, but under these circumstances, a man of integrity would not run. What hope does that leave for building an effective council for this coming year?

Experts

Mercury Column

Mr. Dooley (Finley Peter Dunne) has the proper opinion of political debates, faculty meetings, and term papers: "A half truth, like a half brick, goes furthest in an argument." He is not maligning expert testimony, only agreeing with Sherlock Holmes that the force of evidence depends on one's point of view. Our visiting experts for this week, Don Scroggin, Robert Solow, and Lester Brown, have differing points of view.

Those of you who were able to filter last fall's convocation through the public address system of Chapin Hall may remember Lester Brown's opening analogy. A pond contains water lilies which multiply in such a way that the fraction of the pond's surface covered by them doubles every day. If the pond is only half covered on the 29th day, when will it be completely covered? The answer is the 30th day, and the burden of Brown's remarks was that the world in general and the U.S. in particular have reached this penultimate day both from an ecological and from an energy standpoint. Sound grim? He intended it to.

Some of you with longer memories may recall Robert Solow speaking on energy in Jesup Hall one evening a year or two ago. He took an economist's view (nor surprisingly, since he is one at M.I.T.) of the energy and ecology future. He pointed out that it is quite incorrect to say "There will be no more oil, or copper, or food, or whatever by year X." The correct statement involves considerations of the technology of recovery and of cost-benefit analysis. There's plenty of copper, if the price structure made it worthwhile to dig it. There's plenty of oil, in shale and elsewhere, if the technological problems which go hand-in-hand with the return-on-capital problems could be overcome. There's plenty of food potentially available; it's only the distribution system which runs aground on the shoals of economic realities.

Brown brings to my mind the clock on the front of the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, which was set at 11:55 for many years to convey the message that time was running out. Not long ago they turned it back a few minutes to reflect their satisfaction with some political agreements. (I always liked Winnie the Pooh's clock, which stopped at 5 minutes to eleven some weeks ago, so that it was always time for a little something.) Solow, on the other hand, calls up a vision of five pounds of spinach noodles; I hope he doesn't take that vision personally. I'm thinking of all those things which one gets from the food co-op in large quantities to save money in the long run. In the short run, however, we may have what the economists call a transition problem: We may not be able to meet the next house payment. To these two desperate views add Scroggin's 25-40 per cent potential energy savings, from last week, and stir vigorously. The result is that old Czechoslovakian proverb I just made up: We didn't do as well as we expected to, but then, we never thought we would.

What this is all leading up to at Williams (in case you were wondering) is a College policy on capital expenses for energy conservation. At present such expenses are authorized only if they can be amortized in a 3-5 year period. English translation: I can have a desk lamp in my office, rather than use the overhead lights, if the cost of the lamp doesn't exceed three times the yearly expense of running the overheads. P.S.: I still had to buy my own lamp. Thus we could save a lot of heat by weatherstripping and otherwise sealing, e.g., Lasell gym. The return on such capital, however, would be only a few per cent per year. (There are the spinach noodles again.) Nevertheless, it would certainly make sense to do this before Solow's brave new world of economical purification of mine tailings since, under that scenario, energy will cost a good bit more than it does now. Indeed, the scenario I get from many sources, experts and just plain guesstimators, is that we have at most a 10-year period of moderate energy increases followed by another precipitous rise in costs similar to that in 1974-75.

We even have a "visiting" fact this week: Our Minneapolis correspondent informs me that an adult, sitting still, delivers 400 B.T.U.s per hour of radiated body heat. I'm all for more body heat. Hoping you are the same.

A talk with Carter

Our roving reporter was recently granted an interview with President Jimmy Carter, on the question of South African racial policy and potential United States action in opposition thereof. Mr. Carter is known throughout the world as an active crusader in the cause of civil rights and human dignity.

by Larry Mitchell

Q: Mr. Carter, we know of your personal opposition to the South African policy of apartheid. Do you anticipate any action to complement your feelings?

A: As you know, the government of South Africa is an oppressive racist regime, and, in consultation with U.N. Ambassador Young and my lovely wife Roslyn, and of course my mama, I have developed a program of both personal and federal action.

Q: Would you be so kind as to outline some of these?

A: Certainly. First, I have decided to give up my vacations on St. Simon's Island.

Q: Why is that sir?

A: Well, my major activities down there are sailing and swimming, both of which involve the Atlantic Ocean. Now we all know that the Atlantic touches both South Africa and the eastern United States. In partaking of that water, in any form, I feel that I am personally being touched by the South African racist regime. Therefore I have decided to divest myself of South African seawater.

Q: Given that logic sir you will have to give up bathing in all sea water, because as you know the oceans of the world are interconnected.

A: That's right—I hadn't thought of that. Oh well, Amy prefers Camp David anyway.

Q: Anything else?

A: Well, I have also decided to carry a parasol, as I wish to divest my self of the same sunlight that reaches the Republic of South Africa.

Q: What about breathing?

A: Top U.S. scientists have personally assured me that air is fully dissipated by the time it reaches here from South Africa. Besides, if wind conditions are right, that air may well blow east towards the Soviet Union.

Q: That's a very interesting point.

A: Thank you. Now, I have also asked my lovely wife Roslyn to divest herself of her diamond wedding ring, as it is likely that her diamond was mined in racially oppressed South Africa.

Q: With all due respect sir, don't you realize that someone else is sure to buy it?

A: Well at least it won't be on my conscience. And I could use some more liquid capital. This job gets expensive.

I have also decided to sell all the gold in Fort Knox and put the United States on a soft currency, as our gold was mined in the Republic of South Africa.

Q: But sir, won't that cause rampant inflation, displace workers, ruin old people and leave children starving. It might even bring economic warfare, or worse. Can't you see what it will do to world economy, not to mention our own??

A: Economy hell. We're talking about morals!!

Letters: divestiture, TNC

Student reps' stand

In reference to requests that the student representatives of the Shareholder Committee not take their seats, we offer the following:

1) At a point in time when student proposals come back unread and a dialogue between students and trustees is nonexistant (this, in fact, is an essential issue of the divestiture question), we view the Shareholder Committee—no matter how tightly defined its purpose seems by title—as a starting point for continuous discussion. For this reason, we intend to go to the first meetings.

2) Complaints addressing the manner in which the committee was formed—without consultation of the concerned student organizations—are valid ones. They address the much wider issue of the nature of student participation on committees and the precedential selection process. But the fact that the committee was created, and its members chosen without student input does not mean it is now an unchangeable structure. As it appears now, the orientation, limits on the issues to be discussed, and even the composition of the committee membership have not been irreversibly defined. We wish to explore the possibility for modification of the committee to accommodate the demands of student groups already committed and working on the issue of divesture. A refusal to participate even in exploring the potential of the committee does not seem appropriate.

3) Above all, we are interested in the creation of a working committee that is receptive to and supported by the student body. If the existing shareholder committee cannot be so we will have no qualms about resigning and encouraging the same of any other student nominee. But we are not prepared to make that judgment until after the first meeting.

4) The primary concern is the establishment of an effective forum for discussion but also for action. It is not unexpected that the trustees do not openly and happily grant the call for divestiture. We hope the trustees will not be surprised when students do not react favorably to a committee and administration that is not responsive to student beliefs and commitments.

Our decision to take our appointed seats is not a blanket expression of our support for the Advisory committee as it stands. Rather, we go to participate with the hope of initiating a forum in which all of the interested parties can participate.

re TNC

To the editors:

Bravo! I say. Bravo! The Thursday Night Coalition has truly seen the light at the end of the long, dank, convoluted tunnel known as Wall Street. The TNC's demand for divestiture of blatantly racist stock certificates held by our own Williams College demonstrates a crystal clear perception of the proper moral obligation of intelligent and enlightened human beings.

Divestiture, however, should not come to a halt after a few shares of IBM stock have passed through capitalist hands on the slimy floor of the New York Stock Exchange! I call for the TNC to carry out full divestiture! The TNC should lead the Williams community in full divestiture of the very institution which "directly and indirectly supports violent racism in Southern Africa." The February 28 TNC Bulletin lists four institutions of higher learning which have taken a stand against racism and so it is to these fine institutions which the TNC must move. The address of one of these institutions is listed below for the convenience of the "enlightened" members of the Williams community:

Administrators of Files
Transfer Application Dept.
Harvard University
Cambridge, Mass. 02138

Again, I commend the TNC for their efforts and I urge all interested students to follow them to Harvard or the other schools which have divested themselves of all South African related stocks such as IBM, Citicorp and Manufacturers Hanover Trust. Personally, I would move to Cambridge tomorrow but alas I am a senior and I must remain at my present address for the next few weeks so I can check my mailbox for call-back interviews from IBM, Citicorp and Manufacturers Hanover Trust. Good-bye TNC and good luck.

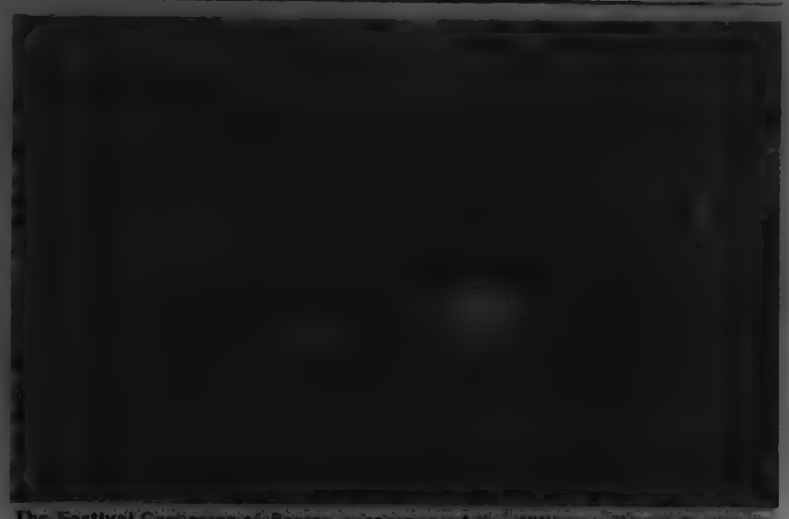
Chorus presents Grand Mass

by Jim Ludovici

Saturday evening saw the Thompson Memorial Chapel suffused with brilliant light and music as the Williams College Choral Society performed Mozart's Grand Mass in C Minor, K.V. 427. The sixty-voice choir, under the direction of Kenneth Roberts, was accompanied in its major concert of the spring season by the Festival Orchestra of Boston, and soloists Benita Valente, soprano; Jane Bucci, soprano; Jon Humphry, tenor; and Terry Dwyer, baritone.

One of Mozart's glorious compositions, this moving mass ranks second among the church works only to the "Requiem"—written in the final years of his life. The mass, as we now have it, is incomplete: a Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, Benedictus and Credo—"et homo factus est." Parts of the Credo have been lost, while Mozart never wrote an Agnus. Despite the fragmentation, the work is extensive, requiring the use of five and eight part choruses in places, and featuring a seven part Gloria which alternates between solo and choral movements. Composed for no specific commission or liturgical purpose, it is too long to be used in an actual service. As religious concert music, however, it provides an excellent opportunity for a chorus to display its range, timbre, and spirit.



The performance was thrilling, even edifying, from the first soprano statement of "Kyrie eleison" to the final full "Amen". The chorus was well-prepared and exuberant. Mozart's debt to Bach and Handel was apparent as the polyphonic and driving aspects of this music seemed to be what Kenneth Roberts chose to emphasize.

This approach worked because of the acoustics of the Chapel and the chorus. The sopranos did not overwhelm the altos, nor did the bass drown out the tenors; in short, the chorus was admirably balanced. Rather than emphasizing the lyrical aspects of the soprano line, Roberts treated them as the upper part of a polytonal structure in which each voice was equally important.

The opening Kyrie was marked by a tenseness and electricity which probably reflected the nervousness of some student singers that added to the sincerity of the plea Kyrie eleison. It was in the Gloria that the Chorus began to hit full stride, and it was one of the highlights of the program—along with parts of the Credo and the Benedictus.

Benita Valente was featured soprano soloist, and shone especially in the Et incarnatus est, which Mozart originally wrote for performance by his wife. The other soloists also contributed to the concert—especially Jon Humphrey, the tenor. The shame of it all was that there was not more material for the tenor and bass soloist both in fine voice.

Interspersed between the Gloria and the Credo the chorus performed a very early work of Mozart's "God is our refuge and strength" K.V. 20 (1765) written when he was 9. Also interpolated were the "Ave Maria" K.V. 554, and the late and famous "Ave, Verum Corpus" K.V. 618, which gave the listener the opportunity of comparing a very late work of Mozart's with an earlier hymn. The "Masonic Funeral Music," K.V. 477 (1788) was played as a prelude to the mass. These additional pieces, whose presence was perhaps liturgically erroneous, nevertheless, rounded off the program very nicely—contributing to a full and enjoyable evening.

Jarry Lives!

by Don Frazier

Captain Kangaroo must be spinning in his grave. Last weekend's production of Ubu Roi brought our pre-adolescent fantasies out of those musty closets of the right-brain we nailed up and forgot when we got old enough for more adult concerns of dating strategy, the SAT's, and resumes. Director Kevin O'Rourke's not-unnostalgic spectacle is his enthusiastic celebration of the triumphant Id, Jarry's script as an elementary-school pageant free of teacherly restraint.

The cast's abundant energy and swell by far made up for their inexperience. Jim Stone's Pa Ubu visualizes the most blasphemous dreams of self-aggrandizement possible for a sans-coulotte of seven. Stone's silly-putty face, as we saw in A Comedy of Errors, is molded for comedy; and he uses it for hilarious cross-eyed effect. He picks his nose in rapt concentration, zest, and delight. We see a child's visionary unselfconsciousness imagine, then animate the most bizarre crew of super heroes, circus geeks, and adult-caricatures I've seen since Saturday mornings before the cartoons got wholesome.

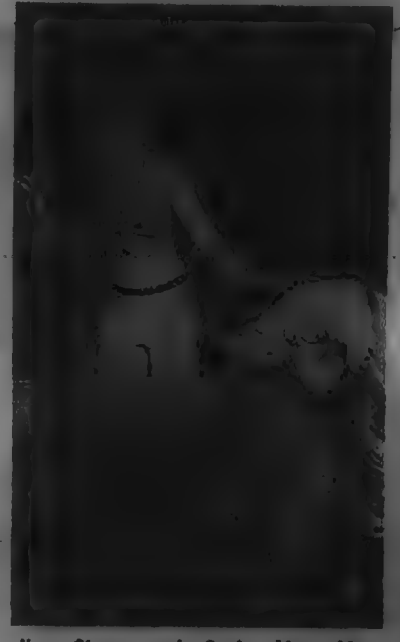
Pa Ubu's mind teems with the popular culture images swarming in the collective unconscious of the American Kid. His wife, Ma Ubu (Susan Von Moschzisker), is a Jocosta in Capri pants, clawing the air and prancing like a detergent-commercial housewife on speed. Frederic G. Barr's Captain McNure (pronounced without the 'c'—get it?) springs out of the funnies pot-bellied and leotarded, Ubu's idea of martial omnipotence. And Avon Williams' Wenceslas-Tzar embodies political power as seen on the ABC News: shrewd, corpulant, and Texan.

Too numerous to mention, the zany assortment of Polish nobles and peasants capture the spirit of a rowdy, naughty rugby song, and not a little of its physicality.

And that's really the only way to pull off a farce like this. O'Rourke knows it, and gives his cast a whole toybox full of shameless theatrical gimmicks to play with. The most effective bits of outrageous staging are his 'quotations' from recent theater history (Boyd's Baal, Candide). Robert Baker's Horse thrusted spasms of giggling into the ribs of everybody who'd seen Equus: A brilliant touch, one of many.

The company, garbed in costume designer Jake Prescott's Pre-School Expressionism, acted in appropriate cartoon style. Their many scenes of knockabout violence come more from Mannix or Batman than Straw Dogs. They are over-burgeoning with life, infusing Ubu Roi with the amateurish sense of fun Jarry intended.

Because of them, O'Rourke's Ubu is among the liveliest theatrical events I've seen here. His reach is so broad, his actors such raw gems, that we readily excuse the flaws afflicting this student production. The critic might say that we weren't sufficiently outraged, merely entertained by self-indulgent little-kid grossness, and that ill-executed comic bits slowed down the play's breakneck pace at times, seeming to happen for their own sake. He might even add that if the play is supposed to be Pa Ubu's fantasy, the characters in it should never verge into independent existence, as they often seem to.



But the reviewer can look beyond such scruples. If they constitute failure, I'd rather enjoy such failure than sit through a less interesting

Musical diversity to be found this week with both Williams cabaret and two piano concerts

Cabaret time

On Friday and Saturday night at 8 P.M. in the Log and on Sunday night at 9 P.M. in the Williams Inn, the Williams Cabaret will present its first revue of the season. Following the tradition of featuring the music of a specific composer, the Cabaret will perform the music of Marc Lichtman, a senior at Williams. Lichtman has composed the music to three original musicals produced by Cap and Bells, and this Cabaret presents highlights from the three shows.

The music runs the gamut from rock to folk, to more traditional show music, to spoofs on 18th century opera and Bach chorales. All in all, a wide variety of styles will be performed by the six member team featuring veterans, Gwen Nichols, Joe Trimboli, Nancy Gray and newcomers, Chuck Hirsh, Robert Duke and Diane Hovenesian. The singers will be accompanied by Doug Gernert on drums and Marc Lichtman on piano.

Choreography is by Beth Popik and lyrics to the music are written by Martha Williamson '77.

Admission is free but seating is on a first-come, first-serve basis and will be very limited.

VanCliburn pianists arrive

Two winners in one of the world's major piano competitions, the "Van Cliburn," will be on the Williams campus this week. Alexander Toradze will play a free solo recital tonight and Ralph Votapek will be soloist with the Berkshire Symphony on Friday, March 10. Both concerts are at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall, Williamstown.

Ralph Votapek was the Grand Prize winner in the first Van Cliburn International Competition held in 1962, skyrocketing him to world prominence and starting his successful career with a $10,000 prize and a string of solo contracts. Last September, at the fifth Van Cliburn competition in Fort Worth, Texas, Alexander Toradze was awarded the Silver Medal second prize. For tonight, he has prepared a tremendously challenging program of music by Shostakovitch, Beethoven, Prokofiev, Liszt, Scarlatti, and Stravinsky.

Votapek will play Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 2 with the Berkshire Symphony. The orchestra alone will play A Colour Symphony by Arthur Bliss and Berlioz' The Corsair. Votapek is the only American ever to win the Grand Prize in a Van Cliburn competition.

Alexander Toradze was born in the U.S.S.R. twenty-five years ago and made his first professional public appearance at the age of nine in a commemorative concert in Tbilisi in honor of Yury Gagarin and man's first space flight. He studied at Paliashvili School of Music, Tbilisi Conservatory, and the Moscow Conservatory, where he is now in the Graduate School. He has performed as soloist with symphonies in Russia.

Amherst loses, 50-40

Kelly hits for 22 as Jeffs shrink from boards

by Frank Pergousi

It had been a long and frustrating season for Williams' Gerry Kelly. The junior guard started the season strongly, but the day prior to the Springfield game he injured an ankle in practice. For over a month the Gerry Kelly on the court was not the player Williams' fans had grown accustomed to see. He started to regain his touch on a three game road trip last weekend, but Saturday night against Amherst he was truly the Kelly of old.

Kelly shot 10-13 from the floor, scored 22 points, and provided the offensive leadership that Williams had lacked for a large part of the season. The result: a convincing 50-40 victory over arch-rival Amherst.

Kelly scored Williams' first five points, but Amherst center Dan Griffin matched him hoop for hoop. Williams went ahead by four on a jump shot by Matt Spangler, but Bill Swiacki and Calvin Malone combined to tie the score at 15.

Williams' coach Curt Tong was now faced with a big problem. There was a whistle being blown on practically every play and both sides had key players in foul trouble. Kelly, Matt Spangler, and Brad Wolk had three each for Williams while Swiacki and Malone had three for Amherst. With Spangler and Wolk on the bench, Amherst had an outstanding height advantage.

With 6:18 showing on the clock and Williams ahead 21-20, Tong went to a stall to keep the ball from Amherst. The Ephmen ran off nearly four minutes, but the strategy backfired when Andy Straka missed a one and one opportunity. Griffin was fouled on the rebound, and he hit both shots to put the Lord Jeffs up by one. Williams came back again with a deliberate offense and this time threw the ball away. Walter Johnson hit a one and one for the Jeffs and Malone a jumper at the buzzer to make the halftime score 26-21 in favor of Amherst.

Williams came out of the locker room hot, and right away Kelly cut the lead to three. With the score at 30-27, Kelly hit two baskets to put Williams up top, 31-30. That was the start of a thirteen point streak, eight by Kelly, that ended with Williams ahead 43-30.

Williams held Swiacki, previously averaging 17.5 ppg to only three. Wolk and Spangler did a good job of neutralizing Amherst's big men.

Ephmen snatch second from NE swim giants

by Keron Walker

When seventeen men decide simultaneously to pierce their ears and shave their scalps, they are either forming an absurd new religious cult or preparing to snatch second place from a field of much larger—but much less imaginative—teams competing in the New England Swimming and Diving Championships, last weekend.

Coach Carl Samuelson's rabid squad rolled up a total of 304 points before the final relay, sufficient to throw defending champion Springfield College, at that time trailing Williams by 1½ points, into paralyzed shock for the only race in which they could hope to redeem themselves. When the dust cleared after the 400 Free Relay, the Ephmen had beaten everyone but meet winner UMaine in college record time of 3:09.5. Williams finished with 338 points, ahead of Springfield with 333 and fourth place Southern Connecticut, 289. Division I Maine outdistanced the 30-team field by more than 300 points, cruising to first place over the three day meet with 675.

The Ephs beat Springfield for 2nd in the last heat of the last event on the last day

Five other college records fell and nine Ephs qualified for the Division III Nationals at Grinnell March 17, 18 and 19 as most members of the team posted personal bests in one event or another. Paul VomEigen, a bonafide all-American at the Nationals last year, took two thirds in the 100 and 200 Breaststroke events, with a 1:01.7 college record in the hundred and a chance to duplicate previous all-American performances in both events in Iowa this season. VomEigen also swam a leg of the record setting 400 Medley Relay, which claimed second with an outstanding time of 3:33.4.

Shaved heads shaved times as Williams took 2nd in every relay

In fact, according to Coach Samuelson, it was the Ephs' relays which were the key to the team's unbelievable swimming. All three took second places while slicing seconds off existing school records. Leadoff for the 800 Free Relay team including Guy Hoelzer, Dave Amlicke and freshman Keith Berryhill, senior all-American Phil Wild not only claimed a share of that team's 7:07.1 standard, but an individual record in the 200 Free, as he split 1:46.4. Wild also took third in the 100 Free.

Sophomore Dave Amlicke held up his end of the two freestyle relays, splitting an incredible 1:44.6 as anchor of the 800. He supplemented these performances with fifth in the 100 Backstroke and eighth in the 200. He too is among those who will represent Williams at the Nationals.

Nine qualified for the Nationals at Grinnell next week

Don Cameron took second in the 100 Backstroke, 54.6 for the Ephs' single highest place in an individual event. Soph Brian Volpp barely missed qualifying for the Nationals in three events, but improved his times by several seconds as he placed in the top 16 in the 200 and 400 Individual Medleys and the 200 Breaststroke. Guy Hoelzer, another senior all-American, took fourth in the 100 fly and seventh in the 200 fly.

Women's squash nicked by Yale, end season 9-3, third in country

Prior to the nationals, the women's team met Yale at home Thursday night, losing 4-3. The loss put Williams third in the country behind Princeton and Yale, with the Ephwomen completing the 1978 season with a 9-3 record.

Winning for Williams in four games each were No. two Laura Carson and No. four Mary Tom Higgs. Also scoring for the Ephs was Marcia Johnston, No. five. Johnston utilized her devastating forecourt game to win in three short games.

Playing in the top position, Beckie Chase had a close match against her Yale opponent, second seed in the Intercollegiate squash tournament last weekend. Chase's score was 15-17, 9-15, 15-14, 12-15. Both captain Jane Garvey and Ros Sareyan lost in three well played games. Kristen Johanson lost in four games, conceding the No. seven position to Yale.

Now that Williams has finished its scheduled intercollegiate play for 1978, it can be proud of a 9-3 record, with losses to only Princeton, Yale, and Dartmouth.

Nationals After Yale

For the second year in a row, Gail Ramsay of Penn State University has won the Women's Squash Intercollegiate National Championship. In the tournament played at Williams, Ramsay fought back a determined challenge by Liz Munson of Yale Sunday afternoon to win the title. Ramsay was the top seed going into the three-day tournament while Munson was the number two seed.

Ramsay earned her spot in the finals with a semi-final win over the number four seed, Kirk Cameron of Davidson (15-9, 15-12, 15-5). Munson's shot at the championship came on the strength of a semi-final victory over Kris Kinney of Princeton.

There were 64 players from 25 different schools in the tournament. The team trophy was won by Princeton with Yale in second place.

The player who advanced furthest for the host school, Williams, was Jane Garvey, a senior from Cincinnati, Ohio, who advanced to the quarter-final round of the main tournament. The other members of the Williams team, Becky Chase, Laura Carson and Mary Tom Higgs all began the tournament with opening-round wins, only to lose in the second round. But all three did well enough in the consolation tournaments to give the Eph women third place in the overall team standings.

Racqueteers tie Dartmouth for 6th at Nationals

by Evan Bash

A little bad luck and a whole lot of good squash combined as vital ingredients this past weekend when the men's squash team garnered a sixth place tie in the team competition at the National Intercollegiate Squash Racquets Association championships held at Princeton. The Ephs finished in a tie with Dartmouth, a squad the racketmen defeated earlier in the year in a dual match, while Princeton walked off with the team title.

Also announced at the championships was Williams' fifth place national ranking based on the season's dual matches.

The plethora of good squash in the tournament was accountable to the strong field of entrants in all three of the tournament's divisions. In fact, Williams got a close-up look at all the talent as some bad luck in the draws forced no less than four Ephmen to face either the first or second seed in their division in an early round.

With the tough competition, it took a sound team effort in the early rounds to score most of the points needed for the high finish. Captain Arnie Cogswell, who entered the tourney with a shot at an individual national ranking, won a round before he was ousted by the tenth seed in a good match. Chip Lindquist drew the eventual champion, Michael Desualniers of Harvard, in the first round and, lost 3-0. He then went on to the finals of the consolations, securing valuable points for the Ephs.

Martin Goldberg and Jim Parsons had the best showings. Goldberg, the third seed in his division, lost in the quarterfinals to the division champ, while Parsons won two matches before putting up a good fight in a 3-1 loss to the first seed.

Jim Little played tremendous squash against his second seeded opponent in the second round only to lose 3-1, and Evan Bash, playing for the injured Mitch Reiss, lost in the same round to the first seed.

Runners hit the road in 24 - hour charity relay

What has 400 legs, runs in circles for 24 hours and raises money for charitable causes? Why, it's none other than the Williams Road Runners Club 24 Hour Charity Relay, an annual event which attracts top-caliber college runners, weekend joggers and everyone else in-between and will be held this Saturday and Sunday, at Towne Fieldhouse on the Williams campus.

This day-long extravaganza, brought to the Berkshires in 1973 by WRRC founder Peter Farwell, is perhaps the largest 24 hour relay carnival in the country as 13 teams will line up for the 10 a.m. start. Most of the teams in the WRRC relay will use 15 or more runners with "guest milers" stopping by throughout the day to provide a longer rest for the core runners.

The WRRC "A" team, current holders of the world indoor record, will go with just 10 men this year, but are aiming for survival instead of records this time around. Joining them on the track will be a projected total of 200 runners.

Eph skiers place three on All-East team

The Eph skiers have been named to the Division I All-East Ski Team on the basis of their performance at the Eastern Intercollegiate Championships held last weekend. Although the I-A and I-AA teams were dominated by the UVM, Dartmouth, and Middlebury, Williams placed three racers on the second team.

Leading the Ephs was junior Co-Captain, Jeff Magoon, above, who skied to fourth place in the Eastern Collegiate Championships in cross country. Jeff Hastings '80, right, was named to the team on the strength of a strong season record and a 5th-place finish in the EISA Championships in jumping. Donald Tarinelli, not pictured, was consistently one of the East's strongest slalom skiers and finished 9th in the Eastern Championships.

Panel ponders physical plant, post-season play

Following a precedent established last year, the Student-Faculty Committee on Athletics held an open forum in the Dodd House living room Wednesday night. About forty students and faculty showed up to have their questions about sports at Williams answered.

In response to observations that the weight room was overcrowded, dirty and cold, Director of Athletics Robert Peck proposed several improvements. Among these was the purchase of a new Universal machine along with more "loose weights". The facility may be relocated in space now allocated to the men's locker room.

The ultimate solution to the problem of inadequate weight-room is, according to Peck, the construction of a new gym. In accordance with a Trustee policy, the college must have sufficient funds to pay for endow the building before construction can even begin. As a result, there will be no new major athletic facility built in the near future.

One major area of discussion centered around college regulations prohibiting team participation in post-season competitions such as bowl games. At present, no team may participate in post-season tournaments or games although individuals remain eligible. This differentiation stems from the College's membership in the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NECSAC). This regulatory organization, which has ten members, is designed to "insure athletic competition between like colleges" and make such competition is compatible with the academic workload at these institutions. The conference forbids most post-season play and, "chances are slim that the rule will be changed," according to Peck.

The Athletic Department's commitment to the development of female sports was reinterated at the forum. Director Peck stated that there has been a "moratorium called on developing new male sports until parity with female sports has been reached." He went on to maintain that

CC validates election, 12 run-offs held

"Every system is going to have faults. We cannot make election security airtight," reasoned College Council member Ted Tucci '79. With this in mind, plus CC President Tom Herwitz's statement that "you need trust in the integrity of the representatives," the Council voted to accept the results of the College elections held Monday and Tuesday.

Several Council members demanded that the election be declared void and be rerun. According to Avon Williams '81, "People feel that CC representatives whose names were on the ballots should not have been involved in the election process." At present the distribution and collection of ballots is entirely handled by Council and subcommittee members. Don Toumey '78 asked:

"Was the election legitimate if only 53 per cent of the students voted and there is a possibility that ballot boxes were stuffed?"

"The elections were dealt with in the manner the Council thought to be best," Herwitz countered. "I don't see how we can handle the situation without trusting the individual members." In addition, he emphasized that no members had voiced suspicions of illegal voting practices involving the ballots they had personally distributed.

Beth Geismar of the Elections Committee reminded the Council that managing the elections is one of the most important functions it performs. She pointed out that the Council members should have questioned the election process before the balloting took place, rather than afterward.

Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly presented the Council with the committee's final report which was distributed at Wednesday's CC meeting. One particular Finance Committee shortcoming involves its relationship with the Council. The final report recognized this problem, saying: "communications between the Council and the Finance Committee (were) sometimes mixed and there was an occasional feeling that the Council was overwhelmed by the Committee's data and recommendations." To ameliorate this situation the Council voted to accept the FinCom's proposal that a CC member be placed on the Committee each fall to assure year-round Council representation.

Outgoing CC head scores student apathy

by Stu Massad & Tim Jones

Outgoing College Council officers linked student apathy to student powerlessness and surveyed the future of the council in a Record interview Wednesday night.

Outgoing Council President Tom Herwitz '78 and Vice-President Peter Friesen '78 picked lack of student interest as the greatest barrier to the efforts they have undertaken to increase student input on college decisions since their election in the midst of last spring's student power debates.

"Throughout the year we have had troubles getting people to do things," Herwitz said. "There are just not enough people on campus interested in participating." He cited the institution of parallel committees as an example of "an excellent idea" that is crippled by a lack of interest.

"I'm not satisfied with our system of faculty-dominated government," Herwitz commented, "and I think that's one reason for the lack of student involvement." He envisions parallel committees as a means for "chipping away at the faculty superstructure" if interest and involvement rise.

Herwitz' view of the role of the College administration was ambivalent. "I was sort of disappointed with their handling of the sexual orientation issue," he said, "and certainly I would have liked the student body to have had more say in the selection of the new dean."

The creation of the Shareholder Committee won Herwitz' approval, however. "I want to see where that committee can go," he said. "It's a place where some really serious research can be done—and nobody has done any kind of study on the effects of diversiture on the College."

On the issue of divestiture, he said, "if you look at any governmental body, you cannot in a group of 30 people discuss whether the College should divest until somebody has done the research." He noted that such research need not come only from council committees, but also from other groups, such as the Thursday Night Coalition.

Friesen said his experience in the vice-presidency has taken two forms. One aspect has been "making sure the committee system works," through his leadership of the council's Elections Committee. He cited evaluations of committee members' records in an effort to improve their conscientiousness as a recent advance in improving committee function.

The Friesen also cited his role on the council to remind council members of pragmatic questions related to moral issues. He added that he saw no limit to the range of activities in the vice-presidency. "It's all a matter of the time you're willing to put into it."

"It's not the Finance Committee's job to be representative," said Harry Kelly, outgoing chairman of the Committee. "It's our job to be analytic." While Kelly admitted the committee must respond to student needs, he argued that it must be pragmatic as well, leaving the representative function to the council, with its power of final budget approval.

Gay Rights activist discusses 'coming out'

by Sharon Nelson

The only gay rights lobbyist in Washington, D.C., Adam DeBaugh, spoke on "The Importance of 'Coming Out' " last Tuesday night.

As an explanation to straights in the audience, DeBaugh defined "coming out" as "coming fully out of the closet and accepting, celebrating, and sharing the truth of who you are sexually."

"We live in a heterosexist society where everyone is assumed to be heterosexual," DeBaugh continued. "Coming out is the act of correcting an erroneous assumption."

Early in the talk, DeBaugh startled the audience by stating that he could easily pick out a gay person and that he would turn on the house lights and do so at that moment. He descended to the audience and, after looking at each person, returned to the stage, explaining that neither he, nor anyone else, can determine a person's sexual preference by sight. The purpose of this experiment, he said, was to allow "everyone, straight and gay, to share the fear of being called gay."

Once one has "come out of the closet," there remains the problem of who to tell. The first person to tell, according to DeBaugh, is the most important—yourself. Then, one can tell other gays, and one's best friends, and finally one's family. The family can be the most difficult to inform, and sometimes, DeBaugh claimed, they "have the right not to know."

DeBaugh admitted that "coming out" may be dangerous. He listed the possibilities of losing one's job and losing custody of one's children as being sufficient reasons for staying in the closet.

Self-nominations for a third student representative to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility are being accepted until 6 p.m. on Sunday, March 12th. Underclassmen interested in serving on the committee should contact Tom Herwitz at 2741.

Merce Cunningham to appear

Merce Cunningham, the internationally known dancer and choreographer, and William Como, Editor-in-Chief of "Dance" and "After Dark" magazines, will be the guests of honor at a reception Saturday evening in Faculty Club. This will follow "Performance Event No. 204" by Merce Cunningham and his company, with John Cage's "chance music" at 8:30 in Lasell Gymnasium. The audience at the "Performance Event" and all students are invited to attend the reception for Cunningham and Como. Citations will be read honoring them for the work they have done to promote and develop dance throughout the world. Other special guests have been invited—patrons of the arts as well as representatives of various art foundations.

Students teach at Monroe

by Lisa Hartigan

A group of 13 Williams students is currently teaching an informal course in Black Studies at Monroe State Prison in Florida, Mass. Each week a group of from two to four students visit the prison to hold discussions on such topics as slavery, blacks in the Depression, and the 1960's civil rights movement.

The first class, "Origins of Slavery," was held last week with a group of 15 black inmates and was enthusiastically received. "The program may give the prisoners some sense of why and how they arrived at the social position they are in," said Pat Strong '79, a participant. Strong emphasized the openness of the class discussions and said that an effort would be made to avoid developing a typical classroom situation in order to make the inmates more comfortable.

The program is scheduled to last 7 weeks and was initiated as a result of inmates' requests. A representative of the prison contacted Dean Eileen Julien about the formation of such a program last month and she contacted several students she thought might be interested. Three students toured the prison, which is situated in the woods about four miles from Route 2, and were impressed by its informal, camp-like atmosphere. "The very isolation of the place, making it difficult for friends and relatives to visit, makes this opportunity to bring in outsiders very important to the inmates," according to Strong.

"Both the students and prisoners will learn from this experience," said Dean Julien. She added that in instructing the inmates, students will have to be far more fully prepared on all aspects of their subject than they ever need be to attend a class at Williams.

Coalition withdraws/ group rejection

To the editor:

The South Africa Subcommittee of the Thursday Night Coalition has withdrawn its rejection of the new investment policy committee created by the Board of Trustees.

We are pleased to see that the name and the mandate of the committee has changed from an "Advisory Committee on Shareholder Proposals" to the "Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility." We have been assured by President Chandler that the committee is authorized to recommend any of the whole range of options available in regard to our South Africa-related investments. This includes the option of divestiture.

In another change, a third student position has been created on the committee. Students interested in holding that position should contact Tom Herwitz early this weekend.

We would like to add that we are still disappointed with the original formation of this committee. The President and Trustees should have worked with students in the actual creation of the committee in the first place. Nevertheless, we are willing to work with what is now an acceptable committee on investment policy.

Sincerely,
Ken Bertsch,
for the South Africa
Subcommittee of the Thursday Night Coalition

Self divestiture

To the editor,

Those students and faculty members who are calling on the college to divest its holdings in American corporations with operations in South Africa are asking Williams to make a justifiable sacrifice for a very worthy cause, one that cries out for action from all concerned human beings. It is important that those of us who are advocating this action examine our own lives, to see if we can make personal sacrifices that will indicate to the trustees of this college that we are very serious about this issue. It is crucial that we draw the moral implications of our beliefs back to ourselves.

In this spirit, I would like to call upon all those who demand appropriate college divestiture to examine their own financial holdings. There are many Williams students who own stock in these same U.S. companies. It is only right and fair that we freely and publicly do ourselves what we have insisted that the college must do. Furthermore, real sacrifice on the part of interested individuals can forcefully indicate the urgency of our demands.

Stephen C. Magee '79

So. Africa problem

To the editor:

A hell of a lot of activity, with widespread support, has taken place recently concerning the issue of Williams' relationship to the racist regime in South Africa. Films, letters, demonstrations, lectures, petitions, meetings with President Chandler and the trustees—all of these have been utilized by an ever-growing segment of the student body to express its concern over Williams' financial ties to apartheid.

Now we are told, however, that the problem of what to do about the College's more than ten million dollar investment in corporations with operations in South Africa is being handled by an advisory Shareholder Committee, where students are represented. The administration and those always numerous "let's work within the system" types assure us that if we would only sit back and relax and let the new committee do its work, then the problem will be solved.

Unfortunately, this plan of action (or rather inaction) has little relevance to myself and 450 or so other seniors who look forward to graduating in June. By the time that the Shareholder Committee can study the issue and make a recommendation, and probably before the Trustee Finance Committee can decide what action (or more probably, inaction) to take on that recommendation, we will have graduated.

I'm sure that the administration and trustees are quite pleased at the thought that if they can only stall the South Africa divestiture question for a few short months that summer and the graduation of seniors will effectively stop much of the support for divestiture on campus. They need only think about the effects of summer on last spring's "student power" movement to assure themselves of the correctness of such a strategy.

In an effort to help remedy this situation, and insure that concerned seniors will indeed be able to make their opinions count no matter how long the committees stall, the following petition will soon be circulated:

We, the undersigned members of the class of 1978, acknowledging that South African apartheid is immoral, and wishing to divorce ourselves from financial, and hence moral, support of that regime, hereby pledge that we will NEVER make a financial donation or contribution to Williams College until it agrees to divest its holdings in corporations involved in South Africa. We will, however, lend what support we are able to any fund which is established to cover the costs of divestiture.

It's somewhat unfortunate that at least some of the trustees of the College can only understand economics. Nevertheless, since recent months have suggested that this is the case, we must be prepared to talk in their language. If the College refuses to do what is right "because it costs alot of money," we must insure that it costs even more to do what is wrong.

The act that this pledge is directed to seniors is not meant to suggest that other classes should not be involved. In fact, I would urge other classes to circulate their own pledges just as I will support an effort to involve the Alumni classes. It would be a shame to see Williams, which has one of the highest Alumni-Alumnae participation rates in the country, lose that position because it was afraid to oppose oppression.

G.P.A. perspective

To the editor:

It is an old assumption that brilliance in a professor will rarely combine with a concern for being fair to his students.

I believe that true brilliance goes hand in hand with a sense of fairness. And, I am sure that our faculty will prove my belief to be correct.

Publicity lacking

To the editor:

I think that the publicity surrounding the college elections has been lamentably poor. The Register of the past two weeks makes no mention of nominations deadlines (though these seemed to bend a bit anyway when pressed) or even of the elections themselves. Posters, at least at Mission, were down well before the end of February. The lack of good candidates for several posts is in part due to lack of publicity—only in part, of course.

To the editor:

We would like to thank the following people for being in the benefit concert for the sixth grade trip to Mystic: The Williams Octet, the Jazz Ensemble, and the Ephlats. A special thanks goes to Mike Crowley '78 for suggesting and putting together the concert. Our goal was made $250 less.

Student paradox

To the editor:

As a humane man I am appalled at apartheid, and at the oppressive Vorster regime which perpetrate it, I feel that all American companies should leave South Africa, in order to effectually choke the country's economy, cripple the illegitimate regime, and facilitate the inevitable revolution.

In every article I have read on the subject of divestiture of Williams South African stocks, however, I have noticed a glaring lack: they never mention what good it will do South Africa. The fact is that divestiture will do no good. If Williams is willing to sell, there will be plenty of available buyers. Williams will lose on the exchange, but the companies won't be hurt. Even if Williams were to rip up its stock and toss it into the wind it wouldn't hurt the companies. They will remain in South Africa because it is lucrative to remain; the company loses zero revenue if Williams sells.

It will be argued that the important issue isn't financial, but symbolic. Williams should dissociate itself completely from an organization which aids the Vorster regime. My answer to these people is that your own symbolic association with these companies (via buying) is more justified. Will you refuse use of the photocopiers in the library? Will you refuse to buy any chromium products? If not, you are a hypocrite. If so, you have a higher sense of moral responsibility than I.

Jeff Delisle '78

CC's power

To the editor:

Your most recent editorial about the ineffectiveness of the College Council is an excellent example of irresponsible journalism. For this opinion, I cite two examples:

1) You state that the Council's failure in getting the sexual orientation clause in the handbook "left us wondering if it had any real use." What were you expecting, a coup d'etat against the trustees? Regardless of where one stands on the issues, it is obvious that the Council's "ineffectiveness" stems from the Administration's refusal to consider it as an influrntial body. How can you criticize it for not pushing through a clause that was opposed by both the faculty and the trustees. That would be equivalent to Belgium "forcing" a nuclear arms treaty on the United States and Russia.

2) Your editorial claims that the Council's acceptance of the two late nominations proves that it is "hopeless". At the same time, however, you fail to mention the main reason why the nominations were accepted. The four P.M. Wednesday time has never been regarded as a deadline. It was merely requested that they be submitted by then. It has been the precedent of previous Councils to accept nominations up until the ballots are typed up. The matter would not have even been brought up if not for the protests of the original candidates (and campaign managers). That fact that the two late nominations were accepted by a vote of 19-3 only further points to the insignificance of the entire affair. That The Record should consider it the "final judgment" on the council is ridiculous. To present this opinion at election time, however, is offensive. Instead of endorsing the need for intelligent voting to a student body that seems to pick candidates for their dimples, you are simply making a cheap shot that can only increase apathy at a time when it can cripple what little power we have already been granted.

To the editor:

Take a plane

To the editor:

As usual the ride board in Baxter is covered with pleas to "take me to NYC please!" I shudder to think how many people end up paying $16 to ride that wretched bus.

There is a better way. Command Airways can fly students on standby from Pittsfield to LaGuardia or Kennedy for only $20. The flight is just one hour, and it's fun to fly low over the Berkshires, Taconics and Long Island Sound. I have found the extra $4 to be worth the difference.

WCFM newsman Neville at D.C. conference

Gregg Neville '80, was among a group of student radio and newspaper journalists invited to Washington, D.C. for a close look at the workings of the executive branch of government, including an interview with President Carter.

The students spent Friday, March 3, in Washington for a day of briefings by members of the White House staff. The key event of the day came late in the morning when Presidential Press Aide Midge Costanza introduced President Carter.

Carter answered questions on a variety of topics including the SALT negotiations, abortion, the ERA and the coal strike. Neville called Carter "Perceptive in his answers, and polite with the obvious inexperience of his questioners." "His words had a ring of sincerity," he added. Carter spent more than an hour with the students.

Bryant, East, Williams: energy winners

Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad announced March 6 that Bryant House, East College, and Williams Hall were co-winners of the electricity conservation contest held during February. All three housing units decreased their electricity consumption by 25 per cent for the month. $25 will be awarded to each winner.

According to Roosenraad, the three residential houses as a group used substantially less electrical wattage during February 1978 than during the same month in 1977. A second energy-saving contest will be held from March 25 to April 25.

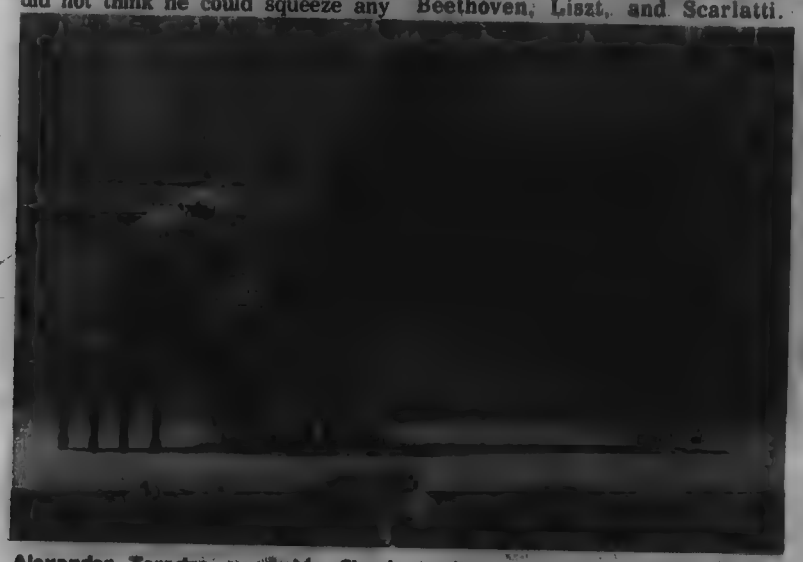
Cliburn silver medalist

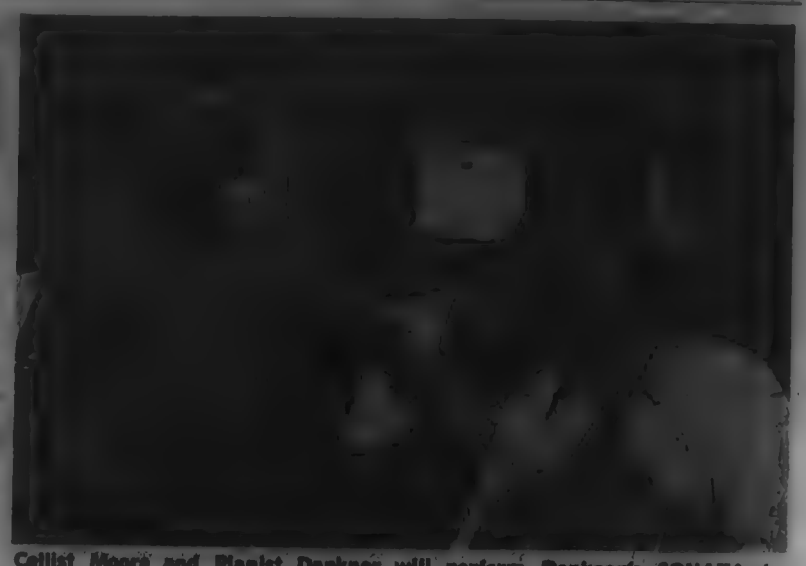
Pianist electrifies Chapin Hall

by Mark A. Obert-Thorn



Tuesday night saw Chapin Hall electrified by pianistic pyrotechnics the likes of which are seldom seen, as Alexander Toradze, a silver medal winner in the 1977 Van Cliburn Piano Competition, presented a solo recital. The twenty-five year old Russian virtuoso, who has been described by pianist Lili Kraus as one who is able to play like an animal or like an angel, chose a widely varied program designed to spotlight his more feral mien.

The program, as might have been expected, leaned heavily toward Russian composers. It opened with a heaven-storming performance of the Shostakovich Prelude and Fugue in D-Flat Major. The piano shook from the force of Toradze's driving bass line, and continued shaking throughout most of the recital. His reading of Prokofiev's Sonata No. 7 in B-Flat Major, Op. 83 showed (in the Allegro inquieto) that just when the audience did not think he could squeeze any more decibellage from Chapin's besieged Steinway, he could play louder still. Toradze's hands in the Precipitato were but a blur, as he delivered a performance of astounding accuracy and rhythmical propulsion.



Only in the Stravinsky Petrouchka excerpts, which closed the program, did Toradze falter, and then only by a surfeit of that immense vitality which had carried the evening along up to that point. The "Russian Dance" was taken at an absurdly fast tempo, one which precluded any attempt at total accuracy. Indeed, for several measures, it was impossible to tell musically what was going on; everything was lost in a jumble of notes. The Russian managed to pull himself together in the "Petrouchka's House" movement, and "The Shrovetide Fair" ended the selections with his customary virtuosity.

Interspersed between the Russian works were compositions by Beethoven, Liszt, and Scarlatti. Toradze gave Beethoven's late Sonata in E Major, Op. 109 a romantic, almost an impressionistic, reading, with cascades of undulating sound. It was mostly a poetic performance, although it was marred by some indistinctness (due in part to overuse of the pedal), and by some overlong, overdone arpeggios in the slower parts of the variations.

Liszt's Variations on a Theme by Bach were played to true Lisztian perfection, with surges of power alternating with moments of the starkest simplicity, while the Two Sonatas in D-Minor by Scarlatti elicited a depth of emotional feeling which belied their simplicity.

Alexander Toradze awed his Chapin audience Tuesday night with his pyrotechnics. Tonight at 8 p.m., another Van Cliburn winner, Ralph Votapek, will appear with the Berkshire Symphony in Chapin. (photo by Gledhill)

Cellist Moore and Pianist Dankner will perform Dankner's SONATA (a premiere), Bach, and Biggs in their Sunday afternoon concert at the Clark.

Dankner sonata will premiere here

Douglas Moore, cellist and Stephen Dankner, pianist, will premiere Dankner's Sonata for Violoncello and Piano at 3:00 p.m. Sunday, March 12, in the Clark Art Institute Auditorium. The public recital is free. Also on the program are works by Creston (Suite for Violoncello and Piano, Op. 66), J. S. Bach (Suite Number 5 in C Minor, BWV 1011), and Biggs (Invention for Cello and Tape).

Inspired by the "dark, brooding opening for solo contrabassoon and double-basses" in Ravel's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand, the three-movement work utilizes unorthodox sounds. The first movement, "De Profundis," surrounds increasing tension and speed with a slow, sombre beginning and echoing quiet at the end. The second, after some unusual kinds of playing from both piano and cello, ends with a piano cadenza leading to the final movement, which starts tumultuously, then decelerates into an immobile resolution.

> "the three-movement work utilizes unorthodox sounds"

Moore is the winner of numerous awards and an alumnus of much performing experience. He is currently cellist with The Williams Trio, assisting artist in the Music in the Round chamber music series, and principal cellist with the Albany Symphony and the Berkshire Symphony.

Dankner, an alumnus from Juilliard School of Music, is an accomplished performer of a wide variety of keyboard music and instruments; he won a BMI Student Composer Award in 1968, then went on to gather several other important awards in composition. His published compositions include a String Quartet, a Symphony, and miscellaneous chamber works. His Symphony was performed in Alice Tully Hall by the Juilliard Orchestra.

Arts Briefs

Coffeehouse

The Williams Coffeehouse will present Artie Traum, one of the most sensitive and intelligent songwriters in American today, this Saturday (not Friday as announced in the Register), 9 p.m. to midnight.

Also appearing are Peter Friesen '78 and Eric Pyenson '78 playing Bluegrass.

Studio IX

The Music Department will sponsor Studio IX Monday, March 13, at 4 p.m. in Chapin Hall. This Studio is the ninth in a series of student music recitals. The concert is free and open to the public.

Works on the program include Six Rumanian Folk Dances by Bartok performed by Kenneth Leghorn '78, violin, and Kate Gridley '78, piano, and Beethoven's Piano Sonata, Op. 22 by Ann Congleton.

The Brass Ensemble, directed by Peter Knott, will play works by Calvert and Shaw, and a string ensemble conducted by Masuo Nishibayashi '78 will play Orchestral Suite No. 2 by Bach.

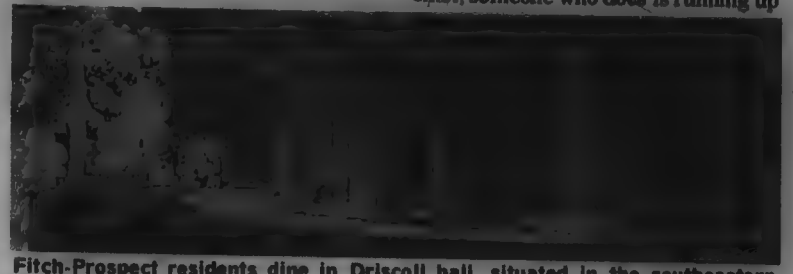
Prospect House overlooks the Berkshire quad and is the social counterpart of Fitch House. (photo by Finegold)

Frosh inclusion series

Quad offers advantages

The Berkshire Quad housing option, made up of Prospect and Fitch House, is seldom taken seriously by freshmen considering inclusion. This bad name is undeserved, according to most residents, who tell of the pleasantly surprised reactions of many first-time visitors.



Prospect House, the more modern of the two houses, offers single rooms to each of its residents. Included in these are 12 two room doubles with adjoining doors. Half of the room have walk-in closets, each with a double dresser and mirror; the rooms without walk-in closets are larger. All of the rooms feature picture windows with a beautiful view of the mountains.

Other advantages of "Pro" House include the in-famous J-B room, a spacious and quiet study room, a centrally located TV room, a game room with a ping pong table, a kitchen, a laundry room, and a piano. The house also has access to Driscoll Lounge, where pre-guest meal cocktail parties are held.

House members eat at Driscoll Dining Hall, the smallest of the major dining halls. Its variety of food and its personal service combine to provide the advantages of both row houses and the large dining halls. Freshmen are invited to an open house on Sunday afternoon March 12. Refreshments and tour guides will be in the J-B room all afternoon.

Fitch House, composed of both Fitch and Currier Halls, is centrally located opposite East and Fayerweather in the Berkshire Quad. While several rooming arrangements exist, all residents have their own rooms. In Currier, singles, two-room doubles, and four-room triples are situated in hallways on three floors. Fitch offers singles and three-room doubles arranged in three entries. While all rooms are spacious, north and south entries are particularly noteworthy. All rooms in the north entry are huge singles, and living rooms in the south all feature fireplaces.

Downstairs in Fitch is the exotic, L-shaped Tiger's Den. Complete with T.V., bar, and kitchenette, the Tiger's Den provides the house with a great place for parties and events. Also downstairs is the rec room with pool and ping pong tables. Sliding glass doors open onto the Fitch patio and volleyball court. Rounding out the house facilities is the Currier living room, where residents spend time reading the N.Y. Times or just socializing. Fitch House members also eat at Driscoll Dining Hall, and share the Lounge with Prospect House.

Fitch-Prospect residents dine in Driscoll hall, situated in the southeastern corner of the quad.

Thoughts after an Evening with Chekhov

What is the meaning of this silly, sordid existence? What are we to understand from it all? Father Potemkin would reassure us with his religion, but how can he say God exists in a world of death, suffering and eight o'clock classes?

And why is happiness so alien to me? So much joy I see in the faces of others, and last night I watched as Uncle Vladimir got big laughs at the party with his lampshade bit. Of course Sister Vasha said it was silly, that Sonya was perfectly right in setting his hair on fire so his head would look more like a candle. How the guests were in stitches! Yet to me it all seemed so strange.

Perhaps life is all a dream and I don't exist. I asked brother Nikolai once what he thought of the idea that nothing existed and that it was all a dream. He said he wished he were dreaming me so that when he woke up I would go away. Then he boxed my ears. Nikolai was never one for philosophical discussions.

Still the thought haunts me and I am sure of only one thing; that if I don't exist, someone who does is running up large gambling debts in my name.

And where will we be 200 years from now? What a silly question it sometimes seems. In 200 years we will all be dead, what idiot doesn't know that? But how shall I be remembered? Is all of humanity doomed to run hither and tither, tither and hither until our tongues are tied up in knots? Are we like the migratory birds who fly south for the winter, get one look at the prices at the Caspian sea resorts, and turn right around and come north again—always moving but never going anywhere? Is existence really so meaningless, so fleeting, or is it as Dr. Smolnikov has intimated so often in our long private conversations and I am simply being an asshole again?

Vanya arrives tomorrow from Moscow. She will be bringing new boots and a down vest from L. L. Beansky for Nikolai since he has been accepted as a professor at the University and dress standards there are very strict.

She is beautiful and I love her, but I do not think she knows. When she visited last month, my family threw a great party and I tried then to tell her, but when I pulled her aside, she could only talk about my mother's guacamole dip. "What wonderful guacamole dip this is," I can still remember her say. For three hours she praised the guacamole dip.

I think she is an idiot, but still I love her, and I don't know why. Nikolai says it is because I am an idiot too. Ha! Just because his paper on the comparative physiology of frogs and insurance salesmen has been so widely praised at the University, suddenly he thinks he knows so much.

Tomorrow for sure, I will tell Vanya my feelings. This afternoon Mrs. Romanovitch came with startling news. She said that there were rumors of a plot to assassinate the czar, but that Toumey had managed to escape.

Ah, but what side shows these things are in the play that is life. I hope Mr. Chekhov gets my note telling him that I will break his neck.

The Best Athletes of Winter

Men's Basketball

In a season marked by close losses and home court victories over Wesleyan and Amherst, Gerry Kelly and Matt Spangler stand out as top contributors to this year's basketball season.

Kelly, even though sidelined with an ankle injury for three games, was only 8 points behind Matt Spangler in total points, although he was the leading scorer, averaging 13.9 a game. Kelly came on strong at end of season, averaging 19 in the last four games, climaxing with 22 against Amherst. Early in season he was named to ECAC Honor Roll for 28 point performance against Tufts.

Unlike the injured Kelly, Matt Spangler was a solid performer all season long, and the second leading scorer (12.3) behind Kelly. He was also the leading rebounder, grabbing 7.2 a game. Matt was named to ECAC Honor Roll for games against Norwich and Connecticut College early in the season. He also finished strong averaging 15 points for the last three games while grabbing 11 rebounds a game for the same period.

Men's Squash

Every successful team demands a leader, someone who can instill spirit, and an outstanding player. Few teams are fortunate enough to have one member provide all these qualities, but men's squash captain and no. one player Arnie Cogswell supplied all this and an intangible something extra for the fifth place nationally ranked Ephmen.

Arnie Cogswell '78

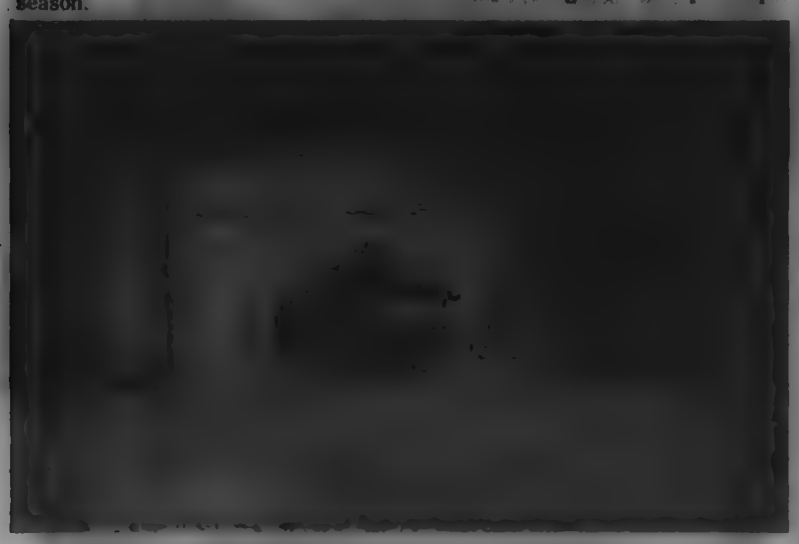
Cogswell managed to keep the racketmen's morale high after some early season losses to the best teams in the country. Following some tough losses to the top players in the nation in these matches, Cogswell came on to have an excellent last half of the season with five wins in a row. His season record is so strong that there is a chance he will be ranked among the year's top ten collegians.

Going into the season, there was one thing the members of the squash team were agreed upon; Martin Goldberg will not lose at the no. three position. Only a loss in the match against no. one ranked Princeton kept this prognostication from being the truth, as Goldberg completed the year with an 11-1 record, the best compiled by any Ephman.

Over the last two years Goldberg has amassed the best winning percentage ever for a racketman in the upper echelons of the ladder. His success can most be attributed to the extra hours of work he puts in after practice as well as the fact that he very simply hates to lose.



Goldberg advanced to the quarterfinals of the B division at the National Intercollegiate tournament where he was defeated by the eventual champion.

Men's Hockey

In the 1977-78 season soph. Mike Moulton provided Williams with some of the finest goaltending it has had in several years. He came off the bench midway through the season and proceeded to rack up 298 saves, a 4.00 goals-against average, and two assists to boot. Moulton was the only Ephman selected for the ECAC's weekly Division II Honor Roll, and had his finest hour in the Purple's make-or-break season finale against powerful Merrimack. In that game, Moulton stopped 32 of 34 shots before an injury forced him out of the game late in the second period.

Dan Sullivan, a junior center, was the team's best all-around player. He scored 14 goals and 18 assists and led the team in shots attempted. Sullivan, an assistant captain, also played strong defense throughout the season, and he appeared in first-line action in every one of Williams 21 games.

Senior Peter Gonye, the team's fastest skater, took scoring honors in 1977-78. The forward racked up 17 goals and 19 assists, including two hat tricks. Gonye tallied three goals against Hamilton and two against UMass to keep the Ephs' playoff hopes alive until the last game of the season.

Men's hockey finished ninth in its division.

Women's skiing

Two members of the women's ski team must be considered the outstanding athletes of the team: Marty Epstein, captain and a senior, and Julie Ernst, a freshman. The two supplied the team's top finishes throughout the carnival season, both always placing among the first ten in at least one of the two alpine events.

Epstein's finest results include her victory in the Williams carnival giant slalom and a sixth place in the University of Vermont giant slalom. Also, in the slalom, her strongest event, she placed third in two races and sixth in two races.

Ernst captured one sixth and one seventh place in the giant slalom, and she had a third, a fourth, and an eighth place in the slalom.

Epstein and Ernst, along with freshman Kathy Lane, are in New Mexico with coach Judy Zimicki this week to compete in the women's national collegiate championships.

Women Hoopsters

The women's basketball season, played by unexpected losses and disqualification from the Massachusetts tournament, did have its bright spots due by and large to the consistent play of co-captains Maggie O'Brien and Anne Youngling. O'Brien, leading the scoring in almost every contest, could always be counted on for over a dozen points and strong offensive play. Her coolness on the court and team leadership throughout the season made her an unquestionable asset to the squad.

Youngling, back from a knee injury which kept her sidelined last year was also a regular offensive leader for the Ephwomen, in addition to her role as the top rebounder for the squad. Youngling's ability to turn the game around by providing a much needed spark to the team's play was key again and again all season.

Grapplers

The Williams wrestling squad earned its best record in recent years this season, quite a finish for four year top wrestler and team captain Hal Zendle. Zendle, having pinned down a third place New England finish, traveled to Illinois last weekend to compete in the Division III NCAA tournament. Zendle returned to Williamstown with an eighth place ranking in the nation's 118 lb. class. Zendle, pulling off important victories all season long, fell short of All-American honors, but, as coach Dailey noted "did a fantastic job," placing higher in the final standings than any New England wrestler who qualified for the nationals.

Men's skiing

Five Williams skiers: Andy Mikell, Don Tarinelli, Josh Dembrinski, Jeff Magoon, and Jeff Hastings, having brought the Eph's ski team to excellent carnival finishes led the team to a tenth place finish in the NCAA competition last weekend.

Tarinelli, with a 15th place finish in the slalom was a top contender all season, along with Mikell who finished 35th in the giant slalom. For the jumpers, Frosh Jeff Hastings had a 14th place finish that iced his season, which included a new jumping record for Williams.

Cross country expert Magoon placed 16th in the nationals, hampered by a spectator's interference in his top performance. Magoon anchored the Ephwomen's nordic division this season as a consistent top finisher.

Women's Squash

The women's squash team finished a successful season clinching a third place ranking at the national women's intercollegiate squash tournament last weekend. Team performance this season was highlighted by depth throughout the ladder, with two young squash players shining on the courts for Williams. Sophomore Becky Chase, well known for her tennis skill, and frosh Mary Tom Higgs, stood out among the many strong players as a result of their determined performances against tough opponents Yale and Harvard. Both Chase and Higgs won opening round matches at the nationals, losing their second match to finish well in the consolation round.

Against Harvard, Chase defeated her nationally seeded opponent for an outstanding performance for Williams. Chase, meeting one of many formidable foes in her Yale match, lost a close one to her strong opponent.

Team newcomer Higgs had an outstanding season compiling the largest winning streak for the squad. Higgs was one of three victors for Williams against Yale.

Women Pucksters

Senior Liza Olsen deserves much credit not only for her performance as co-captain of the women's club hockey team this season, but also for the time and effort she has put into establishing women's hockey as a bona fide club sport. Having played in high school, Liza brought with her to Williams her enthusiasm for the game of hockey. She has been involved with the sport since her arrival at Williams. Liza played in P.E. classes her first two years here, then during her junior year, she co-founded the women's club team (complete with intercollegiate schedule) along with Jane Lester '77.

During the Ephs 5-6 season, Liza scored 5 goals, making her the team's second leading scorer.

No hockey team can survive by playing offense alone, and the women's hockey team is no exception. Junior Marty Taft, co-captain of this year's squad and leading scorer on defense last season, did not score any goals this season, but this did not lessen by any means her importance to the team's defensive effort.

A strong skater, Taft possesses the instincts of a defenseman; she can do it all—poke check, block shots, clear the puck from the defensive zone to initiate the offense. Her command performance and knowledge of the game of hockey inspired and aided her fellow defensemen throughout the season.

Swimming

A psyched and shaved men's swimming team swam to an outstanding second place finish at the New England's last weekend, partly on the strength of co-captain Paul Vom Eigen. Vom Eigen, consistent winner over the 6-2 season, took two thirds in the 100 and 200 breaststroke at the New Englands. The senior co-captain also grabbed second in the 400 MR for a new Williams record of 3:33.3 to go along with his record of 1:01.7 in the 100.

Sophomore Brian Volpp sliced seconds off his best times at the New Englands as he finished in the top 16 in three events. The excellent finish at the competition was the culmination of a developing season for Volpp who consistently bettered his personal times throughout the season.

Women's swim team members look to two jack-of-all-trades, co-captain Nina Murphy and sophomore Keron Walker, as they finished with a decisive 6-1 record. Murphy swam virtually every event, which brought her a variety of first place finishes. She placed in the top 16 of every event at NE including her contribution to a 2nd place record setting 800 FR and ninth place record setting 400 Mr.

Track

Despite the loss of the Little Three crown, there were bright spots for the Williams indoor track team this season as Phil Darrow, Larry Tanner, and Ron White had strong season for the squad.

Frosh Darrow, the team's mile specialist, ran a 4:14 race at the New Englands for his best time of the year, two seconds off the Williams record time. Darrow in his first effort at the N.E. placed fifth for the Ephmen.

Senior Larry Tanner '78 mastered Williams 35 lb. weight throw breaking his own record three times this winter in duel meet competition. Tanner's throw of 57'3" took him all the way to a fifth place finish at the Easterns.

Although White's season ended in a pulled muscle following the trials at the Easterns, the 60 yard hurdler was ranked among the top contenders for the Easterns. One of the Epha's tri-captains, White was a consistent performer in regular competition.

Keron Walker, NE champion in the 50 free and 50 fly reigns supreme as queen of women's swimming with ten record breaking performances this season.

this goal had been nearly achieved. The result has been the formation of club sports which get little funding from the Athletic Department and are left to find other sources of financial support.

Several students proposed the establishment of a regular means by which students could evaluate coaches. Such a device, it was decided, would have to be left up to the discretion of the individual coach and would follow the general format of classroom evaluations.

A request that hair-dryers be provided in the men's locker room was met with a promise that they would be purchased.

Members of the Athletic Committee stressed that it should be an avenue of communication for student queries and requests. All of its meetings are open and will, in the future, be announced in the Register.

VOL. 91, NO. 39 WILLIAMS COLLEGE

"Non-college visitors" attend

Party turns into town brawl

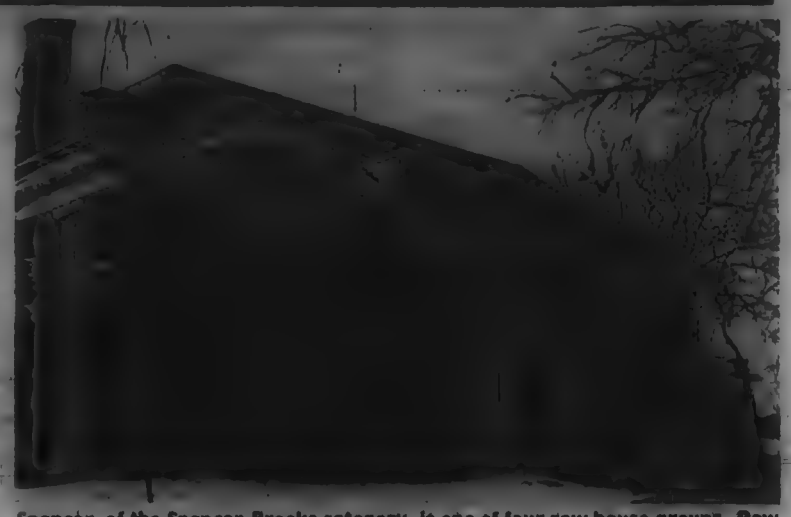
Billed as "an experience you'll never forget," last Saturday's St. Patrick's Day party at Greylock Dining Hall ironically fulfilled its prediction as College security, in agreement with the party's sponsors, closed down the celebration at midnight, an hour before planned.

An altercation in the nearby parking lot, at about 11:00, prompted the premature closure, according to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad. Earlier, at approximately 10:30, a scuffle took place inside the dining hall, but security quickly suppressed the incident.

Witnesses to the party attributed the unusual raucousness to the numerous uninvited non-College visitors in attendance. "I don't know anyone here," became the universal conversation-opener.

"Parties Inc.," a group of students who sponsored the event, emphasized that the concatenation of incidents was "completely unexpected." One member of the group noted that the non-College visitors arrived before 9:00, the scheduled opening time, and before security had arrived.

No problems occurred before 10:30, according to witnesses, and security put down the later isolated disturbances. A broken pane of glass in a downstairs door appeared to be the only damage resulting from the party. Some vandalism to cars was reported, but no persons at the party have been implicated.



Morrow House of Smith College, and two additional groups of Smith women aided in the funding of the St. Patrick's Day celebration. "We wanted to further social interaction and have a good party," said one member of 'Parties Inc.' who felt "upset" over the actual outcome.

The group had planned what they had intended to be "fun and different" events, such as an Irish Jig Dance and a "Colleen contest," in which a panel of judges would have picked out the most beautiful girl in attendance. The disturbances prevented those and other events from taking place.

Roosenraad praised the "fine cooperation from (College) students" in assisting security in clearing up the disturbances. He sees the occurrences last Saturday as having no effect on any future Greylock Dining Hall parties.

Parties Inc. formed out of a group of students who wanted to "improve the quality of parties on campus." The numerous "gimmicks" originally planned for the celebration, and the co-sponsorship with the Smith women were attempts at this goal.

The various members stated that they felt "disappointed" and "apologize to Williams and other invited students" for the early closing.

Spencer, of the Spencer-Brooks category, is one of four row house groups. Row houses offer a more homey atmosphere than most campus housing. (Finegold)

Last of inclusion series

Row houses - luxury and distance

The Row Houses, one of the five upperclassmen housing options, offer unique advantages of privacy and close-knit communities. The Row Houses include four separate housing units: Spencer-Brooks, Perry-Bascom, Fort Hoosac, and Gar-Wood. Each of these units includes a varied number of buildings associated with the main house.

Spencer-Brooks (includes Woodbridge) places most of its sophomores in West College (used for Row House overflow), where the majority of rooms are singles. However, sophomores associated with Spencer-Brooks are allowed to use the facilities of the main houses: a study with a fireplace and a large living room in Spencer; the dining hall, TV room, a living room with a fireplace and piano in Brooks, and the kitchen facilities in Woodbridge.

The spacious rooms of each house which are assigned to juniors and seniors can compensate for the year spent in West.

A member of Perry-Bascom (which includes Chadbourne) claims that the house is an active spot with numerous social events. Perry, where most activities are located, sponsors big parties during the three major weekends of the year. Perry houses 14 men in the main part and eight women in the wing; all rooms are two-room doubles. Bascom is single-sex by floor, with 13 women and six men all in singles. Chadbourne is also single-sex by floor, with 11 men and four women in a combination of singles and doubles. All Perry-Bascom members eat at Perry, which has a living room, library, large TV room, fooz-ball, and pool table.

Fort Hoosac includes two co-ed houses (Agard and Doughty) and two single-sex houses (Fort Hoosac for men and Susie Hopkins for women).

Gar-Wood, the smallest living unit, consists of Garfield and Wood Houses. Although traditionally single-sex, house members are beginning to discuss the possibility of co-education next year.

Present renovation of Garfield, to be completed before the fall, will create 33 singles and a double.

One of the main advantages of the Row Houses is their close, homey atmosphere. All houses serve sit-down dinners every night, and their small size encourages close friendships among house members.

Baker organizes faculty committee on divestiture

Williams Faculty and Staff for divestiture, a committee organized by Assistant Professor Raymond Baker to "lobby and attempt to influence decision-makers at Williams in favor of South African divestiture," met for the first time last Tuesday night to set up a governing board and organize a number of special subcommittees to deal with specific issues.

The newly-formed faculty committee will work closely with the Thursday Night Coalition's anti-apartheid group, headed by Steve Horton '79. Among its immediate plans are a meeting with the Trustees' shareholder's committee (the creation of an on-campus information center of South Africa) and a second panel discussion on divestiture, to be held sometime in the spring. A subcommittee headed by Charles Payne will undertake a nation-wide coordinating effort with other anti-apartheid groups.

The governing board of the faculty group is composed of Professor John Eusden, Assistant Professors Raymond Baker, Melvin Dixon and Charles Payne, and Thea Erickson, wife of Assistant Professor Peter Erickson. Other faculty members directly involved with the organizing of activities are Robert Jackall, Rick Nuccio, Tim Weiskel and Robert Peck.

Baker, the committee's instigator, sent letters to all faculty members requesting support for its formation. He received 25 positive responses, which he called "a good indication that the faculty feel that divestiture is the appropriate thing to do." About 17 were present at the group's first meeting.

Rothstein '78 runs for House seat

by Chris Ross

While many observe "the system" around them, discover its faults, and criticize it, few commit themselves to correct those faults. Steve Rothstein '79 from Brookline, Mass. is the exception. He plans to run for the State Legislature this fall in order to implement ideas which will help both Brookline and other communities in the state facing similar problems. Last week, Rothstein was elected to a position on the Village Council.

Public transit, education, tax reform, urban development and the elderly are issues which Rothstein regards as of special concern to himself, and his region. "I think an official should spend some time on issues which affect his or her constituents directly," he stressed.

Rothstein is carrying a full load of courses this semester, but since two of these are an independent study project and a senior thesis, his hours are flexible enough to permit him to spend four or five days per week in Brookline. There he attends meetings with influential individuals, writes letters to the editor of the local paper articulating his stand on different issues, stuffs envelopes, and holds fund raisers. Since he has not yet officially announced his candidacy, he limits his campaigning to making contacts and meeting with town organizations and activists. He has found from his experiences in political life thus far that "there are a lot of good people, interested people and a lot of potential for positive change."

This summer's campaign is extremely important, as he prepares for the democratic primary September 19. In the predominantly democratic town of Brookline, this primary is "tantamount to the election" in November. He will run against an incumbent and another challenger for a two-year term.

Rothstein is not a political novice. His experience ranges from a job as legislative assistant at the State House to assisting the campaigns of Senator Edward Kennedy and Birch Bayh. In addition, he topped the ticket last week in a seven-way race for five seats to become town meeting representative for Brookline.

The 21-year-old Rothstein recognizes that his youth may be a handicap in the campaign. If elected, he will not be the youngest to sit in the Massachusetts House, since a few individuals in past years were 19 at the time of election. Rothstein's recent graduation from college may be an advantage as some of his ideas for community and state improvements are based on his research. He is presently researching urban transportation policy for his senior project and suggested that he might introduce legislation to improve the Boston transit system if elected.

Rothstein views the most positive aspect of being involved in politics, as "a combination of working with people and being able to make some small changes." Because he enjoys working with people, he rarely dislikes his campaign duties, but those he does dislike he regards as "tools to the end."

Rothstein regrets that politics has taken him away from the college and his friends, but he points out that it has also given him the opportunity to meet people in public affairs, to work toward improving his community and his state, to begin a career and to learn more about himself. The most exciting part of his campaign experience will be, he decided, "when I win."

Steve Rothstein '78 is running for Mass. State House representative this fall from Brookline, a suburb of Boston.

Election results

Fargo becomes CC president

Bronson Fargo defeated John Svoboda in the run-off elections held for College Council presidency last Thursday and Friday. Fargo tallied 508 total votes to Svoboda's 469, a difference of 39 votes. Upperclassmen voted 361-347 for Svoboda; freshmen 161-108 for Fargo.

In the contest for vice-president, Chris Jenkins outpolled his fellow sophomore Byron Walker 472-397.

At-large members of Council are Jon Ballon, Beth Geismar, '80, Dunreith Kelly '80, Janet Lavin '81, Darrell McWhorter '81, and Randy Wang '80.

Joel Smith '79 was elected as at-large member of the Committee on Educational Policy. Tad Roach, Bart Mitchel, and Andy Masetti won run-offs for CEP Division I, II, and III posts. In other run-offs, Bill McCalpin '79, Carrie Brown '80, and Anne Ricketson '81 became class representatives on the Committee on Undergraduate Life with Chris Diangelo '79 as at-large.

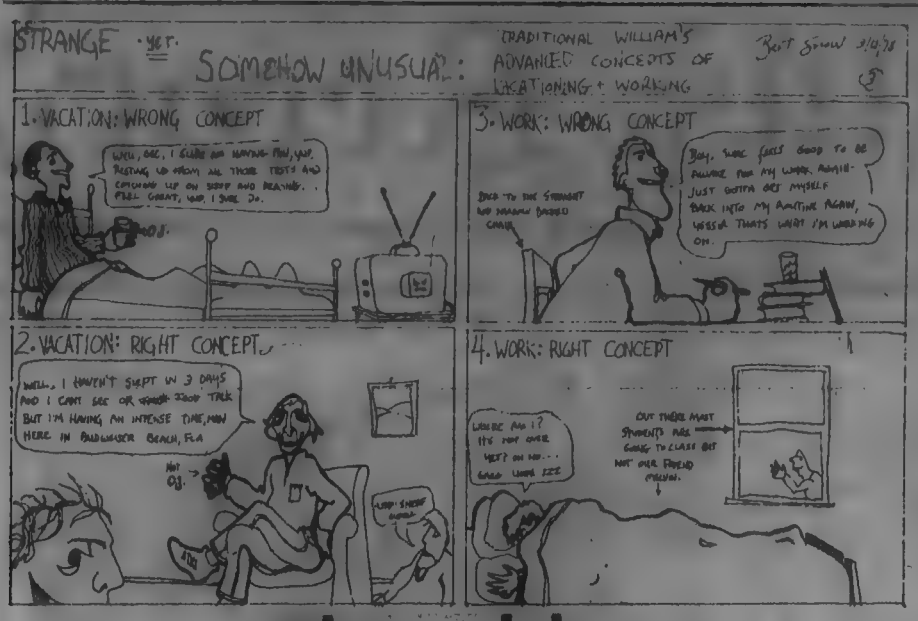
New members of the Honor and Discipline Committee are Lisa Halperin '79, Paul Rogers '79, Eric Bjornlund '80, David Sorkin '81, and Christel Albritton '81.

Student housing update

Inclusion

Freshman inclusion lists will not be ready until the Friday after Spring break, Dean Cris T. Roosenraad said Monday. The Housing Committee, for a number of reasons, could not set targets for inclusion at its meeting yesterday, so the computer will be unable to assign freshmen to upperclass houses.

One of the problems, Roosenraad said, was that the JA selection committee had not chosen next year's JAs yet. Since they did not know what houses would have extra rooms, the Housing Committee could not assign the spaces to freshmen.



Transfers

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) approved a Housing Committee proposal to allow inter-house transfers to rank the fifteen houses to which they would like to move. In the past transfers have only been able to list the four or five freshman inclusion groups.

One of the attractive features of the new proposal, Roosenraad said, was that it allowed people to choose houses on other than architectural grounds. Now, transfers will be able to choose a house because of physical location, or the number of affiliates instead. More appealing to the CUL, this system maintains the element of "risk" incorporated in the current plan. An upperclassman applying to transfer may list his present house anywhere in his list of priorities, or may omit it altogether. If he fails to get into one of his preferred houses, there is no guarantee that he will return to his current house.

Coop housing

Nine groups of seven students applied to live co-op in Lambert house next year. The CUL tried to fill Goodrich house with groups of two, three or four students. The house holds eleven, but only seven people applied. The CUL has yet to decide whether to return Goodrich to the Dodd group, or allow Lambert's unsuccessful applicants to apply there for co-operative living.

The old . . .

Today is Tom Herwitz's last day as College Council President. He took control of the CC in the aftermath of the Gladden Forum on student power. At that time Gladden had seceded from the council to protest student impotence in initiating change in the College. A major part of the problem resulted from the CC's decision to react to administrative decisions rather than to confront the College with its own innovations.

Under his leadership, the CC has reversed the situation, presenting the faculty and administrators with a student viewpoint and forcing them to react to us instead.

The issue of sexual orientation and the non-discrimination clause of the handbook is a prime example. Though we do not necessarily agree with the aim, the method was superlative. The council proposed a course of action and brought it to the faculty, to the President and, via Gargoyle, to the trustees. In each case the College reacted to the students on the students' terms.

Whether the students have increased their influence, or whether the council represents a majority of the students is open to debate. On balance, though, we applaud the trend toward activity along with the interest and concern it has generated.

We praise our dynamic CC President for his role in this, and hope he enjoys the vast quantities of leisure time he will inherit at the termination of his official duties.

. . . and the new

As Herwitz and company move out of office, Bronson Fargo '79 and Chris Jenkins '80 will move in as College Council President and Vice-President. They inherit an active council and myriad issues which will greatly affect student life. If they can continue to lead student opinion they will overcome the questions of legitimacy raised last week and build a strong council for their successors next year.

We hope Fargo and Jenkins can do this. We think they can. At the last trustee meeting Fargo and Gargoyle demonstrated their grip on the issues that confront the campus. Jenkins, complements Fargo's relative inexperience in dealings with the council. He brings better than a year of CC service and know-how to his post. Together they have the unusual opportunity to smooth the transition period between administrations—we hope Fargo will take advantage of Jenkins' skills, especially in the early weeks.

The important part of Fargo's job will be to get student opinion taken seriously inside Hopkins Hall. He must convince the administration that the CC is the voice of the students. To do that he must first convince the students that the CC can articulate the demands of all the students, and not just for a collection of vocal minorities. This will require sustained super-human effort if they are to pull it off. Good luck Bron and Chris.

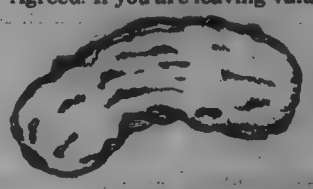
Counterexamples

The Mercury Column

"Is one of your jobs to write that humor column?" I was asked after I took over the job of Energy Czar. The question came out sounding faintly accusatory, as though I had been caught grading quizzes to the base 12. So: This week no humor, but instead a collection of legitimate exceptions to our energy-saving ideas and directives. The names have been suppressed to protect the innocent.

In response to continued pleas to turn out unneeded lights, one student observed that lights were left on in the house living rooms for the safety of those coming in late. Agreed. We do that in our house, too: One upstairs and one down, each a 7½ watt bulb. But please turn them ALL OUT when you leave for vacation.

One Bronfman scientist allowed as how turning off unused equipment was not always the most conservation-minded thing to do. He has a cooling device (or heating, I forget which) that uses more energy to get to operating temperature if started up each morning than if left running all night. Agreed. I have yet to hear of any appliance which requires less energy when left on, unused, all spring vacation. TURN YOURS OFF.



I am informed that paintings in the art museum are adversely affected by wide temperature fluctuations, so that it is important to keep night-time temperatures rather higher than elsewhere on the campus. Agreed. If you are leaving valuable paintings in your room over vacation, papal dispensations are available from the Energy Czar.

A faculty member whose office is full of plants keeps his blinds open all night. He remarks that he will close them when his office temperature ceases to be 10 degrees higher than that in his house. Agreed. It is as hard for people to work in overheated as in underheated areas. But check your thermostats and turn them DOWN while no one is there.

A student who lives in an "older" (translation: ramshackle) dormitory remarks that it is hard to get excited about one extra light bulb when the snow is blowing in around the window frames. Agreed. Also agreed that it is impossible to justify a 65 degree thermostat setting to a secretary sitting in an "older" office building when the temperature at floor level is only 55 degrees and drafty. Don't shoot the piano player (as the sign read in the Yukon bar), he's doing the best he can. We keep trying.

To reinforce the above, here is a chilling (sic) fact to last you through vacation: A glass window 25 feet square emits the energy equivalent of 11 KWH on a 20 degree day. PLEASE PULL THE CURTAINS in your room before you leave for Florida. If you all come back sporting a good sunburn, we can shut down the heating plant in April, which is one of the six winter months in Williamstown.

No flu blues with blessed penny

by Peter Rintels

During the recent flu epidemic, the situation was hardly one of misery loving company. As far as I could tell, misery had more company than it could stand, and I sometimes began to feel left out because I remained healthy during it.

What, you may be wondering, was my secret? (You may also be wondering why, if it works so well, did I keep it a secret? Well stop asking so many questions so I can get on with this story.) The reason I stayed healthy is that a Philadelphia palm reader, a certain Sister Rachel, blessed my penny. The story behind this is as follows.

The Friday of Winter Carnival weekend some friends of mine and I were in Philadelphia doing one of my favorite things in big cities of that sort: leaving. As we were driving along an unknown sidestreet, we passed a small store front with a sign indicating that it was a walk-in palm reading parlor. Our curiosity got the best of us, so we immediately parked and in no time found ourselves shelling out two dollars apiece to find out about our past, present, future, and whatever else we had any questions about.

We all found ourselves being told disconcertingly true things about our pasts and the usual wonderful news about our futures. When she got finished with my palm, Sister Rachel told me to take out a penny, which she blessed and insisted would now give me good luck. Judging from what happened after I returned to Williams that night, she knew what she was talking about. That evening I got into the film society show free because my ID number matched their computer list and Saturday I doubled my money at Winter Carnival casino. On top of that, I did not, and still have not, caught the flu.

So that is how I managed to stay healthy this past month, and I think this story pretty well puts the lie to Dean Berek's contention last month that "there are no magical cures for the flu." Indeed there are, and anyone with two dollars can go down to Philadelphia and buy one.

Speaking of Dean Berek, his statement that he would look kindly on requests for extension from anyone who got sick during the epidemic has, I am told, led some enterprising students to offer to infect anyone who stayed healthy but managed to get behind anyway. The price is ten dollars.

Letters: Trustees seek input in policy-making real bias

To the editor:

In their zeal to see justice done Elisa Waingort and Gregory Weber (Feb. 28), have taken it upon themselves to extend the province of their specific and legitimate complaints to a point approaching absurdity. To object to the Record characterizing Mary Leakey as "the wife of the late anthropologist," though valid, is petty and irrelevant—all the statement does is establish a connection with a more familiar figure. To then take the quantum leap, in a progression I did not quite follow, from "covert linguistic biases," to a discussion of poverty in poor countries, and to place the two issues (if the preceding protest can be dignified by such a term) on the same level of magnitude betrays both ignorance of these conditions and faculty logic.

Both as a citizen of India and as a person who has lived in several underdeveloped countries in Africa and Asia I can only be amazed that Elisa and Gregory should presume to link relatively insignificant gripes to perhaps the most important problem facing mankind today. It almost seems as if the very vocal minority that makes up the Thursday Night Coalition (specifically mentioned in the letter) has become so used to the idea of espousing "liberal" causes that it has lost the facility of distinguishing between them, a circumstance that can only hurt them and those they purport to be trying to help. Finally, for these individuals to characterize themselves as "enlightened students" represents the height of pretension and is an insult to those members of the student body who disagree with their views—an example, perhaps, of the "self-serving egoism" which they deplore in the letter.

Arun Swamy '81

thanks, good luck

To the editor:

I wish to express my gratitude to those who supported me in this past week's election. I appreciate your effort. I also wish to extend congratulations and best wishes to the team of Fargo and Jenkins, and all others elected to office this past week.

Byron F. Walker '80 correct perspective

To the editor:

In the past few days, conservatives have been commenting about the issue of divestiture. These observations, such as Larry Mitchell's piece in the Record, have been sarcastic and mocking. Clearly the TNC is not being taken seriously—which is a shame from both the conservative and liberal vantage points. If the anti-divestiture people simply sit on their rears and tell dirty jokes about the TNC, the administration will not have heard a coherent, student, anti-divestiture position and given the dynamics of college politics, there is the chance that the administration would agree to sell off our South African stocks.

Secondly, I am saddened that, for some, the issue of South Africa has become a joke. Questions of moral and political responsibility may seem uproarious to us here in the Land of the Wallabee, but the oppressed and the poor might not have our sense of wit. It is not as if I am not willing to be mocked, God knows there are plenty of reasons to do so, I just feel that debate on a high plane would be preferable for all, even if not desired by my conservative friends.

Merce Cunningham and Dance Company enthralled the audience here Saturday night.

Merce Cunningham puts his 'best foot forward'

by Julie Bernard

Upon receiving a Williams College citation for his significant contribution to dance, Merce Cunningham recited an anecdote of his mother's advice: put your best foot forward,—and that's exactly what he and his company did in their performance here last Saturday night.

The lower basketball court in Lasell Gymnasium was transformed into a dance event. Bodies clad in shiny grey suits reflected the stage lights as they moved to a background of electronic sounds. The performance billed as "not so much an evening of dances as the experience of dance," was composed of excerpts from Cunningham's repertoire chosen especially to suit the space in Lasell gym.

Cunningham's innovative principle serves as the basis of his choreography. It is the concept that dance should be enjoyed for the movement's sake alone, without the added effects of plot, symbolism, or specified moods. The choreography does not even seem to on the music in fact, it is the other way around. The music is added to the movement and is improvised differently at each performance. As one dancer phrased it, "I only hear the music when I'm not moving. It is enough to just concentrate on the dancing."

But for the audience it is different. The music does create moods and can make the same movement appear totally different. "It is just like everyday life," says Merce Cunningham. "The same gestures have various meanings at different times." The electronic music was supervised by John Cage. At times it was soft like the wind or underwater gurgles and at other times, it snorted, groaned or grew harsh, making piercing screeches.

As the musicians played with the sounds—the dancers played with the movement, for each other as well as for the audience. They paused to watch each other perform and then switched to fighting for the audience's attention by each doing different movements. Ensembles were juxtaposed against solos, duets, and trios. The combinations were infinite. Outbursts of sharp, crystal clear, quick motions were alternated with slower more somber ones. There were ingenious moments where in a seemingly frenzied crowd of dancers no person ever bumped into another.

Merce Cunningham's solos were fascinating. He played with the energy in his body, starting with a movement in one part and then allowing it to travel in quick rhythmic successions throughout the rest of his body. His sharp head movements were like the alert twitching of a nervous bird while a deep, concentration exudes a feeling of total control. The dance was a continuous pattern of different movements and games which were executed with such enthusiasm and energy that the carefully planned choreography looked more like a ceremonial of spontaneity.

Both Cunningham, and William Como, Editor-in-Chief of Dance Magazine and After Dark, well deserved the citations Williams College honored them with after the performance.

Kastle's opera 'Deseret' will be presented here tonight

Tonight at 8:00, Leonard Kastle's opera, "Deseret," will be presented in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The three-act work—which is slightly cut for this performance, will run 2½ hours including intermission. Six professional opera singers from New York will be accompanied by Andrew Clarke (Kastle's longtime collaborator) on the organ and by Kastle himself on the piano, rather than the usual 80-piece orchestra. Admission is free.

The opera will be performed in Pittsfield and then later in March at the Alice Tully Hall in New York City. Thanks to the benefit on an anonymous patron of arts in the Berkshires—seventeen years after its premiere on nationwide television on New Year's Day 1961, "Deseret" is coming back. In fact, these productions will be taped and broadcast over public television.

"Deseret" is based on an incident in the life of Brigham Young, founder of the Mormon Empire in Utah, whose capital (now Salt Lake City) was named Deseret. An eighteen-year-old girl, Ann-Louisa, comes to Deseret to become Young's 25th and last wife. Before the wedding, however, she meets and falls in love with a Union Army captain who has come to solicit Civil War funds from the Mormons. Torn between the sixty year old man her parents have chosen for her and the young officer, she decides to place duty before love. At that point, Young, remembering how God stopped Abraham from sacrificing his son, releases her from her vow and she becomes free to marry her true love. As the curtain falls, Young and his first wife promise each other they will always "go together."

As evident from its story, "Deseret" is a romantic opera. It draws on Mormon hymns for its themes and is unabashedly melodic and conservative in its harmonies. The love theme and the set piece typically associated with such an opera, for example—the love duet between Ann-Louisa and the captain, are plentiful. As Kastle says, "The opera is very old-fashioned. I think when it was done it was ahead of its time. I had C Major chords (the simplest chords in the harmony) and that wasn't chic then. I think now that has worn off. The garbage that passes for modern music has gone on since 1920 and it's had its chance. The opera is old-fashioned in the best sense, in that if you're writing music that will communicate, you're old-fashioned."

Due to numerous financial and other difficulties, the revival of "Deseret" has had some problems coming into existence; we are fortunate to be able to see it here, live, tonight.

Van Cliburn Ralph Votapek appeared with the Berkshire Symphony in Chapin Friday.

Cabaret Review

A salute to Lichtman

by Steven Robinson

One of the things we do least frequently at Williams is salute one of our own. Apart from Athlete of the Week, how often do we, as a student body, stand up and cheer for a colleague who has achieved something really extraordinary? Happily, we have abundant cause to cheer about the latest from the Williams Cabaret, The Music of Marc Lichtman '78.

The performance was great, all the way through, no exceptions. The singing by all members of the cast was inspired, but it was the quality of the music they sang that made the show so special. As I listened to the Saturday night performance, I had to keep reminding myself that this terrific music had been written by a Williams student. It all sounded like songs from the original cast album of some famous musical, the title of which I could not remember. It was Marc's night.

The process of becoming a good musician is, in part, the process of becoming ever more sensistive, increasing one's ability to respond more fully in one's playing or listening. As I slowly undergo this process, I find that I respond emotionally to a melody, improvised solo, or performance of extraordinary merit. Marc's music does that to me. It is stunningly beautiful music, and has the capacity to reach anyone.

Rumor has it that there is a prize given every year to an outstanding student artist at Williams. I'm sure many talented people deserve such a prize, but I wonder how many of them have won it as completely as Marc has. Marc has brought joy to those who have listened to his music. Those lucky enough to have played with him know him to be one of the best musicians on campus, and we have learned much from him. There is no one more deserving.

Outdistancing eight teams

Roadrunners top 24 hour relay

by Scott Lutrey

At 10:15 Sunday morning Renzie Lamb and his cleanup crew were the entire population of Towne Field House. But for the preceding twenty-four hours the field house was the tumultuous home of the Seventh Annual Williams Road Runners Club 24 Hour Relay. Nine teams of runners sped over 2004 miles around the oval track with spectators, entertainment, and resting runners milling about the infield adding to the spectacle.

As expected the Roadrunners won their own relay, travelling 259 miles, 234 yards during the affair; a modest performance resulting from a very low key, eye to survival approach this time through. The ten man, no guest miling, team averaged 5:33.4 a carry for 25 sessions apiece with the baton.

Despite oversized teams and guest milers the other eight teams ran less and looked worse Sunday morning as all once again attested to the severity of the event. The Faculty Vets were the best of the rest with a 235+ mile performance (6:06 a mile). Then followed Ft. Hoosac-Wood at 233½ (6:10), Mount Greylock boys 224 (6:26), Frosh Quad 222 (6:29), Spencer-Brooks 215 (6:42), ODA 213 (6:46), Striders of the Purple Valley 202 (7:07), and Mount Greylock girls 201 (7:20). Some fine talent was displayed on these squads and Mike Behrman as Roadrunner heir apparent will have to do some recruiting for his team next year in line with the last minute pirating of Dan Riley from Spencer-Brooks in return for the promise of an unsuspecting freshman for the midnight shift.

Ed Bacher '77 led off the Roadrunner effort with an eminently sensible and commendably cautious 5:59 first mile, a sober approach that lasted with occasional abberations until the final hour when enthusiasm overcame exhaustion and a string of five miles were run in 5:00 and below. For the most severe abberation of the early going Mike Behrman won the "Tom Cleaver Idiot Award" with a 4:51 second mile. In the final celebration Joe Kolb looked a shoe-in for the "Peter Farwell What me tired? Award" with a record breaking 4:43 final mile before Frank Carr sprinted a truly insane 4:38 to grasp the honors; Frank's effort also being the quickest of the entire night. And spreading his effort over the entire Relay Dan Riley ran away with the "Scott Lutrey Track Monopolist Award" by spending 2 hours, 32 minutes, and 48 seconds in carrying the baton over the course of the Relay, a full two seconds longer than Dan Sullivan. Other, less honored Roadrunners were Scott Lutrey '75, back for his seventh relay, Pat Dobson (winner of the "Stan Fri Diamond in the Rough Award"), Phil Darrow, and Peter Farwell '73, who can be held accountable for all of the above having founded the Relay.

What with Renzie's clean up crew having done their thing and the crowd at the whirlpool thinning out by now, Relay 78 can now be consigned to the dead past with excuses to many still sore muscles and the collecting of pledges now in full swing. The teams were fewer this year (down from thirteen), the crowd a bit less congested, the Roadrunner effort appreciably weaker, but it was the Relay and a true celebration of the joy of running. Besides, where else will four separate concerts: the Ephlats, the Williams Octet, the Pipe Band, and the Jazz Ensemble, come to you?

Baseball anticipates better season

by Frank Pergolizzi

The 1978 edition of the Williams College baseball team will rely upon experience, speed, and depth in an effort to improve last year's 7-11 mark. The 1977 season saw Williams win six of its first seven games, then lose ten in a row. With seven returning starters, this could possibly be the best team since Jim Briggs became coach in 1974.

Good baseball teams are usually strong up the middle, from the catcher to center field. This year's squad seems to fit the bill. Behind the plate will be junior Mike Krikorian. Krikorian spent last spring in Europe, missing the 1977 season, and may take a while to get back in form. "If Mike can match his playing of two year's ago, I'll have no worries about the catcher's spot," says coach Briggs. Backing up Krikorian will be junior Bob Kanell and John Thiel. Thiel, a linebacker on the football team, is out for baseball for the first time in college and has impressed Briggs with his preseason play.

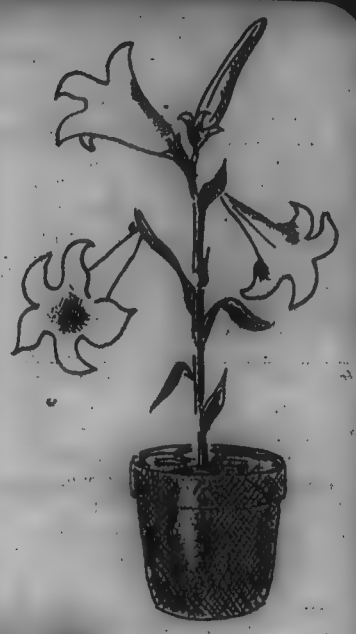
The pitching staff, while not overpowering, will be more than adequate. Headed by senior Steve Maier, it features a solid core of returning veterans. Senior Pete Kastrinelis, juniors Tony Stall and Tom Albert, and sophomore John Carey will all see plenty of action. The mainstay of the bullpen is senior Mike Martineau.

Captain Roger McEniry will fill the second base slot for the third consecutive season. "Roger is a tough hitter and excellent on the double play," says Briggs. The shortstop position will be a battle between Scott Harrington '78 and Rick Walter '80. Harrington played centerfield two years ago, shortstop last season, and will probably see action at both positions this year. Walter was the DH last season, batting .324.

The spearhead of an excellent defensive outfield is senior John Friborg '78. The speedy centerfielder led the team in stolen bases (12) last season, and was on base 60 per cent of the time, batting in the leadoff spot.

The corner positions in the infield will both be filled by returning starters. Bob LaBombard '78 will handle the hot corner; behind him is Joe Flaherty '80. Ken Hollingsworth '79 at first base will be backed up by pitchers Tom Albert and John Carey.

The two remaining outfielders are also returning starters. The right fielder will be senior Bill Masse. Left field will be occupied by junior Frank Kreutz. Kreutz hit a phenomenal .492 last season and is in Briggs' words, "the best hitter I've seen at Williams." The powerful junior also knocked in 23 runs last year and at one point ran off a streak of nine consecutive base hits. Rich Puccoi will back up Kreutz and Masse.



The DH position mostly handled by Walter last season, will be filled by many faces this year. With many quality players sitting on the bench, Briggs will put the DH position open to the hottest bat at the time.

"We hope this will be one of our better seasons," says Briggs. "If our seniors hold up, we have enough experience and depth to give our opponents some worries."

VOL. 91, NO. 40 WILLIAMS COLLEGE

Dick Gregory, well known as a popular comedian and speaker on a wide variety of humanitarian subjects, will address a Williams audience in Chapin Hall tonight at 8 p.m.

Political activist Dick Gregory speaks tonight

Dick Gregory, a man widely known as a comedian but who prefers the description "freelance humanitarian," will speak in Chapin Hall tonight at 8 p.m. The speech will cover a wide range of human affairs, seen from Gregory's standpoint as a human rights activist, social satirist and political analyst.

In the early sixties, Gregory established a reputation as a popular comedian. He capitalized on this fame to help advance humanitarian causes, participating in virtually every major human rights demonstration in the country. He gave numerous benefit performances for civil rights groups and later, during the Vietnam protest era, for anti-war protesters.

Political activism cost Gregory over a million dollars in cancelled bookings, travel expenses and legal fees. He also spent considerable amounts of time in jail, twice serving 45-day sentences for his part in demonstrations. He has used extended fasting to call attention to his humanitarian causes and once ran the 800 miles from Chicago to Washington, D.C. to call attention to world hunger.

Yale hosts conference

Divestiture groups go to forum

by Jim Coben

The Williams Student Anti-Apartheid Coalition and Williams Faculty and Staff for Divestiture respectively sent ten and four representatives to a conference at Yale University dealing with liberation struggles in Southern Africa. The conference, which lasted from March 31 to April 2, was organized by the Northeast Committee for the Liberation of South Africa, a group made up of representatives from ten New England colleges, as well as the American Committee on Africa (ACOA), and the American Friends Service Committee.

Over 400 people from colleges all over the nation came to New Haven to participate in educational workshops, panel discussions, films and cultural events focusing on South African affairs. The program was organized to mobilize opposition to U.S. involvement in South Africa, coordinate support for black majority rule and establish a regional communication network to unite the divestiture campaigns already begun at many colleges in the United States.

Representatives of black liberation movements in Mambia, Rhodesia, and South Africa gave detailed histories of the struggles in their homelands and expressed satisfaction that American campuses and community organizations were finally beginning to express solidarity with the cause they have been championing for many years. African black leaders, church representatives, and spokespeople for international lobby groups were unanimous in their call for disengagement of U.S. corporate and bank interests from S. Africa.

Jennifer Davis, research director for the ACOA, detailed the history of U.S. corporate involvement in South Africa. She stressed the implausibility of claims by individual corporations that they can be a progressive force in S. African politics. Support for the apartheid policies of the Vorster regime far outweighs the modest gains corporations can offer the limited number of blacks they employ, according to Davis.

Council debates on honors, proposes change for '80 class

The College Council has formally recommended to the Committee on Educational Policy that it vote to impose the new Latin Honors standards on the sophomore class. To date the faculty has mandated that GPA requirements for honors be increased beginning with the class of '79. If the CEP votes to accept this proposal it will be presented to the faculty at their meeting April 19.

At the Wednesday night CC meeting Larry Mitchell of the CEP clarified the Latin Honors issue. He pointed out that the CEP originally advised that the faculty make the changes effective beginning with the class of '80. The decision to apply the new standards to the junior class as well was unexpectedly made at a faculty meeting in mid-February.

Says Mitchell, "we all agree that the junior class has been treated unfairly." However, he added, "It doesn't make sense that people doing less than average work should get honors." Later he described graduation with honors as "meaningless and trivial."

Jane Garvey, also of the CEP, mentioned that "the faculty seem to think the whole thing is fairly absurd. By a vote of two to one, they were against hearing about Latin Honors again."

The "retroactive nature" of the faculty's decision particularly angered Jon Ballan '79. "I don't think the rules of the game should be changed in the middle," he argued. Harry Kelly of the Finance Committee also opposed the present Latin Honors standards, but for different reasons. "I don't believe honors should be determined by the number of people who get them," he said. "It should be done on the basis of merit."

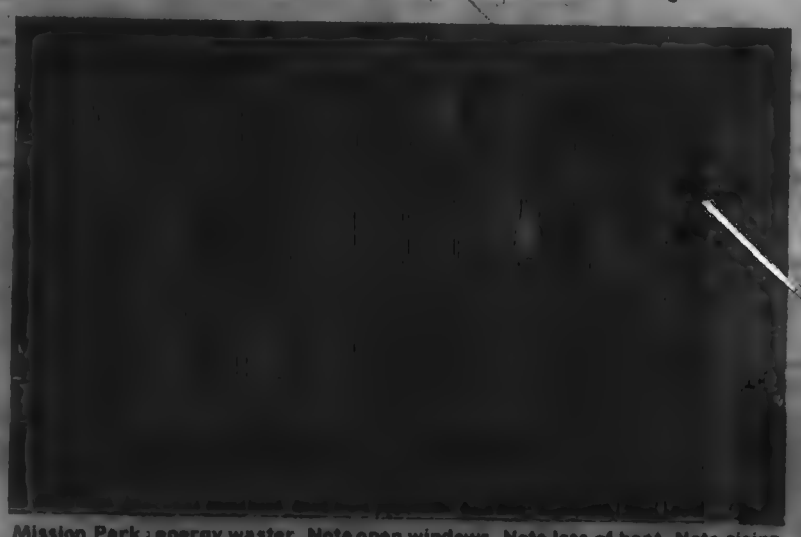
"Presently honors are basically worthless and create embarrassment for the students" who are included in the minority who do not receive them, Dean Peter Berek said. "Honors are only a way of escaping dishonor." He went on to say that he did not believe that students are studying that much harder than they did ten years ago, thereby not justifying the terrific rise in grades since then.

The Park exemplifies energy waste

by Sarah Austell

Four years ago the United States was going through an "energy crisis" in which every individual was asked to conserve as much energy as possible. Now, in 1978, with energy shortages as serious as ever, we're apt to speak of the "energy crisis" in the past tense. One look at Mission Park is convincing and one would think it never even happened.

On a typical day in late February or early March, it is a common sight to see curtains billowing out of the open windows at Mission Park. At the same time, the individual thermostats in those rooms are turned up, the heat switched on and the doors to the hallways wide open. This system of "air conditioning" is a costly one.



Last year the cost of heating the 96,000 square feet of space in Mission, including the dining hall, was $66,000 for two million kilowatt hours of heat. In other words, it cost 69c per square foot to heat a building which houses 296 people. At Greylock, the cost was $63,317 to heat 133,417 square feet, or 47c per square foot in a complex which houses 287 people. This large discrepancy has many causes.

First, the Mission Park building itself has drawbacks. Built at a time when the cost of electric heating was half of what it is now, replacing the steam tunnels from Williams Hall seemed an impractical, and expensive, alternative. Electric heat made sense in that year, but today the College is paying for it. Other energy wasting features of Mission Park include the massive single-thickness plate glass windows in the dining hall and in each individual suite, all uninsulated.

Even with these architectural problems, Mission has what could in effect be called a defense mechanism against wasted energy. This device is called a "loadshedder", a metering structure whose purpose is to measure both straight energy consumption in terms of hours, and demand consumption, the rate of consumption over any given 15 minute interval. The meter which measures demand consumption makes it possible to compare the demand at different times of the day, as energy demand varies immensely over a 24 hour period.

Since power companies scale their prices based on peak demand, charging more for electricity used during peak hours, this meter could be a helpful tool in conservation. The load-shedder itself helps to conserve energy; when demand reaches maximum it cuts off the heat in up to half of Mission, for an interval of 30

Winston's theory leads him to Princeton in '78

Economics Professor Gordon C. Winston has been named a Member of the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, N.J. for the 1978-79 academic year. At the Institute Winston will expand work he has done over the past ten years on the theory of industrial production by applying it to the economic theory of how people spend their time, including what he calls "the new home economics."

Winston says his concentration at the Institute for Advanced Study will involve a reformulation of the theory of how people spend their time. That theory, says Winston, starts with a mathematical model and its application to home, family, consumer and worker decisions. A relatively new branch of economics developed at the University of Chicago and Columbia University, it emphasizes economic factors in household decisions like work, marriage, and divorce. According to Winston, a clear picture of the economics of how people spend their time will provide a valuable tool for persons forming industrial policy.

During the past decade, Winston has intensively studied the question of why industrialists choose to operate their plants for only part of the day, this diminishing production capacity. "Maybe you pay a premium for people to work in the middle of the night," says Winston, "but you pay a premium to shut down, too."

Berrigan addresses arms race

The Rev. Daniel Berrigan, a Jesuit priest who drew national attention for his work against the Vietnam War, will address the issue of the nuclear arms race tonight at 6:30 p.m. in the upper room of the St. John's Parish House on Park Street.

Father Berrigan is a leading spokesman against the nuclear arms buildup. He was a vigorous opponent of the Vietnam War, and in 1967 was arrested in Catonville, Maryland, along with his brother Philip, for protesting the draft. After a celebrated trial and several months as a fugitive from the FBI, he served a two-year prison term. Since his release from jail, Father Berrigan has lived in New York City, lecturing, writing, and continuing his work against violence.

Pure Prairie League slated Spring Weekend

Pure Prairie League will kick off Spring Weekend on Thursday, May 4, with a concert in Chapin Hall. The appearance will coincide with the release of the group's seventh album. The RCA recording artists have had a string of hits, including "Amie" and "Two Lane Highway."

Pure Prairie League is one of the top concert attractions in the Northeast. Recent box office reports are indicative of the group's popularity. According to PERFORMANCE (magazine), P.P.L. played for more than 4000 people on March 6 in Utica, New York, and the concert grossed $22,000. Three days later in Binghamton, the attendance was 6404 and the gross $33,000.

ACEC Chairman Steve Case hopes to gross $5500 on the concert, given the 1000 seats in Chapin Hall and ticket prices of $5.50. He declared that the ACEC received a "good deal" in booking the group, but added that the organization expects to lose "several thousand dollars" after all costs are paid.

Program on Iroquois begins

A medley of films and a pair of speakers will highlight the Sociology Department's "Long House People," a program on the culture and contemporary politics of the Iroquois beginning tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Room 1 Griffin Hall.

Richard Chrisjohn, an Oneida artisan, will exhibit his works during the program. He also is a diplomat for the Iroquois nation, and was invited to the recent U.N. convention on Native Americans in Geneva, Switz.

David Honyoust is another Oneida leader, head of the Oneida's Warrior Society. He is active in his nation's drive to gain title to some 100,000 acres of land in central New York allegedly granted them under treaty. Honyoust, who visited Williams in February, will discuss native awareness and contemporary American Indian movements.

Organized by Ron Hamel of the Berkshire Native Rights Advocacy, the program also is being held in association with Asst. Prof. Charles Payne's Sociology 202 and 206 classes.

Who pays for divestiture?

by G. Bernard Hutchinson

Martin Luther King, Jr., is a pastor 10 years dead; a black giant betrayed by dwarves of envy, hate armed missionaries of Thor.

Martin Luther King, Jr., non-violent demonstrator, lived in the 10 years now dead age of my ignorance. Youth, a time of innocence for middle America, but for the blk soul it is a time of pain-agonized hopes of relief. Truth is suffering: fantasy dominates every facet of your thought process, no reality (except the realities of no affluence, poverty); you dream of being Willie Mays, white Superman-Hercules, anti-hero Jesse James. In this time of civil rights protestations civil rights are of no concern outside the classroom, only mid-day dreams.

I was supposed to evolve into the blk Brainiac 5, black-intellect super-genius. Ten years ago, as many of us were I was caught up in the musical rifts of irresponsible youth. Ten years past I was ignorant of an exceptional black man, multi-rhythmic orator, caught up in leading a multi-racial movement for the abolition of unhumanity operating in the white power structure of America. He was an unviolent man, non-reactionary; his unviolent nature was disturbed by an unfeeling bullet that could not shatter his soul, but unerringly pierce his life-spirit.

I was supposed to become a blk Brainiac 5, a blk scholar; but I am angered by my own late scholarship in Black (my own) history. How many of us know Black-American history? Even those, as I, who have gone to all black institutions failed to receive a significant smattering of the subject. My history has been suppressed; to serve what purpose? Why does America tolerate a megalomanic, egocentric, chauvinistic supercapitalist such as John Rockefeller, who continues to spew forth his ideological germ warfare, while it exorably demands the clandestine murder of Martin Luther King?

If one accepts the argument that blk history is negative American history, a history of neglection and suppression and reactionary repression, has not been taught, then one must wonder. There are lingering effects from the slavery tradition, and to teach the black something that might elicit negative responses or an unwanted amount of race pride, is undesirable and possibly dangerous. This refers back to the question of who feels threatened and of what. Since whites have power then it must be the continued control of it that obsesses them.

But what is this power? In America it is the ability to out-achieve your neighbor, to gain power over him through playing the game of capitalism better than he does. This set-up implies a number of things of which caste is one. To perpetuate the American caste system?! This may be one of the great motivating factors in all of untaught American history.

The black man is bottom on the totem pole (the Indian is buried beneath it); this is the tradition. I argue that if one if mistaught this and kept ignorant of its historical effects in perspective, there will be a number who will accept and acquiesce to this American tautology. Without a heritage to fortify him, the black man is more susceptible to the better manipulaters of American capitalism.

The systematic non-teaching of blk history erodes pride erodes
purpose determination
erodes
the black American as blk making him
Afro-Saxon,
History is gone.

Armed with a concept of multi-racial American history and the role of class in our society as the way of life, we, as blk Americans would have known that the establishment and the populace would never allow the development of a movement that would break this great chain of class. Society cuts off the head of these invading organs to [illegible] King was a planned [illegible].

What is the history we have not been taught? Daniel H. Williams, a black doctor, performed the first successful heart operation; Dr. Drew, innovator of plasma and the blood bank, died from loss of blood due to a car accident when he was refused admittance to a white hospital; William Monroe Trotter, an associate of W.E.B. DuBois, was the early-1900's precursor to the militants of the sixties; and Lewis Latimer, a black man, invented the first incandescent light bulb. These are instances I know; what are the others?

Looking through history back to DuBois, a man who pushed for blk solidarity and self-help, I see myself as a member of the intellectual elite, that talented tenth who go to college and graduate and lead the race. Well, that tenth has been graduating for 65 years now, but where are they going? Where is America going to let any blk leader take Afro-Saxons?

Martin Luther King, Jr., assumed a moral consciousness on the part of white America. How could he when history recounted with facts the insensitivity of whites to blks, an almost barbaristic cult of applied xenophobia.

Besides his myopic view of white consciousness, Martin Luther King, Jr., failed to note class distinctions. His entire philosophy of human rights was an egalitarian demand for the abolition of classes or racial distinctions. Although you get a degree of liberal middle class guilt and a few hedging concessions from the conservatives, you do not get radical change. In his prophetic vision King must have overlooked the historically ingrained habit of racism; racism had become institutionalized.

It sounds as if King, too, had been a victim of untaught history and his own moral myopia for good . . . his optimism for the insurgence of good in everyone. Maybe I'm a bit critical; I've tried to be, but even giants have flaws, if not they would never fall prey to dwarves.

In the aftermath of his assasination Martin Luther King, Jr. has ascended to another realm, to a plane more sublime. Blk American history is devoid of a demagogue or any man of stature; in this time after King, we've recognized what we lost.

A move towards Malcolm X and separatism surges across the blk community. This is an age of racial intolerance veiled behind a higher standard of living, greater numbers in college, and more laws on the books. King ameliorated our pain by trying to instill a love supreme in us all whether you were blk or white. He knew of our sufferings and the pain that came from our history which wasn't taught, but he wanted us to transcend the petty, to become blk giants ourselves.

We failed.

The antithesis of Malcolm is no more to be heard orating blk debts to blk history, America's debt to blks, everyone's debt to his brother. Those after me will not be in the aftermath of Martin L. King, Jr., but will read about him in those un-history books that never tell the whole story and never convey the man.

With the passing of the blk giant Thor has castrated my love for America.

Letters: praise, gripes, input and aid

Kudos

To the editor:

Augustin Hinkson's article on Haki R. Maduburi (2/24) is the best I've seen in the Record this year. His comments renew my confidence that Black students at Williams will continue to think about real concerns and keep the more superficial aspects of their college experience in proper perspective.

Clarence Otis, Jr. '77

Kudos?

To the editor:

Normally I would not write the Record because in four years (and one year after graduation) I have only found criticism for your articles which cover the useless banterings of college Council idiots and the self-named "elite".

However, on this occasion I see fit to praise you highly for finally coming to your senses and acknowledging the worthlessness of the College Council and anybody who runs for it.

Ever notice how hard it is to get people to vote in a College Council election?

Sincerely,
Steve Saunders '77

Computers

To the editor:

The Computer Services Committee, of which I am a student member, is currently in the process of choosing a computer which will replace Williams' present computers. Since this will represent a purchase of about half a million dollars' worth of equipment and services, I feel that the student body should have a chance to provide some input before the decision is made in early April.

The committee is currently leaning towards one of the following five computer systems: an IBM 370/138; a Digital Equipment Corp. Decsystem 20; a Sperry-Univac 1100/E; a Xerox (made by Honeywell) Sigma 5; and a Harris Corp. 135/6. I would appreciate knowing about any feeling any students might have regarding Williams' choice of one of these computer systems.

Sincerely,
Stephen Daniel '79

Student Support Group

To the editor:

The Student Support group is a diverse group of students who are actively gaining experience in different aspects of counseling through both formal and informal activities. We aim towards finding the community within our own group and using our experiences as a base to expand this sense of community to all students on the Williams College campus. We wish to emphasize the values of compassion and sensitivity in all of our encounters with others.

We have three main functions. First, we offer a supplement to the psychological services presently available at the school. Though we do not presume to call ourselves counselors in any grand sense, we feel we can offer help in emotionally critical situations by providing compassionate, uninvolved availability from the perspective of peers. As students we most likely share experiences and feelings similar to those seeking help.

Secondly, we are available more casually for talking, either on a one-shot or an extended basis in non-crisis situations. This, in combination with activities such as open workshops and the organization of small support or consciousness-raising groups, we feel is important to activating the concept of an expanding sense of community. We maintain complete confidentiality in all interchanges.

Finally, we wish to be a group in ourselves, hopefully to expand at the beginning of each new semester or set of formal training workshops. Through maintaining a somewhat stable inner group those directly involved in the group have the opportunity to develop a sense of what each other individual there has to offer and to be a part of an intense experience in interaction. In addition, we have a core responsible for the technical working of the collective.

Our location is the small room off of the waiting room at the infirmary. We are open twelve hours per day—from twelve noon until midnight. During these hours there is at least one person directly available at the infirmary, and s/he has access to referrals of additional people in the collective as well as [illegible] resources in the area.

The Williams Trio of Julius Hegyi, violin, Douglas Moore, cello, and Charles Joseph, piano, will play works by Dvorak, Dankner, and Badings tonight.

Music in Round ends season tonight

Music in the Round concludes its 1977-78 season tonight at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The program includes Dvorak's "Dumky" Trio, Mozart's Quartet in E flat, Dankner's Trio, and Badings' Octet. Admission is free with Williams I.D.

The Williams Trio, Julius Hegyi, violin, Douglas Moore, cello, and Charles Joseph, piano, will play the Dvorak work, a favorite chamber music work. The dumka is a Slavic folk song form, and in its quixotic, narrative character, it weaves from melancholy to sudden bursts of exuberance and back again.

Hegyi, Moore, and violist Susan St. Amour will follow with Stephen Dankner's Trio. Dankner describes the 1971 trio as "virtuosically scored for the three instruments," written in one relatively short movement. The first of the two sections in the movement begins slowly and lyrically and then leads directly into a fast section which utilizes the original lyrical mood as well as agitated ideas derived from the opening.

The instrumentation of Henk Badings' Octet is the same as that of Schubert's well-known octet: two violins, viola, cello, bass, clarinet, bassoon, and French horn. Hegyi, an expert in chamber music literature as well as performance, says that he knows of only these two pieces written for that combination of instruments, and, while the Schubert work was written some 150 years before the contemporary Dutchman wrote his, the latter is, says Hegyi, "just as engaging" as Schubert's. Playing this final offering will be Hegyi and his daughter Lisa on violin, St. Amour, Moore, David Cobb on bass, and Susan Hohenberg, clarinet; Stephen Walt, bassoon; and William Zsembery, horn. Hohenberg and Zsembery occupy the principal chair of their sections in the Albany Symphony Orchestra, and Walt is principal bassoonist of the Berkshire Symphony.

Schumann love songs performed

Griffin Hall Concerts will move to Weston Language Center for a program of songs by Robert Schumann on Sunday, April 9, at 8 p.m. All of the works date from 1840, the year of Schumann's courtship and marriage to the pianist Clara Wieck. At this time the composer produced many love songs that have become some of his most highly admired works. Admission is free and open to the public.

Judith Reichert, soprano, will open the program with three selections from Schumann's first collection "Myrthen". She will then perform the cycle "Frauenliebe und Leben", which tells of a woman's life and love from betrothal, through marriage and the birth of the first child, to the death of her husband.

Daniel O'Connor, baritone, will present the cycle "Dichterliebe", which recounts a springtime love that leads to disappointment and despair. The work closes with a piano postlude that recalls the poet's summer walk in a garden, where he seeks consolation among the flowers.

Victor Hill, director of Griffin Hall Concerts, will be at the Bechstein piano. All of the songs will be performed in the original German, but English translations will be provided.

'Distance Runner' criticizes boy's reformatory life

"THE LONG DISTANCE RUNNER", sponsored by Reel Vintage, will be shown tomorrow night at 7:30 in Bronfman auditorium.

by Spiro Rombotis

Tony Richardson, maker of the well known box office success "Tom Jones," directed and produced "Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner" in 1962. It is the story of an 18-year-old youth, Colin, the product of a slum environment who is sent to reform school where he becomes the top runner and the best bet in a race against a private school. Starting from this very simple plot, Richardson sketches a black-and-white caricature of Colin's life in the detention center. Colin, or No. 993, is plagued by memories of his earlier vagabond experiences and the death of his father.

A typical lower-income class London lad, Colin reminds one of Oliver Twist as he and his friend wander aimlessly in the London streets. They steal a car and try to break into a factory which results in Colin's arrest and incarceration. In the reform school, Colin emerges as the model inmate and becomes the superintendent's favorite due to his obedience and athletic skills.

Richardson focuses his criticism on the inefficient mode of operation of the reformatory. The officials of the center seem to be more interested in the outcome of the cross-country race and the center's reputation than with the rehabilitation of the inmates. Centuries of British educational principles are brought forward under Richardson's camera, exposing their inability to reform the boys through traditional methods such as whipping and military discipline. The reformatory turns out to be a traumatic experience for many of the inmates, in spite the superintendent's efforts "to channel their aggression into athletic activities".

Using Alan Sillitoe's novel as a basis for the screenplay, Richardson misses an excellent chance to make a strong criticism of the British reform system. Instead, he seems to wander between Colin's previous experiences and his efforts to become a top runner. The film's direction is brilliant in a few sequences, like the "disturbance" in the dining halls, or the punishment of Stacey, the "absconder." Walter Lassaly's photography is extremely successful in conveying both the atmosphere of the detention center as well as the uncertainty plaguing Colin's existence.

Pique, Back Talk editors discuss status

by Peter Kinnes

Back in the spring of 1975, Pique made its first appearance at Williams and like all nascent publications, it started off struggling to build a reputation and win the necessary College Council funds to keep it going. It was the underdog, trying to gain a foothold on campus alongside of the "established" student publications, which at that time consisted of the Record-Advocate (which has since become simply the Record) and the now defunct literary magazine, Knockabout.

Today, this is roughly the position in which Back Talk finds itself. Back Talk editor Ron White has been working hard this year to upgrade the magazine's quality. "I was not impressed with last year," he said. "We needed a good year this year. In order to compete effectively we had to come out with something good." Moreover, he adds, "I think we did it."

When asked about Back Talk, Pique editor Anne Eldridge finds it ironic that Back Talk is now looked upon as the "underdog" newcomer and Pique as the "established" publication. Eldridge joined Pique in the fall of 1975, her sophomore year, and can still remember the early struggles with the Finance committee for funding. She finds it disconcerting that people tend to forget that part of Pique's history and look upon it "as if it had always been around."

Competition between the magazines is low-key and both editors think it is healthy insofar as it exists. "We try to downplay the competition," explained White, "but it is healthy. It keeps us both on our toes. Plus, I think it enhances quality." White added that knowing that there is another magazine around encourages him to keep his "ear to the ground" for good pieces when they appear. Eldridge concurred, saying "I think any kind of competition is probably healthy."

One reason that competition is low-key is that both editors find they are getting plenty of good quality writing. Back Talk printed one out of three submissions for its last issue according to White, and he says that he is generally very pleased with the quality of the work his magazine is receiving. The number of submissions accepted by Pique varies from issue to issue and also between categories of writing. Poetry acceptances have been as low as one in ten and fiction is generally at around one in three. Journalism acceptances, said Eldridge, tend to be higher since Journalism is usually solicited and can be rewritten if necessary to iron out problems of style and clarity.

One place where the competition does make a difference is in the funding. The Finance Committee must each year decide to what degree it wishes to support the magazines. At present Pique is getting $3200 and Back Talk $2400. In addition, Pique does its own paste-ups (the paste-up is what is eventually photographed by the printer in the last phase of publication) and thereby saves as much as $300 on each issue.

Yet the issue of money prompts the question about the necessity of having two magazines which appear to occupy overlapping niches. It is a question inevitably asked of Back Talk since it is the more recent of the publications to appear.

Explained White, "The difficulty that one comes up against when there's only one magazine is that certain viewpoints and certain styles do not get expressed, for what ever reason." He compared having two magazines to having a two party system, saying that it encouraged a diversity of points of view.

Eldridge feels that the key issue in whether two magazines should exist is whether there is enough quality material to support them both. "If we can have two magazines on campus and they're both good, fine," she says.

White and Eldridge agreed that the style and nature of the journalism differed in the two publications. In general, said White, "the area that the articles cover are different," although that was less true in the most recent issues than in the past. For example, in their February issues, both magazines ran South African investment commentaries and also based their cover graphics on them.

Still, there are style differences. Eldridge says that Pique runs more of a "magazine" style of journalism, such as might be found in the Atlantic. She finds Back Talk's writing more "academic."

The magazines also have different roots. Back Talk is very firmly rooted in the minority (especially Black) community here. It grew out of a Winter Study Project by Leslie White, '75 in which she put together an anthology of Black student writings in a magazine called Black Sun. Explained Ron White, "That showed me something I hadn't noticed before, that there was a considerable amount of Black talent in writing, photography and so forth." Back Talk was started in order to tap that talent. "It began as a medium for Black expression," said White.

In its second year (last year), the magazine expanded to include submissions from all Williams students and this year it expanded again to include the faculty and off-campus writers. Today, the magazine is less than fifty per cent Black in staff and in contributions according to White, but he emphasizes that it still "takes a minority perspective."

Pique was begun as a result of what its founders, David Rollert, '75 and Jay Sullivan, '76, felt was lack of critical writing about Williams caused by the merger of the Advocate with the Record in 1974. Originally the Record was a straight news paper and the Advocate was a running commentary. When they merged, most people expected the two functions would be combined in one publication, but the Record-Advocate's focus came out being closer to straight news. As a result, Rollert and Sullivan founded Pique in the spring of 1975 and called it a journal of "commentary and ideas." It was never intended to be a literary magazine but began accepting poetry and fiction to fill the void left by the folding of Knockabout in the fall of 1975.

Eldridge said she still feels that, in a sense, journalism is the "core" of Pique. "If Pique ever stopped publishing journalism, it wouldn't be Pique," she says. The magazine does not consciously strive for any balance of fiction and articles however. "The overriding theme behind Pique has always been quality of material. We take the best of what we get and if we get ten good articles and one short story, we'll do it that way. If we get ten good stories and one good article, we'll do it that way." Insuring the quality of the material usually involves copious amounts of rewriting. "Nothing ever goes in verbatim," she says, with the exception of poetry.

oriented organization calling for the acceptance of social and moral responsibility by corporation shareholders, described the growing call for divestiture on college campuses as "an important statement of solidarity." Smith went on to say that even the most conservative churches within South Africa are urging foreign investors to limit their future investment and cease expansion. Speaking directly to an argument raised by trustees on campuses where the divestment debate is currently in process, Smith suggested that analysis claiming a college should be non-political was "fatally flawed." He suggested that ownership of stock in a company active in South Africa is by itself a political statement.

Nana Sheshibe, a S. African exile and graduate student at UMass conducted a workshop discussing the effects of apartheid on black women. She described destructiveness of apartheid traditional values of family and land for the African woman.

The Anti-Apartheid Coalition has planned a variety of divestiture-oriented activities for the remainder of the school year. Among these are educational workshops to be held in both freshman dormitories and upperclass houses, guerilla theatre, and a demonstration in favor of divestiture when the trustees visit the campus on April 20.

minutes or less. But the load-shedder can't stop the energy waste by students.

Residents of Mission do not hesitate to talk about the energy waste. People often open windows without lowering their thermostats at night, or open their doors into the hallway of a suite and "air condition" their suitemates' rooms so that those thermostats have to be turned up. The outside doors, which have a tendency to stick open, also add to the waste of energy.

This waste, caused either by unawareness or simple carelessness, has reached extravagant proportions for a generation raised on the "energy crisis"

Professors record so the blind can read

by Randy Wang

"Very satisfying—a sense of doing something well worthwhile for someone who really needs it," said Professor of Mathematics Victor Hill, describing his involvement with the Williamstown branch of the Berkshire County Unit of Recording for the Blind, Inc.

The branch opened in January, 1965, in response to a heightened demand for the service among area residents. English professor Don Gifford, co-director of the Williamstown branch, obtained a grant of $2000 from the local Lion's club. Gifford's involvement derives from his wife, Honora, who was previously active in the Lenox branch, and acts as the other co-director. The Williamstown and Lenox offices of RFB are presently the only two in the state.

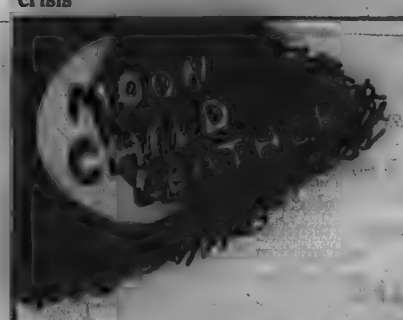
Originally located at 63 Water Street, in space nominally rented out by Philip Talarico of Williamstown, the Williamstown branch has since moved to the baggage room of the old Cole Avenue railroad station.

The recording process requires two participants: the reader and the "quality control" monitor, who checks for mistakes. Each session lasts 1½ hours, and people usually come once a week; the average increases if the need is urgent. Interested volunteers, in order to be qualified readers, must first take a sample voice test, which is also evaluated in NYC for "listenability."

The reading itself is not a simple process. Gifford offered the example of a blind student who needed James Joyce's Ulysses. Early on, the student asked that different people portray the roles of different characters. Although Gifford thought that he had performed a "neutral" reading, he explained that "an active reading is necessarily an active interpretation."

The job becomes even more difficult for statistical and scientific texts. The problem arises of verbally describing graphs, tables and formulas. The difficulties are in part solved with "raised line drawings," which can be traced by the student's fingers, but much of the interpretative translations are done by Hill and other specialized readers. Hill finds the tasks "challenging," and feels that his experiences reading for the blind helped him in his class explanations of material.

Hill's deep involvement in the program derives in part from his "considerable respect for people who are able to request such materials." Evidently, many others have similar sentiments, as there are about 115 volunteers, according to Gifford. The group includes a number of faculty members, but also retired persons, lawyers, psychologists, and other local residents.



Although Gifford and Hill find satisfaction in reading requested books, both noted unique challenges during their years as readers. Gifford recalled an occasion on which he had to read a scholarly work on medieval literature involving multi-lingual quotations.

Hill reminisced on a manual giving "81 different techniques to tune 51 different scales used in the history of music," and described the task as "dreary, boring, and pedantic."

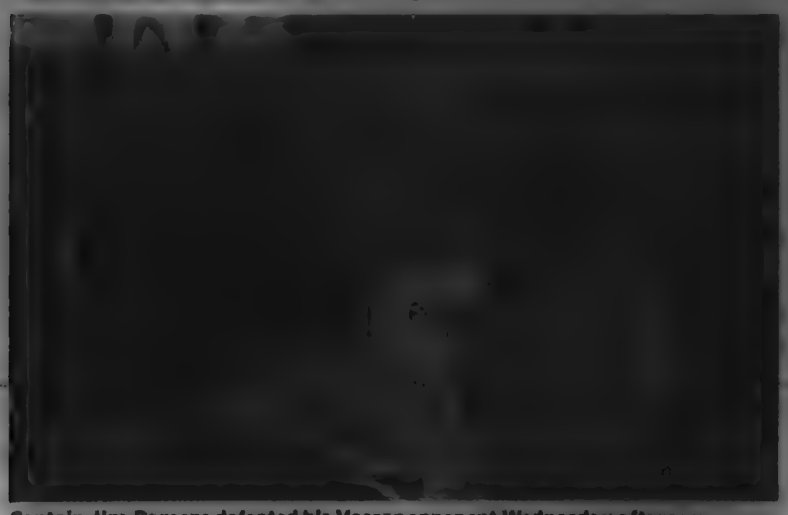
Netmen whip Vassar 8-1 in opener

by Evan Bash

Take one plethora of depth, a repletion of experience and add talent to taste, mix well and then let simmer through a week of hard preseason practice. Having followed this tennis gourmet's recipe to a tee, the men's tennis team believes the makings of a strong season have been brewed. Wednesday's 8-1 whupping of Vassar did nothing to dispel this feeling.



With nine of last year's eleven lettermen returning, the confidence bestowed by both a sixth place finish in the New England tournament last season and five consecutive Little Three titles, and plenty of emphasis being placed on the dominating serve and volley type game, considerable improvement on last year's 6-6 record seems assured. Coach Sean Sloane also has his charges working hard on doubles. Close matches are often decided by the squad with stronger doubles teams.

The Ephs opened the season against Vassar by sweeping through the singles without losing a set. Martin Goldberg, playing in the no. one spot for the third straight year, showed he'll be as tough as ever in an easy win. Returning to the starting line-up after missing most of last year with an injury, no. two Dan O'Connell had a shaky start before settling down to record a good win. Captain Jim Parsons set a good example for his teammates in crushing his opponent, while no. four Peter Friesen overwhelmed his foe in two quick sets.

Freshman Allen Barnes, playing some fine tennis, showed he'll be a force to be reckoned with for four years in a strong victory, and no. six Evan Bash won easily in two sets.

Pressing these top six singles players are the other returning players from last year. Mitch Reiss and Alan Wall are eager for chances to get into the line-up, as are the renowned doubles players Tad Roach, Bill Whelan (both of whom played singles last year) and Dean Gianakos.

The first real test for the racketmen comes tomorrow as they host always strong Army at 2:00 p.m.

Captain Jim Parsons defeated his Vassar opponent Wednesday afternoon.

Crew warms up in D. C.

by Nick Lefferts

Nearly 60 oarsmen and women from the Williams crew spent their spring vacations in Washington, D.C., rowing on the Potomac River in preparation for their spring schedule of races. A total of six eights (eight-oared racing shells) made the trip south with the men's and women's squads boating three eights apiece.

The Purple crews took advantage of the spring-like conditions to get in as much work as possible, with double sessions on the water the daily routine during the crews' two weeks in Washington. The Eph rowers also sharpened their skills in "brushes" (rowing jargon for scrimmages) with local crews before heading home to the still-frozen climes of Williamstown.

The men's crews were scheduled to open their schedule in Philadelphia last Saturday against Villanova and LaSalle, but rough water forced the cancellation of the races. The varsity eight revealed some good speed in a series of brushes that afternoon as they dominated Villanova and dueled evenly with a perennially fast LaSalle boat. The brushes on the rough water pointed up Williams' need for continued style work as the Purple eight repeatedly lost seats to LaSalle when it hit bad water. The women's crews gave generally encouraging performances in their brushes with U. of Penn., Rutgers and Vesper Boat Club of Philadelphia.

The Williams crew normally row out of their boathouse on Pittsfield's Onota Lake, but until Onota is free of ice the crews will make the 40-mile (one way) trip to the Hudson River at Stillwater, N.Y. to practice.

This season the men's program is boating a varsity eight and heavy and lightweight freshmen eights, while the women's program boasts heavy, light and novice eights. Both squads have a full schedule of races this spring, with the men pointing for a strong finish at the Dad Vail Regatta (small college championships) in Philadelphia May 15 and 16. The same weekend the women's Eastern Championships will be held on Onota Lake, providing a showcase for some of the finest women's crews in the nation.

Laxwomen anticipate better season due to experience

by Mary Kate Shea

Experience certainly is not lacking in this year's women's varsity lacrosse team as 11 lettermen, including nine seniors, are returning to form the nucleus of coach Linda Wilkins' squad. Wilkins expects that, barring injuries, the team should improve on last year's 3-5 season record.

The attack will be led by a group of seasoned players. Sally Kruse, back at Williams after a semester abroad, should provide added scoring punch having moved from the center to the first home position. Kruse's consistency in catching and throwing and her height should give the Ephs an advantage in front of the goal on attack. Junior Sue Wright, who will be playing at the center or attack wing spot, will be a valuable addition to the team while at Williams on exchange from Wellesley.

Seniors Mary Fish and Maggi O'Brien, playing at second and third home respectively, have experienced knee trouble during the pre-season, but both are expected to be ready for the start of the season.

Marty Taft, a junior with two years of varsity experience, will again handle the tough assignment of directing the defense from the goalie spot. Coach Wilkins has high hopes for Taft and says, "She's looking stronger now than she ever has at the beginning of the season." Another player to look for on defense is sophomore Anne Sneath. Sneath played on the varsity as a freshman and Wilkins says that she is again "doing a dynamite job at cover point."

Following spring break, the squad has been scrimmaging daily in preparation for this Saturday's scrimmage day at Smith College. At Smith, the team will face squads from Yale, Dartmouth, University of Vermont, Smith and Amherst in abbreviated games consisting of 20-minute halves.

Women's varsity lacrosse opens its season with the first leg of the Little Three at Amherst on April 18. Wilkins feels that "things look very promising for the Little Three." Judging by the experience and talent of the members of this year's team, there is no reason why women's lacrosse should not cop another women's Little Three title.

Laxteam has the talent but loses opener

Though the Williams Lacrosse team dropped its Williamstown opener to C. W. Post of Long Island 11-5 last Wednesday by the largest margin in the two teams three years of confrontation, Coach Renzi Lamb and Captains Pete Unger and Todd Eckerson were not downcast, disparaging, or even abusive to the refs; rather, they were quite encouraging and optimistic. In a post-game huddle Eckerson commented, "This is the best Williams team I've been on. Everyone hustled and never gave up. Things just didn't turn our way today."

Nothing's turned Williams' way in the first half. It seemed as if Williams week sojourn in sunny Florida where it participated in the Sun Coast Lacrosse Tournament worked against Williams' ability in the Berkshires. Williams was only able to maintain possession for less than six minutes in the entire thirty minute half.

Despite its inability to generate an offense in the first half, Williams remained close: 3-2 at the end of the first quarter and 6-4 at the half. Only several clutch saves by Williams sophomore goalie Bob Cowin prevented C. W. Post from opening up a large lead.

In the second half, Williams recuperated somewhat, and behind the spirited play of Freshman Brian Benedict began to consistently penetrate the C. W. Post defense. Attackmen Eckerson, Dick Goodbody, and Peter Thomsen fired a barrage of shots only to be repeatedly refused goals by the C. W. Post goalie Ron Blaufarb. In the second half Blaufarb netted 12 of his 18 saves and allowed only one goal.

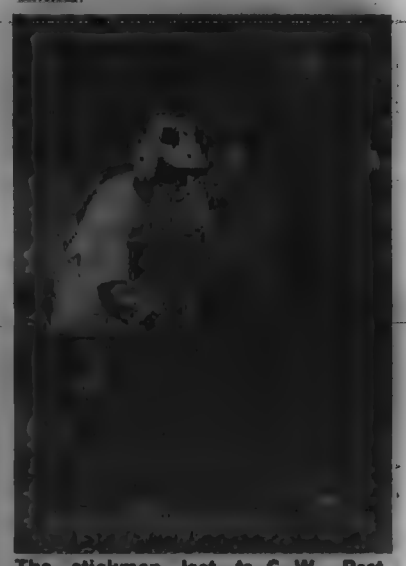
Williams' inability to capitalize on extra-man situations and stop C. W. Posts' man-up attempts proved to be another decisive factor in the game. Williams failed to capitalize on any of C. W. Posts' nine infractions, while C. W. Post connected on five of ten opportunities.

Overall, Lamb is pleased. "We are as far along at this point in the season than we ever have been. There is a good attitude."

GOALS—Pete Thomsen, Gus Nuzzolese, Dick Goodbody, Pete Barbaresi, Tam Murray

ASSISTS—Todd Eckerson 2, Brian Benedict

Season Preview



Led by co-captains Pete Unger and Todd Eckerson, Coach Renzie Lamb's lacrosse team at Williams is intent on improving on last year's frustrating 6-6 season. 1977 was a season marked by an abundance of talent, but an inability to win the big games. In 1978, however, the Williams stickmen have plenty of experienced returnees.

Eckerson and Unger are the center of Williams' strength. Both were All-New England and All-Snively last year. Unger starred on defense while Eckerson sparked the offense. In NCAA Division II-III statistics, Eckerson was fifth in assists (47) and eleventh in total points (65). His assist total is the best in Williams lacrosse history.

Joining Eckerson on attack will be junior Pete Thomsen (28 goals, 16 assists last year) and senior Dick Goodbody, a strong addition to an attack group which generated over half of all Williams' points last year. On call are John O'Herron, Wayne Eckerson and Paul Rodgers.

Williams will field a revitalized midfield corps this year. Senior Mark Murray, who sat out last season with injuries, will be joined by sophomore Doug Gill and freshman Brian Benedict. Equally strong is a line composed of junior Tam Murray and sophomores Gus Nuzzolese and John Glynn. Mike Bernay, Alec Ramsay, Pete Barbaresi and John Moore add considerable depth and should see plenty of action.

Unger will lead a relatively young defensive unit. Russ Gee, Mike Curran, Jeff Murray and Jeff Seymour are all vying for the two open spots. Bob Cowin returns to the goal, backed up by freshman Bill Childs.

The stickmen lost to C. W. Post Wednesday but hope to crush Springfield tomorrow.

Sports Briefs

Men's NCAA swimming

As spring break got underway, the Williams College men's swim team captured seventh place in the NCAA Division III National Championships with six Williams swimmers earning All-American honors.

The strength of the Williams team was in the 400-yard medley relay and the 400-yard freestyle relay, capturing second place in both events. Head Coach Carl Samuelson describes the races as "nose to nose the whole way." Johns Hopkins University, team winner at the Nationals, won the medley relay while Occidental College, a California school, nosed out Williams in the free-style relay.

The members of the Williams medley relay team, all of whom won All-America honors for their performanoe, were Don Cameron, Paul vom Eigen, Guy Hoelzer, and Phil Wild. The freestyle relay team was composed of Hoelzer, Wild, Cameron and Dave Amlicke.

Other performances that earned All-America honors for Williams swimmers included 8th place in the 50-yard freestyle by Bill Beckett and 12th place by Wild, who also picked up a 7th-place finish in the 100 freestyle. Hoelzer captured 7th place in the 100-yard butterfly, Cameron took 3rd in the 100-yard backstroke, and vom Eigen was 10th in the 200-yard breaststroke. Swimmers finishing in the top twelve in their events at the Nationals are named All-Americans.

Baseball Captains

Juniors Gerry Kelly and Matt Spangler have been elected co-captains of the 1978-79 Williams College Basketball team.

Kelly was hampered by an ankle injury for a major part of the season, but still led Williams in scoring with an average of 13.9 points per game. Even though he did not play in three games due to the injury, he was second on the team in total points scored, trailing Spangler by eight. Kelly was named to the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Division III Weekly Honor Roll for his 29 point performance in a victory over Tufts University.

Spangler led Williams in rebounding with a 7.2 average, and was second in scoring behind Kelly, hitting 12.3 points per game. He was also named to the ECAC Honor Roll for his performances in victories against Norwich University and Connecticut College.

Kelly and Spangler were elected by their teammates at the close of the 1977-78 season that saw Williams finish with a record of 9-12.

Women's NCAA swimming

Williams sophomore Keron Walker earned All-American honors in two events at the Division II National Women's Collegiate Swimming Championships held prior to spring break.

The honors cap a swim season for Walker that saw her win the New England Championships in her two key events, the 50-yard freestyle and 50-yard butterfly. Her achievements make her the first woman swimmer from Williams to win the title of All-American.

At the Nationals, Walker captured 8th place in the 50 freestyle with a time of 25.55 seconds and fifth in the 50 butterfly with a time of 27.34 seconds. The winner of both events, Karen Linck of East Stroudsburg State College in East Stroudsburg, Pa., is the national record holder in both events. Less than one-point-five seconds separated Walker from Linck in each race. Walker's time in the butterfly broke her own Williams College record. In all she holds seven Williams swimming records, four in individual events and three in relays.

Batters train in tropics

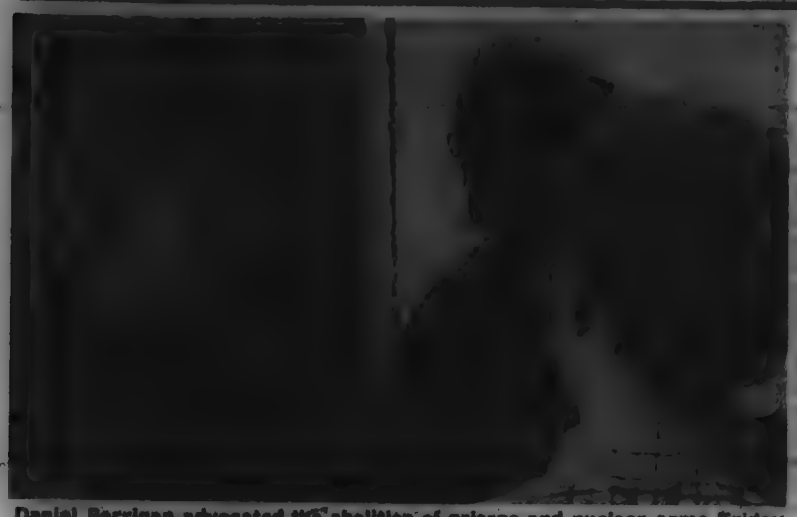
The Williams baseball team spent spring vacation in Florida preparing for the 1978 season. Although Williams won only three of nine games, coach Jim Briggs was more than satisfied with the performance of his team, especially overall defensive play.

Standing out was first baseman Ken Hollingsworth who batted .484 and handled his position like a pro. "Ken has mastered first base," said Briggs.

While Roger McEniry has a solid hold on second base, shortstop and third base will be platoon positions to begin the regular season. Pete Walker (.483) and Scott Barrington (.417 BA) both played well. Walker is bothered by a sore arm so Barrington will start out at shortstop until Walker recovers and Harrington moves into the outfield.

Joe Flaherty and Bob LaBombard, both hitting over .300 down South, will alternate at third base and will also see DH action.



The pitching had its troubles without reliever Mike Martineau. Tony Stall, John Carey, and Steve Maier head what could be an outstanding staff.

Unlike previous years Briggs used the trip to get his whole team ready and put winning secondary; the results were more than satisfactory. "I'm pleased with everybody's progress."

Williams played R.P.I. yesterday in Troy. Saturday the Ephmen journey to Springfield for a doubleheader.

Capacity crowd attentive as Gregory blasts government

by Todd Tucker

"My nation, 24 hours a day, is plotting to kill me, not for doing wrong, but for doing right," Dick Gregory claimed to a capacity crowd at Chapin Hall Friday night.

After a humorous, though often biting, prelude, Gregory's speech jumped from subject to subject exposing what he perceives to be the conspiratorial workings of the United States Government, or in his words, "a handful of manipulators."

A large segment of his speech was devoted to the assassinations which have haunted this country since the early 1960's. Gregory produced numerous pieces of evidence, most of it obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, which intimated FBI complicity in both the Kennedy and King shootings. This evidence included FBI memoranda from early November, 1963 giving the time and place of President Kennedy's death later that month.

After enumerating several unanswered questions regarding the deaths of Martin Luther King, Jr. and Robert F. Kennedy, Gregory held up two letters written by J. Edgar Hoover to the FBI's Chicago field office. These communications instructed the agents there to "neutralize Gregory by an 'untraceable' means."

Many of the government's actions make "Hitler look like Mickey Mouse."

Throughout the evening, Gregory attacked the U.S. Government. While claiming to protect freedom, Gregory charged, many of its actions would "make Hitler look like Mickey Mouse." As examples, he cited alleged nerve gas tests in the subways of New York City and the injection of a cancer virus into thousands of children, whose parents thought it was a polio vaccine.

Members of the U.S. Army were moved into an atomic blast area, he noted with horror, to test the effects of radiation. All Army records of these men have been mysteriously destroyed, Gregory said.

Even nature is not immune to the tamperings of the government, Gregory asserted. He called the audience's attention to the bizarre weather patterns of the past few years and stated, "If I say weather modification exists, they (the government) know I can prove it."

Dick Gregory did not present a mood of total despair. His statement, repeated several times, that: "I don't believe we have gone beyond the point of no return, but we're approaching it fast," indicated that America's situation is not hopeless.

Africa, he said, will dominate the American consciousness for the next decade. Though the possibility of a major African war exists, he maintained that there are non-violent means of bringing about change, especially with regard to the white supremacist regimes of southern Africa.

Berrigan talk focuses on nuclear capabilities

by Chris Ross

The Rev. Daniel Berrigan, Jesuit priest, poet and political activisit, shared his ideas about the nuclear arms race, ideal communities, and achieving "sanity" in our society in an informal discussion last Friday night. Berrigan called for a recognition of the "forces pushing us against the wall—those that are draining our spirituality and drawing people away from each other," and of the destructive capacity of nuclear power.

Berrigan said he believes that the United States should destroy its nuclear weapons, explaining, "life today is risky if we disarm and risky if we continue as we have, but I feel that the latter risk is greater." He extended this view to also oppose the use of nuclear power for energy purposes, saying, "To protect these nuclear plants against human malice or error will take a Fascist level of power."

Berrigan claimed that "the search for non-violent alternatives should be based on community." He has established three communities in the East, the Great Lakes area and the West coast, operated on a collective basis. "We share everything—resources, income, childcare," Berrigan explained.

Berrigan said that ideal communities can survive only on the fringes of society. "If you want to save some precious part of yourself," he said, "don't buy into the culture." The collective must not totally isolate itself, however. "We have not abandoned the cities," Berrigan noted. In his words, "we connect with the poverty areas of the cities and with nuclear crimes."

Berrigan discussed his views on rehabilitation, which he described as "a long word about nothing." From his dealings with prisoners, and his own experiences as an inmate, he has been convinced that prisons should be abolished. He asserted, "I have never seen anyone improved by being locked up. Our children may live to see the day when prisons are seen as anti-human as slums, draft board centers and gas chambers," he predicted.

Berrigan predicted that many students from the college will fill powerful or influential positions in the future. "The possibility of their exercising that authority in a new way or in the same old way is a haunting one," he speculated.
